This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

+ Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.

+ Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.

+ Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.

+ Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at `http://books.google.com/`

CASES

DECIDED IN

THE COURT OF SESSION,

COURT OF JUSTICIARY,

AND

HOUSE OF LORDS,

FROM JULY 20, 1874, TO AUGUST 13, 1875.

REPORTED BY

MIDDLETON RETTIE, DONALD CRAWFORD, G. F. MELVILLE, A. E. HENDERSON, D. GILLESPIE, AND H. JOHNSTON, ESQUIRES, ADVOCATES.

FOURTH SERIES.—VOL. II.

EDINBURGH:
T. & T. CLARK, LAW BOOKSELLERS.
LONDON: STEVENS & SONS.
M.DCCC.LXXV.

PRINTED BY GEORGE ROBB (SUCCESSOR TO JOHN HUGHES), THISTLE STREET, EDINBURGH.

279711

YMANLI UNIVERSITY

JUDGES

OF THE

COURT OF SESSION

DURING THE PERIOD OF THESE REPORTS.

FIRST DIVISION.

Lord President, The Right Hon. JOHN INGLIS.

Lord DEAS.

Lord ARDMILLAN.

Lord MURE.

SECOND DIVISION.

Lord Justice-Clerk, The Right Hon. Lord MONCREIFF.

Lord NEAVES.

Lord ORMIDALE.

Lord GIFFORD.

PERMANENT LORDS ORDINARY.

Lord MACKENZIE.*
Lord SHAND.
Lord YOUNG.
Lord CRAIGHILL.
Lord CURRIEHILL.

---

* Lord Mackenzie died on 19th May 1875. His successor, Lord Rutherfurd Clark, was appointed in November 1875.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICIARY.

Lord Justice-General, Right Hon. JOHN INGLIS.
Lord Justice-Clerk, Right Hon. Lord MONCREIFF.

LORDS COMMISSIONERS OF JUSTICIARY.

Lord DEAS. Lord ARDMILLAN. Lord NEAVES.
Lord YOUNG. Lord MURE.

Lord-Advocate, EDWARD S. GORDON, Esquire.

Solicitor-General, WILLIAM WATSON, Esquire.

Dean of Faculty, ANDREW R. CLARK, Esquire.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

PEERS

WHO DELIVERED JUDGMENTS IN SCOTCH APPEALS DURING THE PERIOD OF THESE REPORTS.

Lord Chancellor, Lord CAIRNS,

Lords CHELMSFORD, HATHERLEY, O'HAGAN, and SELBORNE.

INDEX OF NAMES

IN VOLUME II.

For Index of Names in Registration Appeal Court, Court of Justiciary, and House of Lords, see pp. xi. and xii. hereof.

I.—COURT OF SESSION.

Page

Adam, &c. v. Alloa Police Commissioners, - - - 143
Addie v. Solicitor of Inland Revenue, - - - - 431
Addison, &c., Petitioners, - - - - - 457
Aders, Preyer, and Company, Göetze v. - - - 150
Advocate, Lord v. Earl of Glasgow, - - - - 317
Advocate, Lord v. M'Culloch, - - - - 27
Aiton, Sellar, &c. v. - - - - - 381
Aiton, Stephen, &c. v. - - - - - 470
Allan v. Gilchrist, - - - - - - 587
Allan v. Shaw and King, - - - - - 463
Alloa Police Commissioners, Adam, &c. v. - - - 143
Anderson v. Hamilton and Company, - - - - 355
Anderson v. North British Railway Company, - - - 443
Anderston Foundry Company, Harrisons v. - - 122, 857
Arbuckle (Inspector of Cambuslang), Beattie (Inspector of Barony Parish) v. - - - - - - 330
Armstrong and Company v. M'Gregor and Company - - 339
Armstrong Brothers and Company v. Hannay and Sons' Trustee, - 399
Auld v. Shairp, - - - - - 191, 940
Austin v. Shennan, - - - - - 68

Baird v. Glendinning, - - - - - - 25
Baird v. Mount, - - - - - - 101
Balfour (Lloyd's Curator Bonis), Chapman v. - - - 291
Balgarnie (Ritchie's Trustee), Ritchie v. - - - 297
Barclay, Curle and Company, Clyde Navigation Trustees v. - - 842
Beattie (Inspector of Barony Parish) v. Arbuckle (Inspector of Cambuslang), - - - - - - 330
Beattie (Inspector of Barony Parish) v. Greig (Inspector of Edinburgh City Parish), - - - - - 923
Bell, Graham v. - - - - - - 972
Bertram and Company v. Stewart's Trustees, - - - 255
Berwick, &c. Petitioners, - - - - - 90
Bethune v. Morgan, - - - - - 186
Blair and Others (Maxwell's Trustees) v. Maxwell, - - 71
Borthwick, Graham v. - - - - - 812

	Page
Bradly, Maclaren v.	185
Brand's Trustees v. Brand's Trustees,	258
Brand's Trustees, Houldsworth v.	683
Breadalbane, Earl of, v. Jamieson (Marquess of Breadalbane's Judicial Factor),	826
Brockie, &c. Petitioners,	923
Brown, &c. v. Sutherland,	615
Brown, Young v.	456
Browne, Petitioner,	488
Bruce's Trustees v. Bruce,	775
Buchanan, &c. v. Stewart,	78
Buchanan v. Tulliallan School Board,	793
Burns, Pollok v.	497
Cadzow v. Lockhart,	928
Caledonian Railway Company v. Greenock Sacking Company, &c.	671
Caledonian Railway Company, Jarvie v.	623
Caledonian Railway Company, Peebles and Son v.	346
Caledonian Railway Company v. Watt,	917
Cambuslang, Inspector of, Inspector of Barony Parish v.	330
Cambusnethan, Inspector of, v. Inspectors of Kilbarchan and Shotts,	463
Campbell v. North British Railway Company,	433
Camperdown, Earl of, &c. Duke of Montrose v.	772
Carruthers, &c. Fraser, &c., v.	595
Chapman v. Balfour (Lloyd's Curator Bonis),	291
Christie, Gelstons v.	982
Clark v. Henderson,	428
Clarkson, Sutherland's Trustees v.	46
Closeburn, Inspector of, v. Inspector of Kirkgunzeon,	68
Clyde Navigation Trustees v. Barclay, Curle, and Company,	842
Clyde Navigation Trustees, Donald v.	813
Clow and Company, M'Intyre and Company v.	278
Cofton v. Cofton,	599
Cowan, Proctor and Sons v.	115
Cox, Coxe v.	41
Cramond Iron Company, Webster and Company v.	752
Crawford v. Field,	20
Crombie, Gibb v.	886
Cumming, Lamont v.	784
Cunliffe and Dunlop, Moss v.	657
Cunningham v. Lee,	83
Davidson, Fletcher v.	71
De Eresby's Trustees, Lady Willoughby, Earl of Perth v.	538
Dilke, &c. Johnston v.	836
Dixon, White, &c. (Raeburn's Trustees) v.	904
Donald v. Clyde Navigation Trustees,	813
Dow and Company v. Union Bank,	459
Dudley, Earl of, Robertson v.	935
Dundee Police Commissioners, Wallace v.	565
Dunoon, Police Commissioners of, Hamilton v.	299
Eaglesham and Company v. Grant,	960
Edinburgh City Parish, Inspector of, Inspector of Barony v.	923
Edinburgh Life Assurance Company v. Solicitor of Inland Revenue,	394
Ferguson v. Ferguson,	627
Field, Crawford v.	20
Findlay v. Mackenzie,	909
Fletcher v. Davidson,	71

Page

Forrest (Robertson's Trustee), Jamieson v. - - - 701
Forrester, &c. v. Robson's Trustees, - - - - 755
Forsyth and Another, Petrie v. - - - - 214
Fraser, &c. v. Carruthers, &c. - - - - 595
Frood v. Earl of Stair, &c. - - - - - 76

Gairdner v. Youngs, - - - - - 173
Galloway v. Nicolson, - - - - - 650
Gelstons v. Christie, - - - - - 982
Gibb v. Crombie, - - - - - 886
Gilchrist, Allan v. - - - - - 587
Gillespie, Cathcart and Fraser, Harris, &c. v. - - - 1003
Glasgow, Earl of, Lord Advocate v. - - - - 317
Glasgow Water Commissioners v. Solicitor of Inland Revenue, - 708
Glendinning, Baird v. - - - - - 25
Glenluce, Minister of, v. Heritors of Glenluce, - - - 76
Glenshiel School Board, Morison v. - - - - 715
Goetze v. Aders, Preyer, and Company, - - - - 150
Gourlay (Pinkerton's Trustee) v. Hodge, - - - 738
Gow's Trustees v. Mealls, - - - - - 729
Graham v. Borthwick, - - - - - 812
Graham v. Bell, - - - - - - 972
Graham v. Lamont, - - - - - 438
Grant, Eaglesham and Company v. - - - - 960
Grant's Trustees v. Morison, - - - - - 377
Gray v. Marshall, - - - - - - 907
Greig (Inspector of Edinburgh City Parish), Beattie (Inspector of Barony Parish) v. - - - - - - 923
Greenock Sacking Company, &c., Caledonian Railway Company v. - 671

Hamilton v. Police Commissioners of Dunoon, - - - 299
Hamilton and Company, Anderson v. - - - - 355
Hamilton and Son, Macbride v. - - - - 775
Hannay and Sons' Trustee v. Armstrong Brothers and Company, - 399
Harper, &c. Hutton, &c. v. - - - - - 893
Harris, &c. v. Gillespie, Cathcart, and Fraser, - - - 1003
Harrisons v. Anderston Foundry Company, - - 122, 857
Harvey v. Lindsay, - - - - - 980
Henderson, Clark v. - - - - - 428
Henderson v. Wallace, &c. - - - - - 272
Henderson, Wallace v. - - - - - 999
Heron Maxwell's Trustees v. Heron Maxwell, - - - 71
Hill's Trustees v. Thomson, - - - - - 68
Hodge, Gourlay (Pinkerton's Trustee) v. - - - 738
Houldsworth v. Brand's Trustees, - - - - 683
Hume, &c. v. Young, Trotter, and Company, - - - 338
Hunter, Kelso School Board v. (Interdict) - - - 228
Hunter v. Kelso School Board (Reduction, &c.), - - - 520
Hutton, &c. v. Harper, &c. - - - - - 893

Inland Revenue, Commissioners of, Young v. - - - 925
Inland Revenue, Solicitor of, Addie v. - - - - 431
Inland Revenue, Solicitor of, Edinburgh Life Assurance Company v. - 394
Inland Revenue, Solicitor of, Glasgow Water Commissioners v. - 708
Inland Revenue, Solicitor of, Scottish Widows' Fund and Life Assurance Society v. - - - - - - 394
Inverkeithing, Magistrates of, v. Ross, - - - - 48

Jackson v. M'Iver, - - - - - - 882

	Page
Jacobsen v. Union Bank of Scotland and Others (Jacobsen's Creditors),	227
Jamieson (Marquess of Breadalbane's Judicial Factor), Earl of Breadalbane v.	826
Jamieson v. Forrest (S. S. Robertson's Trustee),	701
Jarvie v. Caledonian Railway Company,	623
Johnston v. Dilke, &c.	836
Johnston v. Johnston, &c.	986
Johnston v. Staig,	701
Kelso School Board v. Hunter,	228
Kelso School Board, Hunter v.	520
Kenny v. Taylor,	636
Kermack v. Kermack,	156
Kilbarchan, Inspector of, &c., Inspector of Cambusnethan v.	463
King v. Pollock,	42
Kinnear v. Kinnear's Trustees,	765
Kirkgunzeon, Inspector of, Inspector of Closeburn v.	68
Laidlaw and Sons v. Wilson and Armstrong,	148
Lamont v. Cumming,	784
Lamont, Graham v.	438
Larkin v. M'Grady,	170
Lee, Cunningham v.	83
Lindsay, Harvey v.	980
Linton, &c. Rae v.	669
Lockhart, Cadzow v.	928
Logiealmond School Board, Robb v.	417, 698
Lord Advocate v. Earl of Glasgow,	317
Lord Advocate v. M'Culloch,	27
Macbride v. Hamilton and Son,	775
M'Cormick's Trustees, Petitioners,	667
M'Culloch, Lord Advocate v.	27
M'Donald v. M'Donald,	705
M'Dougall v. M'Dougall,	814
Macfarlane, Mitchell v.	930
M'Farlane, &c. Paterson v.	490
M'Grady, Larkin v.	170
M'Gregor and Company, Armstrong, &c. v.	339
M'Innes, Phillips v.	224
M'Intyre and Company v. Clow and Company,	278
M'Iver, Jackson v.	882
Mackenzie, Findlay v.	909
Mackenzie's Trustees v. Mitchell, &c.	469
Mackie, Riddell v.	115
Mackie's Trustees v. Mackie, &c.	312
Mackie's Trustees v. Martin,	621
Mackintosh v. Weir,	877
Macknight, &c. (M'Cormick's Trustees), Petitioners,	667
Maclaren v. Bradly,	185
M'Leod's Trustees v. M'Leod,	481
Malcolm's Trustees, Veasey v.	748
Marshall, Gray v.	907
Martin, Mackie's Trustees v.	621
Maxwell's Trustees v. Maxwell,	71
Mealls, Gow's Trustees v.	729
Meikle, Pirie v.	40
Menzies and Others (Murray's Trustees) v. Murray,	507
Miller, &c. v. Powell, &c.	976

Page

Mitchell v. Macfarlane, - - - - - 930
Mitchell, &c. Mackenzie's Trustees v. - - - - 469
Mitchell v. Scott's Trustees, - - - - - 162
Moir and Son, &c. Rough v. - - - - - 529
Montrose, Duke of, v. Earl of Camperdown, - - - 772
Morgan, Bethune v. - - - - - 186
Morison v. Glenshiel School Board, - - - - 715
Morison, Grant's Trustees v. - - - - - 377
Moss v. Cunliffe and Dunlop, - - - - 657
Mount, Baird v. - - - - - - 101
Muir v. Muir, - - - - - - 26
Murray v. Countess of Rothes, - - - - 106
Murray, Menzies and Others (Murray's Trustees) v. - - 507

Nicoll, &c. Steven v. - - - - - 292
Nicolson, Galloway v. - - - - - 650
Nielson, Rae v. - - - - - - 676
North British Railway Company, Anderson v. - - - 443
North British Railway Company, Campbells v. - - - 433
North British Railway Company, Shields v. - - - 126

Oswald, Petitioner, - - - - - 931

Park v. Watson, &c. - - - - - 118
Paterson v. M'Farlane, &c. - - - - - 490
Peddie, Steuart v. - - - - - - 94
Peebles and Son v. Caledonian Railway Company, - - 346
Pendreigh, Petitioner, - - - - - 769
Perth, Earl of, v. Lady Willoughby De Eresby's Trustees, - - 538
Petrie v. Forsyth, - - - - - - 214
Phillips v. M'Innes, - - - - - 224
Pirie v. Meikle, - - - - - - 40
Pollock, King v. - - - - - - 42
Pollok v. Burns, - - - - - - 497
Powell, &c. Miller v. - - - - - 976
Proctor, Cowan v. - - - - - - 115

Rae v. Linton, - - - - - - 669
Rae v. Nielson, - - - - - - 676
Raeburn's Trustees v. Dixon, - - - - 904
Ramsay, &c. Simpson, &c. v. - - - - 129
Rankin's Trustees, Sturrock v. - - - - 850
Rhind, &c. v. Sheach, &c. - - - - - 1002
Renwick v. Von Rotberg, - - - - - 855
Riddell, Mackie v. - - - - - 115
Ritchie v. Balgarnie (Ritchie's Trustee), - - - 297
Robb v. Logiealmond School Board, - - - 417, 698
Robertson v. Earl of Dudley, - - - - 935
Robertson v. Steuart, - - - - - 970
Robertsons, Young v. - - - - - 599
Robertson's Trustee, Jamieson v. - - - - 701
Robeson v. Waugh, - - - - - 63
Robson's Trustees, Forrester, &c. v. - - - - 755
Rodger's Trustees v. Rodger, - - - - - 294
Ross, Magistrates of Inverkeithing v. - - - - 48
Rothes, Countess of, Murray v. - - - - 106
Rough v. Moir and Son, &c. - - - - 529
Roxburghe, Duke of, Appellant, - - - - 715
Russell, &c. v. Russell, &c. - - - - 82, 93
Rutherglen, Magistrates of, &c. v. Stevenson, - - - 174

Page

Scott, Smith Brothers and Co. v. - - - - 601
Scott's Trustees, Mitchell v. - - - - 162
Scottish Widows' Fund and Life Assurance Society v. Solicitor of Inland Revenue, - - - - - 394
Selkirk Parish School Board v. Selkirk Burgh School Board, - 761
Sellar, &c. v. Aiton, - - - - - 381
Shairp, Auld v. - - - - - 191, 940
Shaw and King, Allan v. - - - - - 463
Sheach, &c. Rhind v. - - - - - 1002
Shennan, Austin v. - - - - - 68
Shields v. North British Railway Company, - - - 126
Shotts, Inspector of, &c., Inspector of Cambusnethan v. - - 463
Simpson, &c. v. Ramsay, &c. - - - - 129
Simpson v. Stewart, - - - - - 673
Simpson, &c. v. Taylor, - - - - - 75
Smith Brothers and Co. v. Scott, - - - - 601
Solicitor of Inland Revenue, Addie v. - - - - 431
Solicitor of Inland Revenue, Edinburgh Life Assurance Co. v. - 394
Solicitor of Inland Revenue, Scottish Widows' Fund and Life Assurance Society v. - - - - - 394
Spalding v. Spalding's Trustees, - - - - 237
Staig v. Johnston, - - - - - - 701
Stair, Earl of, Frood v. - - - - - 76
Stephen v. Aiton, - - - - - - 470
Steuart, Robertson v. - - - - - 970
Steuart v. Peddie, - - - - - - 94
Steven v. Nicoll, &c. - - - - - 292
Stevenson v. Magistrates of Rutherglen, &c. - - - 174
Stewart, Buchanan, &c. v. - - - - - 78
Stewart, Simpson v. - - - - - 673
Stewart's Trustees, Bertram and Company v. - - - 255
Stewart's Trustees v. Stewart, - - - - 488
Stronach, &c. v. Walker, &c. - - - - 120
Sturrock v. Rankin's Trustees, - - - - 850
Sutherland, Brown, &c. v. - - - - - 615
Sutherland's Trustees v. Clarkson, - - - - 46
Symington v. Symington, - - - - - 974

Taylor, Kenny v. - - - - - - 636
Taylor, Simpson, &c. v. - - - - - 75
Thomson, Hill's Trustees v. - - - - - 68
Tulliallan School Board, Buchanan v. - - - - 793

Union Bank of Scotland, Dow and Company v. - - - 459
Union Bank of Scotland, Jacobsen v. - - - - 227

Veasey v. Malcolm's Trustees, - - - - 748
Von Rotberg, Renwick v. - - - - - 855

Walker v. Stronach, - - - - - 120
Wallace, Henderson v. - - - - - 272
Wallace v. Henderson, - - - - - 999
Wallace v. Police Commissioners of Dundee, - - - 565
Wardlaw v. Wardlaw's Trustees, - - - - 368
Wardrop's Trustees, Stevenson v. Magistrates of Rutherglen and, - 174
Watson, &c. Park v. - - - - - 118
Watson v. Watson's Trustees, - - - - 344
Watt, Caledonian Railway Company v. - - - 917
Waugh, Robeson v. - - - - - 63

	Page
Webster and Company v. Cramond Iron Company,	752
Weir, Mackintosh v.	877
White, &c. (Raeburn's Trustee) v. Dixon,	904
Willoughby De Eresby's Trustees, Earl of Perth v.	538
Wilson and Armstrong, Laidlaw and Sons v.	148
Young v. Brown,	456
Young v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue,	925
Young, Gairdner v.	173
Young v. Robertsons,	599
Young, Trotter, and Company, Hume, &c. v.	338

REGISTRATION CASES.

Adair, Douglas v.	10
Adair v. Kay,	9
Adair v. Murray,	11
Cockburn, Wardrop v.	6
Cotesworth, Dunn v.	5
Dalglish v. Wright,	5
Douglas v. Adair,	10
Dunn v. Cotesworth,	5
Dunn, M'Queen v.	3
Henderson, Hewat v.	12
Hewat v. Henderson,	12
Kay, Adair v.	9
Kirkwood v. M'Callum,	1
M'Callum, Kirkwood v.	1
M'Queen v. Dunn,	3
Murray, Adair v.	11
Riddell, Rutherford v.	4
Rutherford v. Riddell,	4
Wardrop v. Cockburn,	6
Wright, Dalglish v.	5

II.—COURT OF JUSTICIARY.

	Page
Advocate, Lord, Keith v.	27
Bain v. Mackay,	32
Craig v. Peebles,	30
De Banzie v. Peebles,	22
Keith v. Lord Advocate,	27
Lang, &c. Mackenzie v.	1
Lazenby v. M'Arthur,	6
Linton, Rae v.	17
Lowden and Rowe, Sandys v.	7
M'Arthur, Lazenby v.	6
M'Dougall, Muckersie v.	12
Mackay, Bain v.	32
Mackenzie v. Lang, &c.	1
Muckersie v. M'Dougall,	12
Paterson v. Rose,	20
Peebles, Craig v.	30
Peebles, De Banzie v.	22
Rae v. Linton,	17
Rose, Paterson v.	20
Sandys v. Lowden and Rowe,	7

III.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

Advocate, Lord, v. Clyde Steam Navigation Company,	23
Advocate, Lord, v. M'Douall,	49
Barr and Shearer v. Cooper,	14
Bremner v. Elder,	136
Clyde Steam Navigation Company, Lord Advocate v.	23
Cooper, Barr and Shearer v.	14
Crawford, Muir v.	148
Elder, Bremner v.	136
Finlay's Trustees, Miller v.	1

Page

Henderson, &c. v. Stevenson, - - - - 71

Laurie, Lloyd and Company v. - - - - 1
Learmonth, &c. v. Miller, - - - - - 62
Lloyd and Company v. Laurie, - - - - 1
Lord Advocate v. Clyde Steam Navigation Company, - 23
Lord Advocate v. M'Douall, - - - - - 49

M'Donald v. M'Donald (Entail Case), - - - - 28
M'Donald v. M'Donald's Trustees (Marriage-Contract Case), - - 125
M'Douall, Lord Advocate v. - - - - - 49
Miller v. Finlay's Trustees, - - - - - 1
Miller, Learmonth, &c. (Finlay's Trustees) v. - - - 62
Muir v. Crawford, - - - - - 148

Peebles, Magistrates and Town-Council of, v. Kirk-Session of Peebles, - 117

Robertson, Steuart v. - - - - - 80

Stevenson, Henderson, &c. v. - - - - 71
Symington v. Symington, - - - - - 41

ERRATA.

P. 117, (H. of L.) line 7 of rubric, for and parish, read the parish.

P. 103, line 10 of note, for 265, read 465.

P. 206, line 11 from bottom, for delictu, read delicto.

P. 258, line 9 from foot, for Sol.-Gen. Watson—Mackintosh, read D.-F. Clark —Readman.

line 7 from foot, for D.-F. Clark—Readman, read Sol.-Gen. Watson—Mackintosh.

P. 333, last line of page, for Nov. 26, Poor-Law Mag. 348, read Nov. 26, 1863, 9 Poor-Law Mag. 348.

P. 369, line 13, delete were.

P. 378, line 12, for disposition to Grant by Morison, read disposition by Grant to Morison.

P. 896, line 3 of note, for 1838, read 1638.

P. 898, line 6, for In this, read This.

P. 901, line 11 from foot, for in not, read is not.

CASES

DECIDED IN

THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

1875.

LLOYD AND COMPANY, Defenders and Appellants.—Joseph Brown, Q.C.—Joseph Dixon.
JOHN LAURIE, Pursuer and Respondent.—Cotton, Q.C.—Shiress Will.

No. 1.

Feb. 16, 1875.
Lloyd and Co. v. Laurie.

Contract—Construction—Agent and Principal.—A commercial traveller agreed to act for a firm of wholesale tea merchants for a commission of one-third of the difference between the price quoted by his employers as the value of the tea, adding the charge for brokerage and other expenses, and the money obtained by the sale of the tea, his employers retaining the right of accepting or rejecting orders, and collecting all accounts themselves. Held, upon the terms of the agreement (aff. judgment of the Second Division), that this entitled him to one-third of the profits, if any, on each sale effected through him, without deduction in respect of loss upon other sales.

(IN the Court of Session, February 20, 1873, 11 Macph. 413, 45 Scot. Jur. 286.)

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Second Division.

The House, after hearing counsel for the appellant, affirmed the judgment, the Lord Chancellor observing that no legal principle was involved in the case.

Ld. Chancellor (Cairns).
Ld. Chelmsford.
Ld. Hatherley.
Ld. Selborne.

INTERLOCUTOR appealed from affirmed, and appeal dismissed, with costs.

SYMES, SANDILANDS, & HUMPHRY—WILLIAM B. HAY, S.S.C.—R. M. GLOAG—JAMES BUCHANAN, S.S.C.—Agents.

JOHN MILLER (Finlay's Trustee), Appellant.—John Pearson, Q.C.—J. T. Anderson.
MRS MARY ANNE ALEXANDER OR FINLAY AND OTHERS (Mr and Mrs Finlay's Marriage-Contract Trustees), Respondents.—William Pearson, Q.C.—Nevay.

No. 2.

Feb. 25, 1875.
Miller v. Finlay's Trustees.

Succession—Vesting—Trust.—A took the title to heritable subjects which he had purchased in the names of certain persons, who, by deed of declaration of trust, declared that they held the subjects in trust, inter alia, for the payment of the free yearly proceeds to A during his life, and after his death to his wife, if she survived him, for their liferent uses allenarly, the wife's liferent to be restrictable to such extent and in such manner as might be fixed by A; and after the determination of the foresaid liferents, in trust for A's children, in such shares and proportions as might be fixed by A, and failing such apportionment, share and share alike; declaring that the fee of the shares should be payable after the determination of the said liferents, and after the whole children who should have survived A and his wife, and who should be alive, had attained majority, or at such other times after the determination of the said liferents as should be fixed by A. A died, survived by his wife, and without fixing the shares of the children. Held (rev. judgment of the Second Division) that the children's shares of the estate vested at the execution and registration of the deed of declaration of trust in the children then born, and in the others as they came into existence.

No. 2.

Feb. 25, 1875. Miller v. Finlay's Trustees.

Ld. Chancellor (Cairns). Ld. Chelmsford. Ld. Hatherley. Ld. Selborne.

(IN the Court of Session, July 17, 1873, reported under date July 16, 1873, 45 Scot. Jur. 564.)

In 1829 the late Mr J. H. Alexander purchased the Theatre Royal, Glasgow, and took the disposition in favour of certain persons as trustees, for the ends, uses, and purposes to be declared in a deed of declaration of trust to be executed by the trustees. The trustees were duly infeft in the subjects.

By deed of declaration of trust, dated 21st December 1830 and 14th January 1831, and recorded in the Register of Sasines for the burgh of Glasgow 29th January 1831, executed under the powers conferred by the disposition, Mr Alexander was himself assumed as a trustee, and the trustees declared that they held and were infeft in the subjects in trust for the following purposes, viz., payment of certain debts due by Mr Alexander, therein enumerated; "in the fifth place, but only after we are freed and relieved from all reasonable obligations come under by us, in trust for the payment of the free yearly proceeds or rents thereof to the said John Henry Alexander during his life, for his liferent use allenarly, and after his death, in the event of being survived by Mrs Elizabeth Riddell or Alexander, his spouse, in trust for the payment to the said Mrs Elizabeth Riddell or Alexander, in like manner, of the free yearly proceeds or rents thereof during her life, for her liferent use allenarly, it being declared that in the event of the said Mrs Elizabeth Riddell or Alexander surviving the said John Henry Alexander, and marrying again, or of her doing anything inconsistent with a good and respectable moral character, the said liferent shall, upon such marriage or immoral conduct, eo ipso cease and determine, and restrictable, the said liferent, to such extent and in such manner as may be fixed by any probative writing to be subscribed by the said John Henry Alexander, even on deathbed; declaring that the foresaid provisions in favour of the said John Henry Alexander and Mrs Elizabeth Riddell or Alexander, and his or her interest in the present trust, shall be in nowise attachable for debt, but that the same shall be considered alimentary, and after the determination of the foresaid liferents, in trust for the whole lawful children of the present marriage between the said John Henry Alexander and Mrs Elizabeth Riddell or Alexander, in such shares and proportions as shall be fixed and determined by any probative writing subscribed by the said John Henry Alexander, as before mentioned, and failing such writing, then share and share alike, declaring that the fee or principal of the shares or interest of the said children shall be payable after the determination of the said liferents, and after the whole children who shall have survived the said John Henry Alexander and Mrs Elizabeth Riddell or Alexander, and who shall be alive, shall have attained majority, or at such other terms after the determination of the said liferents, and under such conditions or provisions as shall be fixed by the said John Henry Alexander in any writing to be left by him as before mentioned, it being hereby provided that after the determination of the said liferents it shall be in the power of the trustees, or a majority of them, to make payment to the said children yearly of such part of the free proceeds or rents of the trust-subjects as shall in their discretion be necessary for their maintenance and support in a respectable manner, the remainder of the said rents being accumulated and massed with the trust-funds, and payable at the dates and under the conditions foresaid."

No. 2.

Feb. 25, 1875. Miller v. Finlay's Trustees

The deed further declared that "this trust shall subsist and continue aye and until the same be wound up, on the shares of the parties interested therein as fiars becoming payable as before mentioned."

Mr Alexander died in December 1851, without leaving any writing fixing the shares of his children in the trust-estate. He was survived by his wife, Mrs Elizabeth Riddell or Alexander, and four children, one of whom, Mary Anne, was married in 1845 to John Finlay, carver and gilder in Glasgow. Three of these children, including Mrs Finlay, were born before the execution of the deed of declaration of trust.

On 28th February 1852 Mr and Mrs Finlay, who had married without an antenuptial contract, executed a postnuptial contract of marriage, whereby, inter alia, they conveyed to themselves and others, as trustees, all right, title, or interest which Mrs Finlay or her husband had or might thereafter have in the succession and estates of her deceased father.

Mr Finlay's estates were sequestrated in 1860, and he died an undischarged bankrupt on 19th March 1872.

Mrs Alexander, who enjoyed the liferent of her husband's trust-estate, died on 8th April 1872, all the four children of the marriage being then alive, and having reached majority.

In 1863 the Theatre Royal was burned down. Mr Alexander's trustees sold the site and ruins, and recovered the sums for which the theatre was insured.

The proceeds formed the fund in medio in the present action of multiplepoinding, which was raised on 16th September 1872 by Mr Galt, who had been appointed judicial factor on the trust-estate in 1865, the acting trustees having resigned without having assumed new trustees.

The one-fourth share of Mr Alexander's trust-estate effeiring to Mrs Finlay was claimed by (1) John Miller, accountant, Glasgow, as trustee on her husband's sequestrated estates; and (2) by the trustees acting under the postnuptial contract between her and her husband.*

Mr and Mrs Finlay's marriage-contract trustees averred:—(Cond. 5.) "The said postnuptial contract was registered in the books of Council and Session on 7th December 1857, and it and the assignation therein contained were duly intimated to the pursuer, as judicial factor foresaid, on 29th November 1865. It was intimated to the trustees of Mr Alexander shortly after the date of the postnuptial marriage-contract, and before the date of Mr Finlay's sequestration; and the claimants concurred with the trustees in various acts connected with the administration and management of Mr Alexander's trust-estate. They also concurred in a lease of the subjects in favour of Mr Edmund Glover, dated 28th July 1852. This lease, as well as the marriage-contract itself, were well known to the trustees of Mr Alexander, and were acted upon and recognised by them in their transactions in regard to the trust-estate."

---

* A litigation took place between the trustee on Mr Finlay's sequestrated estate and the trustees under Mr and Mrs Finlay's postnuptial contract, first, in regard to the fee of a sum due to Mrs Finlay as legitim out of her father's moveable estate—Miller v. Learmonth, H. of L., May 17, 1870, 42 Scot. Jur. 418, L. R. 2 Sc. App. 109; and secondly, with regard to the interest of the said legitim fund during Mr Finlay's life—Learmonth v. Miller, H. of L., May 3, 1875, infra.

No. 2.

Feb. 25, 1875. Miller v. Finlay's Trustees.

Mr Miller denied that the assignation contained in the marriage-contract was intimated to Mr Alexander's trustees, or to the judicial factor, until long after Mr Finlay's sequestration.

Mr Miller pleaded;—(1) Upon a sound construction of the conveyance and relative deed of declaration of trust the interest of the children of Mr and Mrs Alexander under the same vested in them at the date of the said deed, or, at all events, prior to the sequestration of Mr Finlay, and the said interest was and is in law, as it is in fact, moveable. (2) The rights or claims of Mr Finlay, as husband of Mrs Mary Anne Alexander or Finlay, not having been renounced or excluded at the date of their marriage, Mrs Finlay's interest under the said deed of declaration of trust fell absolutely under Mr Finlay's jus mariti, and was carried to the pursuer as trustee on his sequestrated estate, by virtue of his act and warrant. (3) The assignation contained in the postnuptial contract of Mrs Finlay's share or interest under the declaration of trust never having been intimated to the trustees under the declaration of trust, and not having been intimated to the pursuer as judicial factor on the said estate till long after the sequestration of the said John Finlay, no right to Mrs Finlay's said share or interest in competition with the present claimant was conferred on the trustees or beneficiaries under the postnuptial contract.

Mr and Mrs Finlay's marriage-contract trustees maintained that Mrs Finlay's share of the fund in medio had been duly transferred to them by assignation, and also that, being a surrogatum for heritable property, it did not fall under the jus mariti. The only plea, however, dealt with in the present appeal was—(7) The fund in medio not having vested in the children of Mr Alexander until the termination of the liferents, Mrs Finlay's share thereof could not in any view fall under the jus mariti, or be affected by the sequestration of her husband, who predeceased that period.

The Lord Ordinary (Ormidale), on 11th March 1873, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Sustains the claim of Mr and Mrs Finlay's marriage-contract trustees; and repels the competing claim for Mr Miller, the trustee on Mr Finlay's sequestrated estate: Therefore ranks and prefers on the fund in medio the claimants Mr and Mrs Finlay's marriage-contract trustees in terms of their claim, and decerns against the pursuer, the holder of the fund in medio, for payment accordingly: Finds the claimants, Mr and Mrs Finlay's marriage-contract trustees, entitled to the expenses incurred by them in the competition as against said other claimant." *

* "NOTE.— . . . The present dispute relates to the fourth share of the trust-estate falling to Mr Alexander's daughter, Mrs Finlay, who is still alive. Her husband, Mr Finlay, died on 19th March 1872. It is claimed by their marriage-contract trustees in virtue of a postnuptial contract executed by them on 28th February 1852, whereby they conveyed to the claimants all the rights and interests which they then had or might thereafter have in the succession or estates, heritable or moveable, of her (Mrs Finlay's) father, Mr Alexander.

"On the other hand, Mr Finlay having been sequestrated as a bankrupt in 1858, the fund now in question is claimed by Mr Miller, the trustee in the sequestration, for his creditors.

"Which is the preferable claim depends on when it is to be held that Mrs Finlay's share of the trust-property in question vested, and whether it is to be held as moveable or real estate. If it is to be held as of the nature of moveable estate, and as having vested in Mrs Finlay at the date of the declaratory trust-deed in 1830, as was contended for by Mr Miller, or even on the death of Mr Alexander in 1851, as was alternatively contended for by him, it fell to her husband jure mariti, and was carried to the trustee on his sequestrated estate in 1858. If, however, the fund did not vest in Mrs Finlay till the death of her

No. 2.

Feb. 25, 1875.
Miller v. Finlay's Trustees.

Mr Miller reclaimed. On 17th July 1873 the Second Division adhered to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor. *

mother, Mrs Alexander, in 1872, as was contended for by the marriage-contract trustees, or if it is to be held as of the nature of real or heritable estate, as was also contended for by them, it could not fall under the sequestration of Mr Finlay, and could not be carried to Mr Miller as trustee in his sequestration, but, on the contrary, must now belong to the claimants, Mr and Mrs Finlay's marriage-contract trustees.

"The Lord Ordinary, holding the funds or estate in question not to have vested in Mrs Finlay till the death of her mother, Mrs Alexander, in 1872, has preferred the claim of her and her husband's marriage-contract trustees. There are various considerations arising from the terms of the declaratory trust-deed which have led the Lord Ordinary to this conclusion. That deed expressly bears that it was only after the termination of the liferent of Mr and Mrs Alexander that the trustees were to hold the trust-estate for their children; and not only was no beneficial interest in it to be enjoyed by the children or any of them till after the termination of the liferents, but there is a declaration in the deed of great importance, as it appears to the Lord Ordinary, in reference to the question of vesting, not only to the effect that the fee or principal 'of the shares or interest of the children should be payable after the determination of the said liferents,' but also to the effect that such payment should not be made till 'after the whole children who should have survived the said John Henry Alexander and Mrs Elizabeth Riddell or Alexander, and who shall be alive, shall have attained majority, or at such other terms after the determination of said liferents' as shall be fixed by Mr Alexander. Now, although this part of the trust-deed is not very clearly or well expressed, the Lord Ordinary cannot doubt that it was intended to mean, and must be held to mean, that the children were not to have any beneficial enjoyment till after the determination of the liferents, and also that the trust-estate was to be divided amongst the children alone who might survive the liferenters and might be then alive. In short, there is here, the Lord Ordinary thinks, if not a clear and distinctly expressed, a plain and unmistakeable survivorship implied, having reference to the termination of the liferents. And if the Lord Ordinary be right in this view, it must, he thinks, be held to follow, on the principle of the judgment of the House of Lords in Young v. Robertson (February 1862, 4 M'Q., p. 314), that the children's share of the estate in question did not vest till after the determination of the liferents, or, in other words, till the period of distribution. On any other footing it is difficult, or rather impossible, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, to understand that portion of the declaratory deed of trust above referred to and partly quoted, and if so, the reasoning of the noble and learned Lords who took part in the judgment in the case of Young v. Robertson appears to the Lord Ordinary to be as applicable to the present as to that case. And the same principle had been previously given effect to by this Court in Newton v. Thomson and others (27th January 1849), 11 D. 452, where Lord Fullerton expressed an opinion which appears to the Lord Ordinary to have a material bearing on the present case.

"If the Lord Ordinary is right in his view of the question of vesting as now explained, it follows that the fund now in medio could not have fallen to Mrs Finlay's husband jure mariti, or been carried to the trustee in his sequestration, and consequently that it is unnecessary to consider whether it is of the nature of heritable or moveable estate; for whether it is to be held to be the one or the other, if it did not vest till after the determination of the liferents, which occurred at the death of Mrs Alexander on 8th April 1872, it could not have fallen under the jus mariti of Mr Finlay, who had previously died on the 19th of March 1872. And neither, for the same reason, is it necessary to inquire whether Mr and Mrs Finlay's marriage-contract was, or was not, intimated as averred in article V. of the condescendence for the trustees acting under that deed."

* The following opinions were delivered at advising:—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The deed in reference to which the questions before

No. 2. Mr Miller appealed.

Feb. 25, 1875. Miller v. Finlay's Trustees.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords, the circumstances are somewhat peculiar us arise relates to the purchase of a theatre by the late Mr John Alexander with his own funds, and the titles were taken in the name of certain parties as trustees. The deed is not a trust conveyance, but a declaration of trust, and its provisions are of two kinds, which are separate and distinct. In the first place, there is the creation of a real security, for the payment of certain obligations of Mr Alexander, and the estate is to be held by the trustees for that purpose. In this respect the conveyance is only in security, and Alexander is not divested of the radical right. Then, in the second place, there are the provisions contained in the fifth purpose of the deed, in which the trustees declare that they hold the subjects in trust for payment of the free yearly proceeds or rents to Mr Alexander, "during his life for his liferent use allenarly," and after his death, in event of his being survived by Mrs Elizabeth Riddell or Alexander, his spouse, in payment to her "of the free yearly proceeds thereof during her life, for her liferent use allenarly," "and after the determination of the foresaid liferents, in trust for the whole lawful children of the present marriage, ... declaring that the fee or principal of the shares or interest of the said children shall be payable after the determination of the said liferents, and after the whole children who shall have survived the said John Henry Alexander and Mrs Elizabeth Riddell or Alexander, and who shall be alive, shall have attained majority.

Now, under this part of the deed, there are three questions presented to us—(1) Did the declaration of trust divest Alexander of the fee of the estate at all? (2) If he was to any extent divested of the fee, did the shares of any of the children vest from the time of the trustees' infeftment? and (3) Was such share moveable or heritable? This latter question, however, is not now before us.

On the first question I have great doubt whether this deed divests Alexander at all, not because it is not perfectly possible for a parent to divest himself of the fee of his estate during his life, or that in such a case the fee might not vest in the children at once, but because the whole conception of this deed is to retain to Alexander his control over the property. In the first place, there is a joint liferent to himself and his wife, but in reference to the wife's liferent there is the provision that it shall be "restrictable to such extent and in such manner as may be fixed by any probative writing to be subscribed by the said John Henry Alexander, even on death-bed." So it is clear that the wife had no vested interest in the estate, or, at all events, that her interest was subservient to the control of the husband. And in regard to the children's provisions, it is provided that they shall be paid at such time and in such shares and proportions, and under such conditions and provisions, "as shall be fixed and determined by any probative writing subscribed by the said John Henry Alexander." Now, I cannot read these provisions without coming to the conclusion that Alexander intended to keep in his own hand as much power as was compatible with the form of the deed, and I think it very material to observe that the trustees declare that the trust is not for the children until the determination of the liferent, and that until that event they are not in a position to hold the estate for the children. So, is a deed of this kind a deed of divestiture at all? Now, I do not think it necessary to give an absolute opinion on that point, but I think it would be extremely difficult for the children to maintain, in a question with creditors of their father, that he had divested himself of the estate. I think that Alexander retained the radical right.

Then, in regard to the second question, I think that the Lord Ordinary has taken a sound view, and that there was no vesting of the children's shares of the estate until the determination of the liferents,—that is, at the death of Mrs Alexander. Mr Lorimer argued perfectly soundly when he said that a mere power of distribution, or the postponement of the term of payment, will not prevent the fund vesting a morte testatoris. But Mr Lorimer has to shew that this is a case in which the vesting takes place at once. I do not think that it under which this case now comes before you. There is a fund in medio in the Court of Session in an action of multiplepoinding, and that fund is claimed by the present appellant, who is the assignee under a sequestration. The bankrupt, whose assignee he is, and in whose right he claims the fund, is a person of the name of John Finlay, who is now dead. The fund is said to have belonged to John Finlay in right of his wife, who before her marriage with him was Mary Anne Alexander. The right of Mary Anne Alexander arose under a voluntary settlement executed in January 1831 by her father. The property which was the subject of that settlement was a theatre in Glasgow, and, undoubtedly, at the time of the settlement the theatre was heritable property. Now, it is said that by virtue of that settlement and the acts done under it the share which was allotted under the settlement to Mary Anne Alexander became moveable property, and passed to her husband jure mariti, and that the assignee of the husband is now entitled to claim so much of the fund in medio as represents that share. To that statement I must add this, that Mary Anne Alexander having been married to John Finlay in the year 1845, no settlement was executed on the occasion of that marriage, but in the year 1852, on the 28th is so, for payment is directed to be made "after the determination of the liferents, and after the whole children who shall have survived the said John Henry Alexander and Mrs Elizabeth Riddell or Alexander, and who shall be alive, shall have attained majority." That shews that there is no vesting until the termination of the liferents. And what makes this more clear is the fact that there is no certain term of payment fixed, for immediately after the clause which I have just read it is provided alternatively that payment shall be "at such other times after the determination of the said liferents as shall be fixed by the said John Henry Alexander in any writing to be left by him." I do not think there has ever been a case in which vesting has been held to take place under conditions like these.

No. 2.

Feb. 25, 1875. Miller v. Finlay's Trustees.

---

As to the question of survivorship, I agree with the Lord Ordinary that there is clearly a survivorship implied, but it is not necessary to go into details.

I am of opinion that we should adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD COWAN concurred.

LORD BENHOLME.—I concur with the opinions that have been delivered. My judgment is mainly founded on the clause in the trust-deed (which I think is in itself decisive) that the trust in favour of the children is not to commence until the termination of the liferents. The trustees had a power of sale in conjunction with the father, or in conjunction with any persons that he might appoint to concur with him in a sale; but until the sale has been completed in either way it does not appear to me that the nature of the heritable property is affected. It is burdened with two liferents, but it remains heritable until it is sold. No doubt the interest of the children may be vested, and it probably is vested, when the trust in their favour commences, viz., at the termination of the liferents; and it may then be regarded as an interest of a moveable kind. But I am at a loss to see any reason for vesting the interest of the children before the commencement of the trust in their favour. On that view, a share of the fee would vest in each child as soon as it was born, even though it should die before attaining the years of discretion. It is very difficult to hold this view to be correct, for it is not generally regarded as at all desirable in settlements of this kind that the children should be able during their parents' lives to raise money on their future interests. I can see nothing in the deed now before us indicating any intention that the children should be entitled to draw upon their shares of the fee until the termination of the liferent interests of their parents. I therefore cannot but concur in the opinions which have been delivered.

LORD NEAVES concurred.

No. 2.
Feb. 25, 1875.
Miller v. Finlay's Trustees.

of February, a postnuptial settlement was executed between them, which clearly, by the admission of both sides, included the share of Mrs Finlay in the property in question.

Under those circumstances, the questions which naturally would fall to be considered by the Court would be three in point of number, and I think your Lordships will agree with me that the order in which, logically, they ought to be considered would be the order in which I am now about to state them. First, it would require to be ascertained whether the postnuptial settlement which I have mentioned, of the 28th of February 1852, was properly intimated to the trustees who held this property, so as to make it a complete and binding disposition, because, if, by reason of the circumstances under which it was executed, and by reason of proper intimation having followed, it was a complete and binding disposition, it would clearly include the interest of Mrs Finlay whether the property be looked at as heritable or as moveable property. The second question would be, whether the property continued to be, as it was at the time of the original settlement of 1831, heritable, or whether it had been converted into moveable property, because, if it continued heritable, the jus mariti would, as I have said, be excluded. And the third question would be, whether upon the construction of the settlement of 1831 the share in the property settled and provided for Mrs Finlay was vested in her anterior to the time when the persons who were liferenters under that settlement died, or whether the vesting did not take place until the death of the liferenters, because the liferenters being her father and her mother, the survivor of them did not die until the 8th of April 1872, a period subsequent to the death of John Finlay, the bankrupt, and consequently, if the vesting of the share of Mrs Finlay did not take place before the death of the liferenters, there would be nothing to go to her husband jure mariti, and nothing to come to the present appellant as his assignee in bankruptcy.

Out of these three questions only one, and that the third, has been considered or dealt with either by the Lord Ordinary or by the Court of Session. The Lord Ordinary and the Court of Session have considered and determined the question with regard to the vesting; they have determined nothing with regard to the question whether the property was heritable or moveable, or as to whether the postnuptial settlement was binding or not binding; and the interlocutors pronounced, and which are under appeal, merely assert the right to the fund in medio, and repel the claim of the appellant, the assignee in bankruptcy, but do not state the ground upon which the fund in medio is awarded to the respondents and refused to the appellant.

On the question whether the share of Mrs Finlay vested before the death of her parents, I should have thought, but for the respect which I entertain for the opinion of the learned Judges who have taken a different view in the Court below, that the question hardly admitted of doubt or of argument. Certainly, according to our ideas in this country of the construction of instruments of this kind, ideas which have been formed upon a long series of decided cases, the question would hardly appear to be an arguable question, because the settlement, after providing for the interest given by way of liferent to the parents, continues,—"After the determination of the foresaid liferents in trust for the whole lawful children of the present marriage between the said John Henry Alexander and Mrs Elizabeth Riddell or Alexander, in such shares and proportions as shall be fixed and determined by any probative writing subscribed by the said John Henry Alexander as before-mentioned, and failing such writing, then share and share alike"—(I will omit the parenthetical words with regard to the writing to be subscribed by John Henry Alexander, for none such was made, and I will read the sentence without those parenthetical words)—"After the determination of the foresaid liferents in trust for the whole lawful children of the present marriage between the said John Henry Alexander and Mrs Elizabeth Riddell or Alexander," "share and share alike."

No. 2.

Feb. 25, 1875.
Miller v. Finlay's Trustees.

I pause there for the purpose of saying that there is no conveyancer in England, who, if he wished to express a trust which would give to a father and mother life interests with immediate vested remainder to all the children of the marriage alike, could have found words more clear and apposite to express an intention of that kind. They are the apt and appropriate words, according to our ideas, for describing liferent interests, with vested interests in remainder, and under them interests of that kind would vest in the children from time to time as they were born, the first child born taking the whole in remainder, with the interest opening to admit others subsequently born. If nothing more was found, and if a child died under twenty-one in the lifetime of his parents, he or she would have a vested interest which, if not given over to any person else, would go to his representatives. On the other hand, if in the lifetime of his parents the child attained the age of twenty-one, he or she would be able to make arrangements with regard to that portion of the property on marriage or otherwise, as property in which the interest of the child was absolutely vested.

Now, that being so, is there anything in the words which follow which in any way qualifies or puts a different construction upon the words which I have read? It appears to me that the words which follow are words which merely point to the manner of payment and the division of the fund or property in question,—"Declaring that the fee or principal of the shares or interest of the said children shall be payable after the determination of the said liferents." Who are "the said children" mentioned there? "The whole lawful children of the marriage" between the father and the mother. Therefore the sentence reads thus,—"The fee or principal of the shares, or interest of the whole lawful children of the marriage, shall be payable after the determination of the liferents." If any of them had died before, it would be payable of course to their representatives. But what of those who survived? The sentence continues,—"And after the whole children who shall have survived the said John Henry Alexander and Mrs Elizabeth Riddell or Alexander, and who shall be alive, shall have attained majority"—(I pass over again parenthetical words relating to an appointment, none having been made)—"it being hereby provided that after the determination of the said liferents it shall be in the power of the trustees, or a majority of them, to make payment to the said children, yearly, of such part of the free proceeds or rents of the trust-subjects as shall, in their discretion, be necessary for their maintenance and support in a respectable manner, the remainder of the said rents being accumulated and massed with the trust-funds, and payable at the dates and under the conditions foresaid."

I read this as a direction, the consequence of which would be, that if there were children alive after the death of the parents, some of whom or all of whom might be under age, there was to be no absolute division until the youngest had attained the age of twenty-one, but there was to be a power on the part of the trustees to use the income of the various shares, so far as in their discretion it appeared to be necessary, for the maintenance of those who could not, during that interval, receive the principal. That is perfectly consistent with the possibility of there having been children who might have predeceased their parents, and who, in that case, would not be there to be maintained, but whose representatives would be entitled at the period of the division to the absolute payment of their shares.

No. 2.
Feb. 25, 1875.
Miller v. Finlay's Trustees.

My Lords, I have said that, in this country, that would, in my opinion, have been the interpretation of the words, and I may point out to your Lordships that that interpretation, as it appears to me, satisfies the meaning of every single word in the whole of these sentences. It also accords with that which now has been in this country a cardinal rule of construction, namely, that where you find interests given to a class, but the payment postponed for the purpose of letting in preceding life interests, the interests so given in remainder are vested immediately, and are not postponed until the time of the payment. Is there any difference between the law of Scotland and the law of England upon that point? The construction which I have submitted to your Lordships does not depend upon any technical rules either of feudal law or of English conveyancing. It depends upon the ordinary construction of ordinary words, and upon the plain consideration of the exigencies which, upon a settlement of this kind, are naturally supposed to lead to the form in which the provision for a family is made. In the case of Young v. Robertson[1] it was held by your Lordships, that there was no technical difference between the law of England and the law of Scotland upon the construction of clauses of this kind, but that the clauses were to receive their natural meaning according to the plain principles of interpretation, whether the settlement was an English settlement or a Scotch settlement.

Upon what ground in this case has it been held that this should not be the construction placed upon the settlement? Not upon the ground of authority, for the only authority cited was the case to which I have referred, namely, Young v. Robertson. That is no authority at all for the decision arrived at by the Court of Session, for in the case of Young v. Robertson there was that which there is not here, namely, a provision in favour of survivors, which required you at once to determine the period at which the survivorship was to take place, and to hold that those only who were alive at that period could take. And your Lordships will observe that which, as it appears to me, accounts in some degree for the decision arrived at by the learned Judges in the Court below, namely, that the Lord Justice-Clerk, and, I think, Lord Benholme also, and the Lord Ordinary, appear to be of opinion that there is something in the form of this settlement which operates as a gift to the children by way of survivorship at the death of the liferenters. My Lords, I can find no such words. The words of the trust and the gift are, as I have already said, to "the whole lawful children." The introduction of the term "survivor" is in a different clause and for a different purpose, namely, to provide with regard to those children surviving who might be under the age of twenty-one, that they should not receive payment until they attained their full age.

I am, therefore, notwithstanding the great respect which I feel for the united authority of the learned Judges in the Court below, compelled to advise your

[1] Young v. Robertson, Feb. 14, 1862, 4 Macq. 314, 34 Scot. Jur.

No. 2.

Feb. 25, 1875.
Miller v. Finlay's Trustees.

Lordships to hold that there is in this case a vested interest in all the children of the settlors, including the wife of the bankrupt, Mrs Finlay.

That being so, the third of the three questions which I pointed out to your Lordships as being the questions in the case, ought, in my opinion, to have been determined in favour of the appellant, and adversely to the respondents.

But will that dispose of the whole case? Certainly not. There remain the first and the second questions which I have mentioned, and upon which we have no decision and no opinion of the Court below. It would be extremely inconvenient, and I think it would be contrary to your Lordships' general practice, if you were now to have those questions fully argued before you, and to arrive at an opinion upon them as a Court of first instance without having the benefit of the opinion of the learned Judges upon these questions, one or both of which may, to a considerable extent, depend upon considerations of Scotch law. I should, therefore, humbly recommend your Lordships not to determine either of those other questions, but, finding that so far as the Court below has gone, and upon the question which alone they have entertained, your Lordships are unable to agree with them, I should submit to your Lordships that the case should go back to the Court of Session in order that upon the two other questions I have mentioned we may have the benefit of the opinion of the learned Judges of that Court. Those two questions are, whether the property continued to be heritable, or had become by conversion (to use an English term) moveable property; and whether the postnuptial settlement had been intimated to the trustees of the original settlement so as to make that postnuptial settlement a binding instrument as against the property, whatever might be its character.

I should therefore recommend your Lordships that the course should be taken in this case which was taken in the case of Lord Fife v. Duff,[1] in the year 1861, where a similar remit was made, namely, that an order should be made in this form:—[His Lordship here suggested the order given infra, p. 13.]

Lord Chelmsford concurred.

Lord Hatherley.—My Lords, I concur entirely in the proposal which has been made by the Lord Chancellor as to the manner in which this case should now be dealt with.

The only point which we have had before us for our consideration, and the only point which has been decided in the Court below, has been the point with reference to the period at which the interest of the children was to be treated as a vested interest. Upon that point I have been compelled, like my noble and learned friends who have preceded me, to come to a conclusion contrary to that which was come to by the Court below. It appears to me that the very plain and distinct declaration of trust as to the persons in whom the property shall vest cannot be over-ridden by a direction given in a subsequent part of the settlement after the gift has been made to the children as to what is to be done in the event of any of those objects of the settlement being minors at the time of the death of the survivor of Mr and Mrs Alexander. The limitation to the children is absolute after the determination of the liferents, one of which liferents might be determined by the second marriage of Mrs Alexander. At that time, whenever the liferents determined, there is a strict declaration of trust for [1] Earl of Fife v. Duff, July 19, 1861, 33 Scot. Jur. 715 (see p. 718).

No. 2.

Feb. 25, 1875.
Miller v. Finlay's Trustees.

the "whole lawful children" of the marriage between Mr and Mrs Alexander. And although that expression might in itself have been supposed, but for a long current of authorities, to have created some doubt as to the exact period of the vesting, it has been distinctly settled long ago that where a limitation which might seem to point to a different period of vesting than the immediate operation of the instrument is in effect only a postponing of the interest in possession of the persons in whose favour the settlement is made until after the determination of a previous life estate, in that case the interest in remainder is held to be vested at once from the execution of the instrument.

Here, therefore, there is a perfectly plain and clear trust in the first part of the instrument for all the children at the determination of the liferents, which would determine either by the death of Mr Alexander and the death of Mrs Alexander, or by the death of Mr Alexander and the second marriage of Mrs Alexander. The words which we find afterwards are simply owing to the view which had occurred to the testator that some of the objects of his bounty might be infants at the period of the decease of himself and his wife. Therefore he says that the property, the fee or principal of the shares, shall be payable after the determination of the liferents, and after the whole of the children who shall have survived Mr and Mrs Alexander, and who shall be alive, shall have attained majority. He contemplates that some may possibly die under age in the lifetime of himself and his wife, and that some may be alive after the death of the survivor of the two, and still be under age. If they die before their parents, then this declaration will not take effect, because it says, "who shall be alive" at the time the distribution is to be made. As soon as all are cleared away (and with regard to this particular direction the period of payment is distinguished from the period of vesting), either by predeceasing their parents or by attaining the age of twenty-one, then there shall be, not a gift of the principal, but a division of the principal. The period for the division of the principal is pointed out solely with regard to the particular circumstance of some of the children being under twenty-one, and therefore not in a condition to receive or give discharges for the share of the principal to which, together with their brothers and sister, they would become entitled, namely, the first gift at the time of the determination of the previous life interests.

Lord Selborne.—I agree in what has been proposed to your Lordships.

It was argued by the respondents' counsel that the conditions of survivorship and attainment of majority were here of the substance of the gift. But the sole foundation for that argument was the occurrence of the mention of the survivorship of certain children, and the attainment of their majority, not in any clause either giving interests or defining the conditions upon which interests were given, but in a clause defining the period of time at which interests already given, and given in clear terms to all the children, should be payable or transferable. With regard to the clause which follows, as to the application of income during the interval between the termination of the liferents and the attainment of majority by the children supposed to be then under age, I see no reason at all to differ from the view which, as I understood my noble and learned friend upon the woolsack, is taken by him, that that is a clause to be applied according to the shares of the children, and not so as to make the income of one share applicable to the maintenance of children not entitled to the capital. But I have no hesitation in saying (that being a question which your Lordships are not called upon to decide), that if it were clearly the other way, and if this trust had been to apply the whole of the income of the entire trust-estate to the maintenance and education of those children only who were minors at the death of the last liferenter, to the exclusion of all children then adult from all benefit of the income until the attainment of majority by the youngest living child, I should still think that such a trust of intermediate income would neither suspend the vesting of the shares of the children who were entitled, subject thereto, to the capital of the trust-estate, nor be of itself evidence, apart from the other clauses in the deed, that those children only who survived the last liferenter, and were at that time under age, were entitled to participate in the capital.

The only other point upon which I think it necessary to make a single observation is the question with reference to the effect of the marriage-settlement. I entirely concur with the terms of the proposed remit which has been mentioned by my noble and learned friend upon the woolsack, but I do not understand your Lordships to mean to express any opinion at all upon the question whether intimation was or was not necessary. That, as well as all other questions connected with the effect of the deed, I apprehend your Lordships desire to have considered and determined by the Court of Session.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords, perhaps it may be as well that I should say that I quite agree with my noble and learned friend, and that in anything that fell from me I did not for a moment desire to assume that intimation would be found to be necessary. My only desire was that the whole of that question should be considered by the Court of Session.

THE order pronounced by the House was as follows:—"Ordered, by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, that the cause be, and the same is hereby remitted back to the said Second Division of the Court of Session in Scotland to review generally the interlocutors complained of, and if, in their opinion, a proof shall appear to be necessary in reference to the allegation of intimation of the postnuptial settlement of the 28th of February 1852, and to the other alleged facts and circumstances following said allegation, all contained in article 5 of the condescendence of the respondents, the marriage-contract trustees, then to allow such proof, and to report their opinions on the whole case to this House: And this House does not think fit to pronounce any judgment upon the said appeal until after the said interlocutors shall have been so reviewed, and the opinions thereupon shall have been reported according to the direction of this order."

LOCH & MACLAURIN—GIBSON & FERGUSON, W.S.—WILLIAM ROBERTSON—JOHN GALLETLY, S.S.C.

No. 2.
Feb. 25, 1875.
Miller v. Finlay's Trustees.

the "whole lawful children" of the marriage between Mr and Mrs Alexander. And although that expression might in itself have been supposed, but for a long current of authorities, to have created some doubt as to the exact period of the vesting, it has been distinctly settled long ago that where a limitation which might seem to point to a different period of vesting than the immediate operation of the instrument is in effect only a postponing of the interest in possession of the persons in whose favour the settlement is made until after the determination of a previous life estate, in that case the interest in remainder is held to be vested at once from the execution of the instrument.

Here, therefore, there is a perfectly plain and clear trust in the first part of the instrument for all the children at the determination of the liferents, which would determine either by the death of Mr Alexander and the death of Mrs Alexander, or by the death of Mr Alexander and the second marriage of Mrs Alexander. The words which we find afterwards are simply owing to the view which had occurred to the testator that some of the objects of his bounty might be infants at the period of the decease of himself and his wife. Therefore he says that the property, the fee or principal of the shares, shall be payable after the determination of the liferents, and after the whole of the children who shall have survived Mr and Mrs Alexander, and who shall be alive, shall have attained majority. He contemplates that some may possibly die under age in the lifetime of himself and his wife, and that some may be alive after the death of the survivor of the two, and still be under age. If they die before their parents, then this declaration will not take effect, because it says, "who shall be alive" at the time the distribution is to be made. As soon as all are cleared away (and with regard to this particular direction the period of payment is distinguished from the period of vesting), either by predeceasing their parents or by attaining the age of twenty-one, then there shall be, not a gift of the principal, but a division of the principal. The period for the division of the principal is pointed out solely with regard to the particular circumstance of some of the children being under twenty-one, and therefore not in a condition to receive or give discharges for the share of the principal to which, together with their brothers and sister, they would become entitled, namely, the first gift at the time of the determination of the previous life interests.

LORD SELBORNE.—I agree in what has been proposed to your Lordships.

It was argued by the respondents' counsel that the conditions of survivorship and attainment of majority were here of the substance of the gift. But the sole foundation for that argument was the occurrence of the mention of the survivorship of certain children, and the attainment of their majority, not in any clause either giving interests or defining the conditions upon which interests were given, but in a clause defining the period of time at which interests already given, and given in clear terms to all the children, should be payable or transferable. With regard to the clause which follows, as to the application of income during the interval between the termination of the liferents and the attainment of majority by the children supposed to be then under age, I see no reason at all to differ from the view which, as I understood my noble and learned friend upon the woolsack, is taken by him, that that is a clause to be applied according to the shares of the children, and not so as to make the income of one share applicable to the maintenance of children not entitled to the capital. But I have no hesitation in saying (that being a question which your Lordships are not called upon to decide), that if it were clearly the other way, and if this trust had been to apply the whole of the income of the entire trust-estate to the maintenance and education of those children only who were minors at the death of the last liferenter, to the exclusion of all children then adult from all benefit of the income until the attainment of majority by the youngest living child, I should still think that such a trust of intermediate income would neither suspend the vesting of the shares of the children who were entitled, subject thereto, to the capital of the trust-estate, nor be of itself evidence, apart from the other clauses in the deed, that those children only who survived the last liferenter, and were at that time under age, were entitled to participate in the capital.

No. 2.

Feb. 25, 1875.
Miller v. Finlay's Trustees.

The only other point upon which I think it necessary to make a single observation is the question with reference to the effect of the marriage-settlement. I entirely concur with the terms of the proposed remit which has been mentioned by my noble and learned friend upon the woolsack, but I do not understand your Lordships to mean to express any opinion at all upon the question whether intimation was or was not necessary. That, as well as all other questions connected with the effect of the deed, I apprehend your Lordships desire to have considered and determined by the Court of Session.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords, perhaps it may be as well that I should say that I quite agree with my noble and learned friend, and that in anything that fell from me I did not for a moment desire to assume that intimation would be found to be necessary. My only desire was that the whole of that question should be considered by the Court of Session.

THE order pronounced by the House was as follows:—"Ordered, by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, that the cause be, and the same is hereby remitted back to the said Second Division of the Court of Session in Scotland to review generally the interlocutors complained of, and if, in their opinion, a proof shall appear to be necessary in reference to the allegation of intimation of the postnuptial settlement of the 28th of February 1852, and to the other alleged facts and circumstances following said allegation, all contained in article 5 of the condescendence of the respondents, the marriage-contract trustees, then to allow such proof, and to report their opinions on the whole case to this House: And this House does not think fit to pronounce any judgment upon the said appeal until after the said interlocutors shall have been so reviewed, and the opinions thereupon shall have been reported according to the direction of this order."

LOCH & MACLAURIN—GIBSON & FERGUSON, W.S.—WILLIAM ROBERTSON—JOHN GALLETLY, S.S.C.

No. 3.

Feb. 26, 1875.
Barr & Shearer v. Cooper.

BARR AND SHEARER (Defenders), Appellants.—Cotton, Q.C.—Watkins Williams, Q.C.

WILLIAM EDWARD COOPER AND MANDATARIES (Pursuers), Respondents.—John Pearson, Q.C.—Mackintosh.

Ship—Lien for Repairs—Possession.—A vessel was placed in a patent slip belonging to a firm of shipbuilders for repair. When certain outside repairs were completed she was removed by the shipbuilders, for their own convenience, into a public wet dock, into which the patent slip opened, and the repairs were there completed, the vessel being attached to pawls situated within the premises of the shipbuilders, and lying close to their slip. From time to time the vessel was moved for the convenience of those using the slip at the order of the harbour-master, but chiefly by the shipbuilders' men. During the whole time the master was present in the ship during the day, and at night a ship-keeper. Held (rev. judgment of the First Division), that the possession of the ship, and the resulting lien for the cost of repairs, which the shipbuilders had while it remained in their slip, did not cease when the vessel was removed by them to the public dock.

Ld. Chancellor (Cairns).
Ld. Chelmsford.
Ld. Hatherley.
Ld. Selborne.

(IN the Court of Session, June 6, 1873, 11 Macph. 651, 45 Scot. Jur. 408).

This action was brought in the Court of Session by W. E. Cooper, as mortgagee of the barque "Joan Cunllo" of Aberystwith, against Barr and Shearer, shipbuilders at Ardrossan, concluding for delivery to the pursuer in virtue of his mortgage of the said ship, described as "at present lying in the defenders' patent slip at Ardrossan," and in the event of their failure to do so for payment of £3000.

The owner of the ship, Mr Lewis, in September 1872, had put her into the hands of the defenders to have certain repairs done, and by them she was put on their patent slip in their shipbuilding yard, which opens into the public wet dock in the harbour of Ardrossan. After a portion of the repairs had been executed she was removed from the slip to the wet dock by the defenders to make room for another vessel. When launched into it she was, by the orders of the deputy harbour-master, removed to a berth at the north side of the dock opposite the patent slip. She lay there for a few hours, and then, because the master persuaded the harbour-master, for the convenience of the carpenters, to have her shifted, she was removed, chiefly by the shipbuilders' men, to a berth at the foot of the slip, where she lay moored by her own ropes to pawls within the premises of the defenders. From time to time the vessel was moored for the convenience of those using the slip at the order of the harbour-master, but chiefly by the shipbuilders' men. The repairs were completed while the vessel lay in the dock. While the repairs were proceeding, the master was in the ship during the day, and a ship-keeper at night. After the repairs were completed, the shipbuilders replaced the vessel on the slip and detained her.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The pursuer, in virtue of the mortgage libelled, is entitled to possession of the ship or barque thereby mortgaged, and to sell the same in payment of his debt preferably to all other creditors. (2) The defenders, having lost their lien or retention over said vessel, are not entitled to withhold delivery thereof from the pursuer.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) In respect of the defenders having executed the said alterations and repairs upon the said "Joan Cunllo" they have a lien or right of retention over her, preferable to any right which the pursuer has as mortgagee, and, in virtue of their said lien or right of retention the defenders are entitled to retain possession of her until their said account is paid.

A proof was led before the Lord Ordinary, in which the facts above narrated were proved.

The Lord Ordinary (Gifford), on 11th March 1873, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds it sufficiently instructed in point of fact,—First, That the defenders, Messrs Barr and Shearer, were employed by Thomas Lewis of Walcott, Bath, the owner of the ship or barque 'Joan Cunllo' of Aberystwith, and who was in possession and management of the said ship, to execute certain repairs upon the said ship; Second, That under and in virtue of this employment the defenders, Messrs Barr and Shearer, obtained possession of the said ship or barque, and placed her upon their slip at Ardrossan for the purpose of executing the said repairs, or part thereof; Third, That under the said employment the defenders, Messrs Barr and Shearer, executed extensive repairs upon the said ship, in respect of which a large account is now due to them; Fourth, That the defenders, Messrs Barr and Shearer, never gave up, surrendered, or lost possession of the said ship or barque, but that they still retain possession thereof in security of the payment of their said account for repairs and work executed thereon: Finds in point of law that the defenders, Messrs Barr and Shearer, have a valid and effectual lien over the said ship or barque, or a right to retain the same in security of their said account, and finds that the pursuer is not entitled to demand or enforce possession of the said ship or barque without paying or securing the said debt due to the defenders; and to the above effect sustains the defenders' pleas, and assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the action, and decerns: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses," &c.

No. 3.
Feb. 26, 1875.
Barr & Shearer v. Cooper.

The pursuer reclaimed.

This interlocutor was pronounced by the First Division on 6th June 1873:—"Recall the interlocutor: Repel the defences, and decern and ordain the defenders forthwith to deliver to the pursuer the barque 'Joan Cunllo,' at present lying on the defenders' patent slip at Ardrossan, and that at the sight of Archibald Steele, harbour-master of Ardrossan: Authorise interim extract of the decree, and dispense with the minute-book: Find the defenders liable in expenses; allow an account," &c.

The defenders appealed.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—The question which your Lordships have to deal with in this case is in reality a question of fact, but it is a question involving considerations interesting not only to the litigants in the present appeal, but generally to those who are concerned in the management of property such as that which forms the conspicuous feature in this case. The question which is raised is not whether the shipbuilders in this case had at one time a lien for the repairs of the ship which was in their hands, but whether, by the circumstances which at a later period occurred, they lost or abandoned that lien which they once possessed.

The narrative of the facts which require to be looked at may be compressed into a very moderate compass. The owner of the ship tells us that the circumstances under which the ship originally came to Ardrossan for repairs were these. He says,—"She had been on a voyage to the West Indies, and on her return I made arrangements for having her repaired by Barr and Shearer of Ardrossan. I accompanied the vessel to Ardrossan, along with the captain who had taken her to the West Indies, on the 17th of September 1872. Before taking her to Ardrossan I had some conversation with Mr Cooper in London with reference to the repairs. I stated to him that the ship had come off her class, and that I wanted her to be re-classed. He was against it, but I could do nothing with the ship unless she had a class, and therefore I made up my mind that I would have her repaired myself." The repairs would therefore be not inconsiderable, but they would be repairs that would enable the ship to be

No. 3.

Feb. 26, 1875.
Barr & Shearer
v. Cooper.

re-classed, as she had been classed before, A1 at Lloyd's. "The vessel," he continues, "was not put upon Barr and Shearer's patent slip immediately on her arrival at Ardrossan. She lay in the public wet dock waiting her turn, and was put upon the slip on the 3d October."

I should be unwilling to rest any important argument upon a critical consideration of the words in the condescendence, but I own that it appears to me that the condescendence properly describes the conclusion which is to be drawn from the statement of the owner that I have read, for the condescendence says,—"In the course of the month of September last the ship or barque was, by the orders and instructions of Thomas Lewis, and without the knowledge and consent of the pursuer, put into the hands of the defenders, Messrs Barr and Shearer, who are shipbuilders and ship smiths at Ardrossan, to have certain repairs done; and in order that she might be duly overhauled and repaired the defenders placed her on their patent slip in their shipbuilding yard, which opens into the public wet dock at the harbour of Ardrossan."

It is admitted upon all sides that, the repairs having been done, there was a lien as long as the ship was upon the slip for those repairs. Bur I refer to this evidence and this averment in the condescendence for the purpose of submitting to your Lordships that the natural and proper conclusion from those statements is, not that the lien arose in consequence merely of the ship being placed upon the slip, but that she was placed before that in the hands of Barr and Shearer for repairs, that she was handed over to them for that purpose, and that it was by reason of their having thus received the possession and the control of the ship that they were able to place, and that they did place, the ship upon their slip for the purpose of repair.

I may remind your Lordships of one very important fact with regard to the possession of this ship when she was upon the slip. During the whole of that time we are informed that the captain or master of the ship was residing at Ardrossan, and was in the habit of going to the ship and superintending the repairs that were going on, spending the whole or the greater part of each day upon the ship. Your Lordships also find that during the whole or a part of that time there was a mate who seems to have been occupied in much the same way. But in addition to the captain and the mate there was a care-taker sleeping on board the ship, and the purpose for which he was doing so is thus described in the evidence. Thomas Lewis says,—"I know for certain there was a ship-keeper constantly on the ship to watch against damage." I think your Lordships will consider it important to bear in mind these circumstances in the further history of the case. At the time when undoubtedly the ship was in the possession of Messrs Barr and Shearer, the shipbuilders, when it was in their hands and when a lien subsisted for the repairs, you have the master and the mate frequenting the ship and superintending the repairs, and a ship-keeper sleeping on board the ship to watch against damage. Those persons, the captain, the mate, and the keeper, were not there for the purpose of keeping possession of the ship; the possession was the possession of Barr and Shearer. But that possession was consistent with the presence of those three servants of the owner, who were there for the double purpose of superintending the repairs and watching against damage.

Well, my Lords, the ship left the slip on the 15th of November. Why did she leave the slip at that time? Was it because the owner asked for her? because the owner required possession of her? because the builders informed

No. 3.
Feb. 26, 1875.
Barr & Shearer v. Cooper.

the owner that the time had arrived when they had completed the repairs and that they wanted to give up possession of the ship? My Lords, it was for no reason of that kind. We are informed by the owner that he was anxious that she should have remained on the slip, and that he asked the builders to keep her there for some days longer, but that they informed him that they required the slip for the purpose of placing another ship upon it, and that the remaining repairs could be done as they were in the habit of doing them, as the harbour-master says, in the wet dock. Therefore it was not for the purpose of giving up possession to the owner that the ship was removed from the slip. Then, when she was removed from the slip, was anything said to the owner or to the servants of the owner, indicating the intention of Barr and Shearer to alter the possession of the ship? Nothing was said; not a word is reported to have passed between Barr and Shearer and either the owner or any of the servants of the owner upon the subject. Then into whose hands was the ship given when she left the slip? There, again, your Lordships have evidence which is uncontroverted. In the first place, the owner himself tells us,—"When she was put off the slip Barr and Shearer's men were finishing the small jobs on board of her. They continued to work on board after she was put off just as they had done before. I believe there were three or four of them, and then they were reduced to two, and at last to one. (Q.) From the time she was off the slip till you went to London who directed where she should be moored? (A.) The deputy harbour-master has the control, and can compel the captain of any ship to move about as he thinks proper. I gave no directions as to where the ship was to be moved to. I do not know what the captain did. The mate did not, so far as I know. The ship-keeper was obliged to act according to the deputy harbour-master's instructions."

What does the deputy harbour-master say? And he, my Lords, is a witness for the respondents in the case. The deputy harbour-master says,—"I saw her launched" (that is from the slip) "and took her under my orders as soon as she was afloat. When she came off, the master asked me where he would take her, and I told him to take her to the north side, right opposite the slip. He took her over, but asked me to give her a more convenient berth, and I told him that as soon as I could get another schooner upon the patent slip I would lay her across there again. By and by I let her across, about four o'clock in the afternoon. The vessel had come off about ten o'clock. At four o'clock she was moored off the patent slip. She lay there about a week, and then I ordered her to be removed to the south-west corner of the dock. Her stern ropes were moored to the pawls between the graving dock and the patent slip. I am in the way of mooring vessels, loaded and unloaded, to the pawls. All the vessels which lie in the same berth are moored to those pawls. When we cannot get over the gate we have access to the pawls by steps from the dock just at the corner of the patent slip. The vessel remained a considerable time at the south-west corner. I cannot say how long. She remained till she was on the slip again."

Therefore, from the time she left the slip till the time she came back to the slip she was not under the orders of the master or of any servant of the owner. Where she was moored to depended on the orders of the deputy harbour-master, and the owner of the ship does not profess to say that any servant of his, either by his orders or without his orders, took any control whatever over the ship. Now, my Lords, during that time, when she was thus not handed over to the owner, or to any servant of the owner, for the purpose of control or direction, what was being done to the ship? The workmen of Barr and Shearer were on board of her, concluding the repairs that were to be done as a whole, and not as individual items, just as they had been before. And your Lordships are told by the harbour-master, Archibald Steele, that "Barr and Shearer sometimes complete the repairs on vessels in the wet dock—in that case, the vessels are sometimes moored in one place and sometimes in another. The usual place is across the mouth of the slip, which is the most convenient place for them." Further than that, during the whole of this time the vessel occupied two positions only, one across the mouth of the slip, and the other on the south side of the graving dock. On both of those occasions, in both of those berths, she was moored by hawsers to pawls which were inside the premises of Barr and Shearer. And your Lordships have the uncontradicted evidence of two of the servants of Barr and Shearer, that it was their duty, and their orders were to attend to the moorings of the ship and see that no persons disturbed those moorings and fastenings by which she was attached to the premises of Barr and Shearer.

No. 3.

Feb. 26, 1875.
Barr & Shearer v. Cooper.

I suppose it will not be disputed that, if at the time this ship came off the slip of Barr and Shearer she had been slid down, not into a public wet dock, but into a private wet dock of Barr and Shearer, no question could have arisen as to any alteration in the possession or the lien. But, my Lords, is there any authority to say, if a tradesman has delivered to him a chattel for the purpose of repairs, and he executes a portion of those repairs upon his own premises, and then passes the chattel, for a temporary purpose, and for the continuance of those repairs, on to some public thoroughfare or highway abutting upon and adjacent to his premises, and continues to execute the repairs upon the chattel then and there, that, because he has passed it for this purpose out of his own private premises on to this public piece of ground, he therefore has lost the lien which up to that time he had? because that must be the proposition upon which alone the decision of the Court of Session can be maintained.

Now, when I look at the opinion of the learned Judges of the Court of Session what I find is this. If I do not mistake, the learned Judges lay down these three propositions. They say, with regard to a ship in a public harbour or a maritime highway, repairs executed upon a ship under such circumstances confer no lien. Very probably they do not. I should be disposed to say prima facie, in the absence of some countervailing circumstances, that they do not. But I am not prepared to say that, even there, there may not be circumstances indicating such a transmission of the ship, such a handing over of the ship to the workmen, that there may arise a lien for repairs. That is not a question to be decided now, and I only guard against being supposed to have expressed an opinion upon it, but I accept the opinion of the Court that prima facie, in that condition of things, there is not a lien for repairs.

Then say the learned Judges, secondly, there was a lien for repairs by virtue of the presence of the ship upon the private slip of Messrs Barr and Shearer; but they say, thirdly, seeing that at a later period the ship was moved into a public dock—a public highway—inasmuch as originally there could not have been a lien on the ship for repairs effected on the ship while in that public dock, the moment she gets into the public dock from the slip, the lien which existed while she was upon the slip ceases, and no lien whatever continues to attach. My Lords, it is to that conclusion in that third proposition that I must venture

No. 3.

Feb. 26, 1875.
Barr & Shearer
v. Cooper.

most respectfully to object. I cannot follow the conclusion of the learned Judges. I think it is a question of fact and of the circumstances of the case, and it appears to me that the circumstances of the present case clearly shew that this ship was originally handed over, in the literal sense of that expression, to the builders for repair. She was taken possession of by them as was intended, and she was placed upon their slip. In that state of things a lien attached and was maturing, and that lien did not cease when, for the limited purpose which I have described and under the circumstances which I have mentioned, she was moved off the slip for the completion of the repairs in a part of the public harbour adjacent to the premises of the builders.

My Lords, I humbly submit to your Lordships that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary is a satisfactory and correct expression of the facts and the law of this case; that that interlocutor ought to be restored, and that the interlocutor of the Court of Session ought to be reversed.

LORD CHELMSFORD.—My Lords, it is agreed that the question before us is one entirely of fact. If the learned Judges of the Court of Session had dealt with the case entirely on that footing I cannot help thinking that their determination would have been different. But they thought that there was some rule of law which compelled them, with expressed reluctance, to decide against the appellants.

The question is whether, the appellants having originally a lien on the ship for their repairs, they relinquished their possession and so lost their lien.

The ship, as stated by the pursuer in his condescendence, was put into the hands of the appellants for the purpose of repairs. Now, the owner must have intended to give the appellants such possession of the ship as was necessary for the purpose of repairs, and he must have known that part of the repairs could only be properly effected upon their slip. It is admitted that while the ship was upon the slip the appellants had a possession upon which the lien attached. Now, was this possession ever abandoned? It is contended by the respondents that the moment the ship left the slip and touched the water of the wet dock the appellants' possession was gone. But it certainly was not the intention of the appellants to give up the possession of the ship to the owner, because when it was put into their hands it was handed over to them in order that they might complete the repairs which were then unfinished. Why was it that the ship was removed from the slip? Not for the purpose of parting with the possession, but in order to make room for another vessel on the slip. So far from parting with the possession, all things continued as before with respect to the repairs for which the possession was originally given. The ship, after leaving the slip, was removed from opposite the appellants' shipyard to another part of the wet dock by the orders of the harbour-master, and was afterwards removed back and attached to pawls on the appellants' premises. The removal by order of the harbour-master cannot be considered as a relinquishment of the possession, as it was not the voluntary act of the appellants. And as to the captain of the vessel being on board, it was a necessary precaution to have present a person skilled to direct any movement of the ship ordered by the harbour-master. All things continued in the same state from the beginning to the end, and, with the exception of five or six hours after the ship left the slip, the appellants literally kept hold of the ship.

Treating the question as one of fact, I can come to no other conclusion than that the removal of the ship from the slip for the purpose of continuing the repairs in the wet dock was no relinquishment by the appellants of their possession, and that their lien was not lost. Therefore I agree with my noble and learned friend that the interlocutor appealed from must be reversed.

No. 3. Feb. 26, 1875. Barr & Shearer v. Cooper.

LORD HATHERLEY.—I entirely concur in the views which have been already expressed to your Lordships by my noble and learned friends.

It appears to me that the law may be taken to be very well laid down in the passage from Chief-Justice Abbott's Treatise on Shipping, where he says—"A shipwright, indeed, who has taken a ship into his own possession to repair it, may not be bound to part with the possession until he is paid for the repairs, any more than a tailor, smith, or other artificer in regard to the object of his particular trade, unless there be a special agreement to give credit for a certain period, or such a usage in the trade as is equivalent to a special agreement. But a shipwright who has once parted with the possession of the ship, or has worked upon it without taking possession, and a tradesman who has provided ropes, sails, provisions, or other necessaries for a ship, are not by the law of England preferred to other creditors, nor have any particular claim or lien upon the ship."

I apprehend that the case which has been referred to of work done on a ship in a public river or other public water, not conferring a lien, must apply entirely to that class of cases in which the shipowner, or the master in charge of the ship, wishing to have certain repairs done, for the execution of which repairs it is not necessary that the ship should be taken into dock for the purpose of being repaired there by the shipwrights upon their own premises, may send to his shipwrights, and enter into an agreement by contract with them that certain work shall be done upon the ship, and for that purpose may require that they shall come on board the ship, or send the proper number of workmen, qualified to do the work, on board the ship, in order to effect the repairs. If the ship be in that state in an open river, and all that is done by the shipwrights is, at the summons of their employer, to go on board the ship and execute these repairs, there is no taking possession of the ship in any sense—there is no handing over of the ship to them, or placing of it in their hands, for the purpose of repair—and one can easily understand how it may have been said, in such a case as that, that there was no lien.

The whole matter reduces itself to the question, in the first place, whether possession has been taken of the ship. In the consideration of that question we are certainly very much assisted by what is stated in the condescendence, though I agree with my noble and learned friend on the woolsack in saying that I should be sorry if it rested only upon that. However, we are assisted in our inquiry by the view taken by the persons who prepared the condescendence of what had been really done in this case, namely, that the ship had been put into the hands of these shipwrights to repair. But it does not rest upon the condescendence, because the facts, which are scarcely disputed, so bear out that view that it has hardly been thought necessary on the part of the respondents to contest it. It is not disputed—I may say it is admitted—that at all events at the period when the vessel was upon the slip the time had arrived in which possession had been taken. Therefore that which Chief-Justice Abbott in his treatise says the law requires in order to give a lien had been done. The first step had been taken—possession was taken.

The matter, therefore, is now reduced to the simple question whether possession was ever abandoned. What trace have we, from one end of the case to the other, of possession being abandoned by the shipwrights? It is alleged that possession was abandoned the moment she left the shipwrights' premises (that is the only moment of time that could possibly have been fixed on), the moment she descended from the slip and was launched into the public water. It would be very singular if any such effect were to result from what was done. It is not pretended that at that particular crisis and moment Lewis, the owner, said to the master of the vessel, or the mate of the vessel, or the cook, "Now, the ship is about to leave the slip—she is about to leave the shipwright's yard. You go down and take possession." Nothing of the kind. On the contrary, we find the owner, the master, and everybody who had any interest in the ship, saying that they were anxious that the ship should not leave the slip for at least two days longer. The only conversation the captain seems to have had with the shipwrights or their labourers seems to have been one of a very different description. The master says—"The alteration in her berth was suggested by me, and not in any way by Barr and Shearer, to my knowledge. They had not spoken to me on the subject before I made the suggestion. I had spoken several times to the foreman of the patent slip to see if he would get me laid there till the work was completed"—that is to say, laid in the harbour at the bottom of the slip.

The vessel had to be moved from the slip solely from the accidental circumstance of the ship "James Annan" being required to be placed upon it. We have it in evidence from the harbour-master that Barr and Shearer's people very often completed the repairs of vessels in the wet dock after being taken from the slip, and that the usual place for them to be taken was the bottom of the slip. It so happened that this ship had to be moved to make way for the "James Annan;" but at that moment it was not convenient that she should lie at the bottom of the slip, and consequently she was sent to a distance somewhat further removed from the yard. If that had been done by the captain—if the captain had taken the vessel from this slip—if he had been watching to see when she came down from the slip, and had been there to demand her possession, and, having taken possession, had carried her over to the furthest point he could find from the slip, there might have been some shadow of ground for arguing that possession was intentionally and purposely delivered, and de facto handed over to the captain. But, instead of that, we find he is first of all pressing that the vessel may remain two days longer on the slip, and then, when he finds that from the exigencies of the day she is obliged to be moved to an inconvenient position, he interests himself in the matter, and has a conversation with the foreman of the yard, with the view of getting the vessel laid at the bottom of the slip. He does not say what he will do when he has got possession of the ship; but the foreman of the yard cannot obtain from the harbour-master the right of remaining at the bottom of the slip. The ship has to be taken off and carried to this further corner, but is brought back again in a few hours.

And we have it in evidence besides—this is important as counter evidence to all that is said, weak as it is, upon the subject of handing over possession of the ship—we have it in evidence from the appellants' workmen, one of them being Thomson, the manager of their yard, and the other the head carpenter, that they had strict orders to keep the ship attached to the yard of the shipwrights by means of placing hawsers round the pawls which stand confessedly upon the shipwrights' yard. Whether or not those pawls are used by other people by courtesy or right appears to be a matter of not the slightest importance. The important point is this, that the shipwrights, in order that there might be no mistake about the matter, took care that all the time the vessel was lying in the harbour she should still continue to be attached by these hawsers to their own premises. The circumstance that these pawls were the means by which other vessels could be attached where requisite does not detract from the force of the observation that de facto the ship's hawsers continued to be attached during the whole time to the pawls on the appellants' premises.

No. 3.
Feb. 26, 1875.
Barr & Shearer v. Cooper.

It is plain what the captain was there for. The captain was there for two or three purposes. He was there to speed the work—to see that the parties did not loiter about their work, and he was there also to give any suggestion that might be necessary in order to effectuate that which was the object of all the parties, viz., the repairing of the ship, so that she might be again classed as A 1 at Lloyd's—Lloyd's surveyor was constantly viewing the vessel as she was in progress, and giving his directions, and of course the owner of the vessel would desire to see that all was being done as speedily as possible in the first place, and as effectually as possible in the next place. For that purpose there was no more proper person to be on board than the captain. But that the captain had not any ordering of the ship, or anything to do with the ship beyond that, is plain. The harbour-master and his deputy tell us in their evidence that orders were given by them whenever the ship had to be moved, and she was moved only when they gave orders, and whenever she was moved the captain, who naturally was the person to apply to, was applied to, and the persons he employed were the labourers, the foreman, the carpenters, and the rest of the men who were doing the work in the shipwrights' yard. The captain is pressed to state who were the people who actually moved the vessel, and he says,—"The carpenters, with the assistance of my hands," that is to say, the mate and the shipkeeper, who was also left to look after the vessel.

My Lords, I apprehend that there is no trace of any purpose to relinquish the ship—there is no trace of any actual relinquishment in the circumstance of the ship having been sent from the slip into the public water for the reasons assigned, and for the period assigned, and for the particular object in view. In everything that took place, so far as we find any trace of what did occur, there is the simple fact of possession in the shipwrights, the captain filling the position I have described; there is no demand for possession on his part, nor any suggestion that there was any demand on the part of the owner. There was therefore no change of the possession that had been confessedly given and taken in the first stage of the proceedings.

Lord Selborne.—My Lords, the possession before the 15th of November was in the appellants, by contract, and with the consent of the owner, for the purpose of repairs, which were not then completed. The launching of the ship on the 15th of November was an act done by the appellants for the same purpose, with a view to the completion of the same repairs, and only done with the intent to place the ship in a more convenient position for the execution of the rest of the repairs, maintaining as far as was possible, when she was in the water, her attachment locally to the appellants' yard. Not only was there no delivery to the owner, but the appellants' workmen continued all the time of the operation to be on board as before, and the owner was so far from accepting delivery that he rather objected to the whole operation, and was as desirous as the shipbuilders that it might interfere with the progress of the works in the yard as little and as shortly as possible. The only control over the whole operation, except that of the appellants, was exercised by the harbour-master. Within a few hours of the ship leaving the slip, and as soon as the operation allowed, the ship was brought back and was attached to the pawls in the appellants' yard, and she so remained till she was put upon the slip again. The harbour-master, his deputy Mr Goodwin, a ship chandler and ship owner, and another ship chandler and ship owner at Ardrossan, all prove that this was the usual way of conducting the appellants' business, and of finishing repairs after they had attained the stage at which they could be more conveniently finished with the ship in the water than with the ship upon the slip. And the evidence as to control is that which has been stated by my noble and learned friends to your Lordships.

No. 3.

Feb. 26, 1875.
Barr & Shearer v. Cooper.

My Lords, it seems to me that this case is a very clear case, where a possession legally obtained under contract for a continuing purpose is not to be displaced by inference from equivocal acts; and, further, it appears to me that those acts are really not equivocal, either as to the intentions of the persons doing them, or as to their effect.

I will conclude by putting before your Lordships one illustration. Supposing that a coach-builder in London takes a carriage, which has been put into his hands for repair, through the public streets from one manufactory belonging to him in the Edgeware Road, to another, belonging to him in Long Acre, can it possibly be represented that by that he loses his possession of his lien? And would it make the slightest difference if the coachman of the owner of the carriage, employed by his master from time to time to see how the repairs were going on, helped in that operation by driving through the streets the horses by which the carriage was drawn?

INTERLOCUTOR appealed from reversed: Cause remitted to the Court of Session, with a declaration that the appellants are entitled to their expenses in the Court of Session.

GRAHAMES & WARDLAW—WEBSTER & WILL, S.S.C.—LOCH & MACLAURIN—MORTON, NEILSON, & SMART, W.S.

No. 4.

Mar. 11, 1875.
Lord Advocate v. Clyde Steam Navigation Co.

THE LORD ADVOCATE, FOR BOARD OF TRADE AND COMMISSIONERS OF CUSTOMS, (Pursuer) Appellant.—Att.-Gen. Baggallay—Lord-Adv. Gordon—Sol.-Gen. Holker—Beasley.
THE CLYDE STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY (Defenders), Respondents.—Southgate, Q.C.—E. Kay, Q.C.

Ship-Measurement—Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, sub-sections 4 and 5 of section 21.—A ship was constructed with an "awning" deck above the main deck, extending from forecastle to poop, with the exception of two gaps 13 feet 6 inches and 8 feet 6 inches broad across the vessel. The gaps were provided with doors in the ship's sides, and could be planked over, if required, so as to cover the vessel from stem to stern, but the doors were not capable of resisting the pressure of the sea, and the coverings of the gaps were not made water-tight. Held (aff. judgment of the Second Division) (1) that the vessel had not "a third deck, commonly called a spar deck," within the meaning of the provisions of sub-section 5 of section 21 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict., c. 104); and (2) that the space between the awning deck and main deck was not "a permanent closed-in space on the upper deck available for cargo or stores, or for the berthing or accommodation of passengers or crew," in terms of sub-section 4 of section 21 of the said Act.

No. 4.

Mar. 11, 1875. Lord Advocate v. Clyde Steam Navigation Co.

Ld. Chancellor (Cairns). Ld. Hatherley. Ld. O'Hagan.

(In the Court of Session, February 22, 1873, 11 Macph. 440, 45 Scot. Jur. 301.)

The Clyde Steam Navigation Company had a steamer called the "Bear," which had been officially surveyed in 1870, and registered as of 331·97 tonnage. She was intended for the coasting trade, and was constructed with a covering or deck above the tonnage deck, extending with two breaks from the forecastle to the poop.

Some alterations were made in 1871, and a re-measurement of the ship took place.

The surveying officer, acting on the instructions of the Board of Trade, put a large addition upon her registered tonnage, upon the ground that the vessel was three decked, or had a "permanent covered-in space," and that the space between the upper deck or covering and the tonnage deck, which had not been included in the former survey, should be included in the measurement, under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, section 21, sub-sections 4 and 5.*

In order to determine the principle on which the measurement should be made the present action was raised by the Lord Advocate on behalf of the Board of Trade against the Clyde Steam Navigation Company, to have it found that the "Bear" was of a tonnage not less than 585·46 tons.

The defenders averred that the covering in dispute was a hurricane deck covering portions of the ordinary deck, "making the ship more safe, and insuring the greater comfort of the passengers generally, especially of steerage passengers, and also so far protecting cattle and other live stock, but not forming a spar or third deck, and not increasing the carrying capacity of the vessel, and not forming a closed-in space in the sense of the statute."

The Lord Ordinary (Gifford) pronounced an interlocutor, remitting to Mr William Mumford, Lloyd's surveyor, Glasgow, to examine the "Bear," and report "as to the present state and position of the main deck of said vessel, and of the erections, structures, and coverings thereon, so far as the same relate to or bear upon the question as to the measurement for the registered tonnage of the said steam-ship."

Mr Mumford having returned a report (the substance of which is stated in the Lord Chancellor's judgment), the Lord Ordinary (Gifford), on 12th November 1872, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that, according to the sound construction of 'The Merchant Shipping Act, 1854,' and relative regulations, the space above the main or tonnage deck of the steam-ship 'Bear,' intervening between the aft end of the forecastle and the front of the poop, ought not to be measured or included as part of the register tonnage of the said steam-ship, reserving to measure any separate deck-house constructed on the main-deck between said points; and to this extent and effect assoilzies from the declaratory conclusions of the action, and decerns: And, with the above finding, appoints the cause to be enrolled, that parties may agree upon, or that a remit may be made to ascertain, the measurement in conformity with the above find-

---

* The 21st section of the Act contains detailed rules for measurement.

Sub-section 4:—"If there be a break, or poop, or any other permanent closed-in space on the upper deck available for cargo or stores, or for the berthing or accommodation of passengers or crew, the tonnage of such space shall be ascertained as follows," &c.

Sub-section 5:—"If the ship has a third deck, commonly called a spar deck, the tonnage of the space between it and the tonnage deck shall be ascertained as follows," &c.

No. 4.

Mar. 11, 1875.
Lord Advocate v. Clyde Steam Navigation Co.

ing: Finds the defenders entitled to the expenses hitherto incurred by them."

The pursuer reclaimed. The Second Division adhered.

The pursuer appealed.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords, the ground upon which the rectification of the register is asked for is, that the "Bear" has an upper or spar deck above the tonnage or main deck, and that the space between the tonnage deck and this upper or spar deck ought to be measured in accordance with the rules contained in the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854; and it is not denied that if this space ought to be reckoned in, the register would require to be rectified as desired.

The 5th sub-division of the 21st section of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, provides, that "if the ship has a third deck, commonly called a spar deck, the tonnage of the space between it and the tonnage deck should be ascertained as follows,"—then follow certain rules for measurement. The question then is, has the "Bear" a third deck, commonly called a spar deck? The condescendence of the appellant affirms that she has.

No proof was allowed to the respondents, although they desired to have a proof; but the case was, by an interlocutor of the 18th of May 1872, remitted to Mr Mumford, Lloyds' surveyor at Glasgow, to examine the "Bear," and "to report as to the present state and position of the main deck of the said vessel, and of the erections, structures, and coverings thereon, as far as the same relate to or bear upon the question as to the measurement of the registered tonnage of the said steam-ship."

Under this remit Mr Mumford made his report; and the statements in that report, and the model referred to in it, are the only materials before your Lordships as regards the facts of the case. It appears from this report that the deck in question, "being separated by openings completely across the vessel, and those openings being provided with planks and hatches unsuitable to any weather deck, which are not fastened down or rendered water-tight," is not considered by Mr Mumford to be a continuous deck. Further, the report states that "the doors are not fitted so as to be water-tight against any pressure, and that the planks, top-sills of the doors, &c., covering the cuttings in the deck, are not made to fit so as to be efficacious in the sheltering the cargo beneath them. A three-decked ship is usually loaded down, so that her main or middle deck amidships is at or below her water-line, the usual custom being that her submerged side amidships, measured from the top of the upper deck at the side to the water-line, should be three inches to every foot of her depth of hold. This also applies in a measure to the ventilating side ports in the steerage, and their protection in case of accident. The want of strength and efficiency of the gangway doors, and the position of the steerage side scuttles in the 'Bear,' would therefore prevent her from being loaded down as a three-decked ship with well secured ports may with safety be laden and sent to sea. If loaded regardless of these points the vessel would be unseaworthy."

I think it clear that the kind of upper or spar deck mentioned in the Act of Parliament is a continuous deck from stem to stern, fastened down and water-tight, sealing up the cylinder formed between the two decks, and making it a fit place for the stowage of cargo, like a hold.

In the case of the "Bear," judging by the evidence and the model, the upper deck plays rather the part of a covering platform for the main or tonnage deck.

No. 4.

Mar. 11, 1875. Lord Advocate v. Clyde Steam Navigation Co.

This covering is fixed for a certain distance. But in this covering there are two gaps made quite across the vessel, one before and one behind the funnel, of the respective width of 13 ft. 6 in. and 8 ft. 6 in., and, as Mr Mumford observes, the deck is not practically a complete deck for all purposes of safety to ship and cargo. The "Bear," being a steamer used for coasting purposes, and chiefly for the conveyance of cattle, this which is called a deck is in reality a covering run along the ship, above and parallel to the main deck, for the purpose of affording shelter against weather, and at the same time affording a platform along which the crew can pass in navigating the ship. The cargo between this covering and the main deck is not cargo stowed and sealed up in a hold, but is deck cargo, protected against the weather.

I am therefore of opinion that the "Bear" has not a third deck, commonly called a spar deck, within the meaning of sub-division 5 of section 21, so that the tonnage of the space between it and the tonnage deck should be ascertained under that sub-division.

It was then contended that the register tonnage should be increased under sub-division 4 of the same section.

It appears to me that the condescendence of the appellant and his pleas in law are confined to the case advanced under the 5th sub-division, to which I have already referred. But, even if this were not so, the argument under the 4th sub-division does not appear to me to be capable of being supported. The part of the deck underneath the moveable covering which I have described cannot in any sense be called a "permanent closed-in space on the upper deck, available for cargo." It is the whole of the deck underneath the covering, and there is no enclosure or separation of one part of the deck cutting it off from the rest of the deck; nor is it a "space available for cargo" in the sense in which cargo is used for the purpose of measurement. The cargo underneath the covering would be deck cargo merely. Neither is it "space available for the berthing or accommodation of passengers or crew;" nor is it suggested that it has ever been used for that purpose.

On the whole, I am of opinion that this appeal fails, and I submit to your Lordships that it ought to be dismissed, with costs.

LORD HATHERLEY.—My Lords, I entirely concur. The onus of proof rests in a very peculiar manner upon the pursuer, because he seeks to alter a survey made upon a previous occasion by an official surveyor, which only requires to be revised in respect of certain alterations which had been made in the ship, of which the particular matter in question does not form part. Therefore, to decide upon the present occasion against the respondents would be in effect, as it seems to me, not only to disregard Mr Mumford's report, but to disregard the view entertained by the surveyor who originally surveyed the ship, and who certainly did not then think of including these erections as coming within either the 4th or the 5th sub-sections of the 21st clause of the Merchant Shipping Act.

LORD O'HAGAN.—My Lords, I am of the same opinion. I have not been at all affected by the considerations of public policy and the possible results of our decision, one way or the other, which have been pressed upon us, mainly by the Attorney-General. Such considerations may sometimes, but very rarely, be regarded as throwing light on the terms of a statute when they are obscure, and assisting towards an understanding of the intention of its framers. But here we have nothing to do but to apply to the facts the plain words of the statute, whatever may be the consequences either to the revenue or to the mercantile community.

No. 4.

Mar. 11, 1875.
Lord Advocate v. Clyde Steam Navigation Co.

The report of Mr Mumford seems to me to conclude the case on both its branches. He is the sole witness,—an expert named by the Court, and appealed to for his judgment by both parties. The Crown, at least, cannot object to his competency and correctness, for they have insisted that by his evidence alone the matter should be determined, and if it is to be relied on, the "Bear" is not a three-decked ship, according to the contention of the appellant. In her original certificate of registry she was described as a two-decked ship, and rightly so described, if Mr Mumford is warranted in saying that her awning-deck is not a continuous deck,—is not that which is commonly called a spar-deck,—and does not therefore constitute a third deck within the meaning of the statute. And he makes this still more clear when he states that the "Bear" cannot, without becoming unseaworthy, be loaded as a three-decked ship can and ought to be loaded. And if she cannot, it would seem that the measurement of her tonnage should, in fairness as well as in accordance with the terms of the statute, be proportioned to her carrying capacity, and that she should be dealt with as a two-decked vessel.

On the second point I should have been disposed to hold the Crown precluded from making it at all by the state of the pleadings, but it was considered by the learned Judges of the Courts below, and declared to be untenable. I concur in that opinion. I was struck by an observation of the Attorney-General with reference to the danger of allowing shipowners to escape their proper liabilities by leaving portions of their vessels in an imperfect state, so as to keep them unreached by the exact description of the statute, and yet to make them available for profit on occasion. I am not prepared to say that such a danger may not arise, and that such an evasion ought not, if possible, to be prevented. But in this case I do not find any proof of a purpose of that kind. The respondents deny it; and the sole witness, Mr Mumford, does not allege it. Upon his testimony, it seems impossible to hold that there is in the place to which the question has reference a space "permanently closed in," and suitable for the reception of "cargo or stores," or the berthing or accommodation of human beings. This is made clear by the report, which describes the place as in a condition wholly unfitting it for the reception of perishable goods, or the safe and reasonably comfortable lodgment of passengers or sailors. By that report the Crown has elected to stand, excluding all access to other evidence and means of information; and, according to its findings, I think that the judgment of the Court of Session was perfectly correct, and ought to be affirmed.

INTERLOCUTORS affirmed, and appeal dismissed, with costs.

SOLICITOR OF CUSTOMS—W. J. SANDS, W.S.—GRAHAMES & WARDLAW—WEBSTER & WILL, S.S.C.

No. 5.

Mar. 12, 1875.
M'Donald v. M'Donald.

ALASTAIR M'IAIN M'DONALD (Pursuer), Appellant.—Cotton, Q.C.—Marten, Q.C.

JOHN ALAN M'DONALD AND OTHERS (Defenders), Respondents.—Pearson, Q.C.—Trayner.

Entail—Resolutive Clause.—A deed of entail, after the cardinal prohibitions, contained a resolutive clause in these terms:—In case the heirs "shall contravene the before written conditions, provisions, restrictions, and limitations herein contained, or any of them, that is, shall fail or neglect to obey or perform the said other conditions or provisions and each of them, or shall act contrary to the said other restrictions to be hereinafter added and appointed by me, they shall ipso facto amit, forfeit," &c. The deed contained no subsequent restrictions against altering the order of succession, alienation, or contracting debt. The validity of the entail having been challenged, on the ground that the resolutive clause was not applied to the cardinal prohibitions, held (in aff. judgment of the Second Division) that the words "shall fail or neglect to obey or perform the said other conditions or provisions" embraced contraventions of the restrictions before mentioned, and that the entail was valid.

Ld. Chancellor (Cairns).
Ld. Hatherley.
Ld. O'Hagan.
Ld. Selborne.

(IN the Court of Session, March 20, 1874, ante, vol. i. p. 858.)

This action was raised by Colonel Alastair M'Iain M'Donald of Dalchosnie, institute under a deed of entail executed by his father, Sir John M'Donald, in 1837, against John Alan M'Donald and the other substitute heirs, concluding for declarator that the said deed was not a valid and effectual tailzie in terms of the Act 1685, c. 22, and that the lands belonged to the pursuer in fee-simple.

The deed of entail conveyed the lands "with and under the conditions, provisions, restrictions, limitations, exceptions, clauses irritant and resolutive, declarations, and reservations after specified, viz., with and under this condition always, as it is hereby expressly provided, that" the institute and the heirs of entail should bear the name and arms of M'Donald: . . . . "As also with and under these conditions, that the said Alastair M'Iain M'Donald and whole other heirs" should possess upon the deed and upon no other title: . . . "And with and under the restrictions and limitations after written, as it is hereby expressly conditioned and provided, that the wives and husbands of the several heirs succeeding to the said lands and estate hereby resigned are and shall be debarred and excluded from all right of terce or courtesy;" . . . . "and that it shall not be lawful nor in the power of the said Alastair M'Iain M'Donald, nor of any of the said heirs, to alter this present tailzie or the order of succession:" . . . . "And with and under this restriction and limitation also, as it is hereby expressly conditioned and provided, that it shall not be in the power of the said Alastair M'Iain M'Donald, nor of any of the other heirs succeeding to the said lands and estate hereby resigned, to sell, alienate, wadset:" . . . . "And with and under this restriction and limitation also, that the said Alastair M'Iain M'Donald, and all the other heirs succeeding to the said lands and estate, are and shall be hereby limited and restrained from doing any act and granting any deed, directly or indirectly, whereby the said lands and estate before disponed, or any part thereof, may be affected, apprised, adjudged, forfeited, confiscated, or be in any manner of way evicted."

The resolutive clause was in these terms:—"And with and under this irritancy, as it is hereby conditioned and provided, that in case the said Alastair M'Iain M'Donald, or any of the other heirs succeeding to the lands and estate before disponed, shall contravene the before written conditions, provisions, restrictions, and limitations herein contained, or any of them, that is, shall fail or neglect to obey or perform the said other conditions and provisions, and each of them, or shall act contrary to the said other restrictions to be hereinafter added and appointed by me, excepting as is before excepted, then and in any of these cases the person or persons so contravening shall, for him or herself only, ipso facto amit, forfeit, and lose all right, title, and interest which he or she hath to the lands and estate before disponed."

No. 5.

Mar. 12, 1875.
M'Donald v. M'Donald.

The only objection insisted in was that the resolutive clause did not apply to the restrictions against altering the order of succession, selling or alienating the lands, or burdening the same with debt.

The restrictions against altering the order of succession, &c. were not repeated in any subsequent part of the deed.

The pursuer contended that the resolutive clause was only applied to restrictions to be afterwards added.

The Lord Ordinary (Mackenzie) on 5th December 1873, sustained the defences, and assoilzied the defender, on the ground that the words in the resolutive clause, "shall fail or neglect to obey or perform the said other conditions and provisions, and each of them," were intended to apply and did apply to the cardinal prohibitions previously mentioned.

The pursuer reclaimed.

The Second Division adhered to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, but on different grounds.

The pursuer appealed.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords, there are no cases which have afforded a greater room for the exercise of the astuteness and skill of counsel in matters of construction than those cases which concern the stringency of the clauses in Scotch deeds of entail; and the present is certainly not an exception from that general observation. But I am bound, at the same time, to say, that if the questions which have been raised upon the construction of the deed now before your Lordships had been raised upon the construction of any instrument which was not a deed of entail, they would have appeared to me to have created no serious difficulty.

I cannot admit that there is to be applied to deeds of entail a rule of construction altogether differing from the rules of construction applicable to other instruments. I am quite satisfied with the expression of the principle which should guide us in such cases that fell from the late Lord Wensleydale in the case of the Kintore entail[1] when it was before your Lordships' House. Lord Wensleydale there said—"If an expression in an entail fairly admits of two meanings, both equally technical, grammatical, and intelligible, that construction must be adopted which destroys the entail rather than that which supports it. But this rule does not authorise you to put on any expression a forced, unreasonable, or ungrammatical construction in order to defeat the entail. You must first construe the instrument according to its fair meaning, and, if that leaves two courses open, freedom of disposition must prevail." I propose to your Lordships, in this case, first, to construe this instrument according to its fair meaning. If, upon a construction of it, according to its fair meaning, two courses are left open to your Lordships, by all means let that be adopted which will favour freedom of disposition.

Now, my Lords, are two courses of construction open in this case? I will [1] Earl of Kintore v. Lord Inverury, April 16, 1863, 1 Macph. H. L. 34, 35 Scot. Jur. 456, 4 M'Q. 527.

No. 5.

Mar. 12, 1875. M'Donald v. M'Donald.

read the resolutive clause, in the first place, up to a certain point, where I will pause for a few moments:—"In case the said Alastair M'Iain M'Donald, or any of the other heirs succeeding to the lands and estate before disponed, shall contravene the before-written conditions, provisions, restrictions, and limitations herein contained, or any of them, that is, shall fail or neglect to obey or perform the said other conditions and provisions and each of them,"—there I pause. I observe, in the first place, that, in order to prevent possible ambiguity, your Lordships will, I think, construe the words "that is" as synonymous with these words, "by which I mean;" and I will read it to you again thus, "shall contravene the before-written conditions, provisions, restrictions, and limitations herein contained, or any of them, by which I mean, shall fail or neglect to obey or perform the said other conditions and provisions and each of them."

Upon that it is argued that in this deed there is a clear distinction drawn between sentences which are to be termed "conditions and provisions," on the one hand, and sentences which are to be termed "restrictions and limitations," on the other, and that in the last clause of what I have read, beginning with the words "by which I mean," the failure which is supposed is a failure or neglect to obey or perform "conditions and provisions," and that no reference is made there to "restrictions and limitations."

Now, let us inquire, in the first place, whether this is a true description of this deed. Is there a distinction drawn throughout between "conditions and provisions," on the one hand, and "restrictions and limitations" on the other?

My Lords, I arrive at a very different conclusion. You will observe that the deed commences by stating that the settlement is made "with and under the conditions, provisions, restrictions, limitations, exceptions, clauses irritant and resolutive, declarations, and reservations after specified," and then commences thus,—"With and under this condition always, as it is hereby expressly provided." There we have a "condition" ranged under the head of a "provision." Then, my Lords, in a subsequent part of the deed you will find these words,—"And with and under the restrictions and limitations after-written, as it is hereby expressly conditioned and provided." Here we have what we are in search of, namely, "restrictions and limitations," treated as exactly synonymous with, at all events as ranged under, "condition and provision." "Condition and provision" is, perhaps, not treated as being synonymous with "restriction and limitation," but as the larger and more comprehensive term of the two. Then, farther on, we find this,—"And with and under this restriction and limitation also, as it is hereby expressly conditioned and provided." There we have "condition and provision" again carrying in it "restriction and limitation." Then, again, at a subsequent part, we have that which is a restriction expressly called a provision,—"Providing always that it shall not be in the power of any of the said heirs to set any tack or rental of the manor place," &c. And again, "with and under this condition, as it is hereby specially provided and declared." That is another change, putting "condition" under the head of "provision and declaration." And, again, "and also with and under the limitation and condition,"—"condition" and "limitation" being used as synonymous. Then, again, "with and under the irritancies following, as it is hereby expressly conditioned and provided." So that you have the word "irritancy" treated as a condition or provision.

I have gone through these examples, and I dare say further examples might be given; but these will be sufficient to show your Lordships that it would be altogether a mistake to suppose that there had been any distinction drawn in an earlier part, or in any other part, of this deed between "restrictions and limitations," on the one hand, and "conditions and provisions" on the other. They are treated as synonymous, and the word "providing" is treated throughout as the most comprehensive introduction that can be given for any and every of the clauses of the deed. If that is so,—if there is nothing in any other part of the deed which limits you in the construction which is the natural construction of a term, such as "condition and provision,"—I ask your Lordships what reason is there why, in this particular sentence, the words should be so limited?

But, my Lords, is there not something more than that? I still continue to omit, for the present, the words, "or shall act contrary to the said other restrictions to be hereinafter added and appointed by me," for the purpose of carrying your Lordships on to a clause which follows those words, namely, "excepting as is before excepted." Those words obviously cannot refer to "restrictions to be hereinafter added," because there could be no "excepting as is before excepted" from that which had not been mentioned at all before, but was to be mentioned afterwards. Those words, "excepting as is before excepted," must therefore refer to what is called "the said other conditions and provisions." But what was there in the nature of an exception in the earlier parts of the deed, and from what was the exception excepted? From nothing whatever that is mentioned before, except from restrictions and limitations. There were exceptions, two in number, from restrictions and limitations, and there were no other exceptions whatever. Therefore you have in those few words that which absolutely constrains your Lordships to give to "conditions and provisions" a meaning which would include within them "restrictions and limitations."

Now, not looking at the later words, "or shall act contrary," I ask, is there any authority which bears upon the construction of words like these? I will first ask your Lordships to observe how authority stands as to the word "other," in the sentence "shall fail or neglect to obey or perform the said other conditions and provisions, and each of them." Does that impose any difficulty in the way of holding that the failing or neglecting to obey or perform applies to all conditions and provisions which went before? My Lords, it was decided in the case of Stirling v. Moray or Home Drummond,[1] amongst other things, that in an entail which contained the words, "shall contravene the other before written conditions and provisions, restrictions, and limitations," the word "other" was not an inappropriate word—that it merely meant to express a reference to the clauses of the deed which went before, other than the resolutive clause itself. That appears to be a case which has always been approved in the Scotch Courts, and the effect of that authority would be to give a natural and proper meaning to the word "other" in this clause.

Even if there were not this authority for such an explanation of the word "other" I am not myself clear that that word might not be held here to have naturally a reference prospectively to further provisions of the settlor as to restrictions afterwards to be imposed, just as we often in language, which is, perhaps, not altogether inaccurate, speak in anticipation in the first part of a sentence, using the word "other" in contradistinction to some exception which is made in the latter part of the sentence.

I will next turn to those words which I omitted in the first instance, namely, "or shall act contrary to the said other restrictions to be hereinafter added and

[1] Stirling v. Moray, May 28, 1845, 7 D. 640, 17 Scot. Jur. 359.

No. 5.

Mar. 12, 1875.
M'Donald v. M'Donald.

appointed by me." My Lords, other restrictions or restriction upon some minor points were or was added afterwards, to which, no doubt, the words "hereinafter added" would be applicable. Much argument took place upon these words, but I am not sure that I myself have been able to appreciate the force of that argument. It appears to me that the observations are quite just that there is a use of the word "said" in this clause of the sentence which makes that word inappropriate, having regard to what is spoken of afterwards; but, my Lords, it appears to me, in the first place, that any inaccuracy in the use of the word "said" is corrected by the words "to be hereinafter added and appointed by me." Those words are so clear and so unambiguous that there can be no doubt as to what they point to; and if, before the use of those words, you have the word "said" applied to "restriction," I apprehend that the latter words, being so clear and free from ambiguity, they must correct the earlier words. But further, even if it could be made out, as I do not think it is made out, that there was ambiguity in this particular clause, it does not appear to me that it would in any way operate to make invalid, or imperfect, or inefficacious the earlier words of the sentence, "other conditions and provisions," which, in my opinion, must be applied to the whole of the conditions, provisions, restrictions, and limitations contained in the earlier part of the deed.

Those are the observations which would have occurred to me if this case had come before us in the first instance, not governed by any particular authority. But I am unable to distinguish the present case from the case of Adam v. Farquharson,[1] which came before your Lordships' House in the year 1844. In that case the resolutive clause was this:—"It is hereby expressly provided and declared that in case the said William Farquharson, or any other of the heirs of taillie substitute to him as above, shall contraveene any of the before-written conditions, provisions, limitations, and restrictions,—that is, shall fail or neglect to obey and perform the haill conditions and provisions above sett down, or any of them, or any other after conditions and restrictions that may be added by me,—that then and in that case the person or persons so contraveening by failing to obey the said conditions, or by acting contrary to the above limitations and restrictions, or any of them, shall, for himself or herself only, lose and forfeit the estate."

Upon those words, which for all substantial purposes appear to me to differ extremely little, if at all, from the words now before your Lordships, Lord Cottenham says,—"The next objection raised was as to the sufficiency of the resolutive clause, that it does not apply to the restrictions and limitations contained in the prohibitory clause. This objection is founded upon a supposed distinction made by the entailer between the conditions and provisions stated in the deed and the limitations and restrictions which it also mentions. The resolutive clause, it is contended, is confined to the former, and does not therefore prevent the altering the order of succession or the sale of the estate or the burthening it with debts. It does not appear to me that there is any real difficulty in the interpretation of this clause. It begins by declaring that in case any of the heirs of tailzie shall contravene any of the before-written conditions, provisions, limitations, or restrictions, and then proceeds thus,—'That is, shall fail or neglect to obey and perform the haill conditions and provisions above set down, or any of them.' It is clear that the word 'provisions,'

[1] Adam v. Farquharson, Sept. 5, 1844, 3 Bell's App. 295.

No. 5.

Mar. 12, 1875.
M'Donald v. M'Donald.

which is general enough to include limitations and restrictions, was here intended to include them." I pray your Lordships to observe the reasoning which satisfied Lord Cottenham, "for otherwise this part of the clause would be inconsistent with the former, which could not have been the intention of the framer of the deed." And Lord Brougham in the same case said,—"Next the resolutive clause is itself called a provision. It begins with these words,—'It is expressly provided and declared.' In truth, 'provide' and 'provision' are words both in legislative enactments and in the framing of deeds of the largest extent and import. They cover everything that can be enacted in a statute or enumerated in a deed."

Fortified by that authority, and supported by the considerations which I have endeavoured to express to your Lordships, I certainly arrive at the conclusion that we have here under the words "that is," and under the words that follow it, nothing whatever which falls short of a repetition of that which occurred in the first member of the sentence. The clause, "shall fail or neglect to obey or perform the said other conditions and provisions," appears to me to point to a failure or neglect to obey or perform "any of the conditions, provisions, restrictions, or limitations of the deed." My Lords, I understand that this was the view of the Lord Ordinary. The Second Division of the Court of Session arrived at the same conclusion, but by a different process. I myself am unable to adopt the construction which the Second Division of the Court of Session appear to me to have been inclined to adopt. I not only prefer the construction of the Lord Ordinary, but, in my opinion, that construction was the right construction, and the interlocutor which he pronounced was entirely right. I therefore submit to your Lordships that this appeal ought to be dismissed, with costs.

LORD HATHERLEY.—I have come to the same conclusion as my noble and learned friend upon the consideration of the whole of this instrument which is before us.

The argument for the appellant has very properly been rested by Mr Cotton almost entirely upon the question whether or not those words which profess, as it appears to me, to be words in explanation of the preceding passage, the words "shall fail or neglect to obey or perform the said other conditions and provisions," are large enough to include within themselves the same extent of meaning as the original sentence which immediately precedes them. That the original sentence is quite sufficient, I believe, has not been doubted in the course of the argument, but the point in question is whether or not the resolutive clause sufficiently embraces those cardinal prohibitions which require to be fenced by a resolutive clause. That is the point before us, and as to the original words, as I say, it is not disputed that they are sufficient. Those words are, if the heir "shall contravene the before-written provisions, restrictions, and limitations herein contained" then the resolutive clause is to take effect. Now, stopping there for a moment, I beg your Lordships to observe that these words are large enough and ample enough to cover both the restrictive clauses, properly so called, as Mr Cotton would say, and the clauses by way of condition. They embrace in their terms the whole of the cardinal points insisted upon in a Scotch deed of entail.

The argument for the appellant is that this clause is restricted in its generality by the explanation which follows the original sentence. After saying that the heir shall not "contravene the before-written conditions, provisions, restrictions, and limitations herein contained, or any of them," the explanation proceeds to say,—"that is" (which is equivalent to "my meaning is") "shall fail or neglect to obey or perform the said other conditions and provisions and each of them." I will stop there for a moment. The words which might at first create, and which appear to have created some degree of hesitation in the construction, are the words "said other," preceding the words "conditions and provisions." However, the meaning of these words "said other" is determined by authority, and from the very construction of this deed one sees that that authority was not unreasonable in holding the words "said other conditions" in a resolutive clause to mean other than this resolutive clause itself. In this instrument it seems to me to be very clearly brought out that that is the meaning, because the immediately preceding passage is that those persons who were to come in were to take under the "same conditions, restrictions, and irritancies to which the heirs contravening or failing were liable, and with and under this irritancy, as it is hereby conditioned and provided." Then it goes on to give the provision which I have read, and it says "that is, shall fail or neglect to obey or perform the said other conditions and provisions," that is to say, those other conditions and provisions to which all other heirs of tailzie were subject, besides this very provision contained in the resolutive clause.

No. 5.

Mar. 12, 1875. M'Donald v. M'Donald.

That being so, the only question we have to consider is whether those words which are contained in the explanatory clause, namely, "fail or neglect to obey or perform the said other conditions and provisions," are sufficient to embrace all the limitations and restrictions which are mentioned in the deed, as well as what Mr Cotton calls specially the "conditions and provisions" of the deed.

Now, first, as regards the word "provision." It has been said by Lord Brougham in your Lordships' House, that "provisions" is one of the most general words which can be used in a deed, and will, unless it is limited by some special rule of construction which you must deduce from the frame and character of the deed itself, include every stipulation and condition that is made throughout the whole instrument. That was illustrated by the case of Speid v. Speid,[1] which, in one sense, turned upon a singularly narrow point, where the word "provision" was inserted in the sentence "shall contravene the provision," instead of the "conditions." In that case the learned Judges appear not to have doubted that if the word "condition" had been inserted it would have been adequate to cover every provision in that deed, whether called a condition, a limitation or restriction, or a provision; but the word "provision," being used in the singular, they considered it ambiguous, and they seem to have doubted whether it applied to one provision more than another, and in consequence of that ambiguity the entail was broken.

What we have therefore to look for in the deed is to see whether we find any such distinct appropriation of the word "provision" as would induce your Lordships to say that it is not used in its full generality, but in a restricted sense, and that it would be applicable only to those parts of the deed which are in the nature of conditions, as distinguished from those parts which are in the nature of restrictions. Our attention has been called with great minuteness to the deed for this purpose, and I think the Lord Chancellor has pointed out how entirely that fails to prove what Mr Cotton was bound to prove in order to succeed in his argument, namely, that a peculiar vocabulary has been adopted by the framers of this deed, by which they have restricted the word "provision" with regard to its use here, have deprived it of its generality, and appropriated it exclusively to those parts of the deed which operate by way of condition, as distinguished from those which operate by way of restriction.

[1] Speid v. Speid, Feb. 21, 1837, 15 S. 618, 9 Scot. Jur. 324.

The first mentioned of these restrictions which are about to be inserted in the deed occurs where, after describing what we should call the limitations in the English law, that is to say, after describing the institute and substitute heirs, it says,—"But always with and under the conditions, provisions, restrictions, limitations, exceptions, clauses irritant and resolutive, declarations, and reservations after mentioned." There the vocabulary of the deed and the provisions which are contained in it seem to be brought before the conveyancer's mind; and then afterwards we have to see whether or not he has fixed and stamped upon the word "provision" that definite and limited meaning which has been contended for by the learned counsel for the appellant. The next mention of these restrictions occurs after that,—"But with and under the conditions, provisions, restrictions, limitations, exceptions." Then it goes on with the same list of words as I have just read from the preceding page.

But without fatiguing your Lordships by going through this, which has been already gone through in some detail by my noble and learned friend the Lord Chancellor, I have only now to point out one or two instances in which it seems to me to be quite plain that no such alteration in the force of the word "provision" had taken place in the mind of the draughtsman who drew this deed, as is contended for on the present occasion. We find in a subsequent part of the deed,—"And with and under this restriction and limitation also, as it is hereby expressly conditioned and provided." There the draughtsman thinks it right to express a restriction and limitation by saying that it is "conditioned and provided." It appears to me, my Lords, to be as plain as possible that he there brings all the four words "restriction," "limitation," "condition," and "provision," into operation in one clause, which is a restrictive clause.

Another passage struck me very much in the same way. After having said in the first place,—"and with and under this restriction and limitation, that it shall not be within the power of any of the heirs succeeding," and so on, "to set tacks or rentals" "with diminution of rental, and payment of a grassum," he goes on thus,—"And providing always that it shall not be in the power of any of the said heirs to set any tack or rental," and so on. There the word "providing" is used, and I cannot think that any distinction can be drawn between the use of the word "providing," and the use of the word "provision." That which is "provided" is, of course, a "provision," and in that case it is a provision which is restrictive, and therefore it is a provision which is a restriction. Consequently, instead of the word "provision" having lost its generality of application, it is here applied to restrictions just in the same manner as in the preceding passage you find "restriction" and "limitation" used in connection with "conditioned" and "provided."

A little farther on your Lordships will find this—"And with and under this condition, as it is hereby specially provided and declared." There you have the word "condition" used in connection with the words "provided and declared," not expressly with "restriction." But you find afterwards,—"And also with and under the limitation and condition that the land and estate before disponed shall not be affected or burdened," and so on. There you find "condition" tacked with "limitation," as you have before found "provision" tacked with "restriction."

No. 5.

Mar. 12, 1875.
M'Donald v. M'Donald.

Now, my Lords, the argument has been that in the clause before us "conditions and provisions" go together as applicable only to conditions, and also that "restrictions and limitations" go together as applicable only to restrictions. But we find in this instrument the word "provision" applied to a restriction, and we find the word "limitation" coupled with "condition." The passage I have last read says,—"Under the limitation and condition." Is it possible, therefore, to say that the conveyancer has taken upon himself, the duty of taking a word of the largest signification in its general sense (the word "provision") out of the general vocabulary, and of appropriating it to one particular portion only of the provisions, instead of to all the provisions contained in the deed, namely, to the conditions as distinguished from the restrictions? It would require a very strong case, as it appears to me, to induce your Lordships to think that you ought so to restrict the word (which in itself is a nomen generalissimum), and to say that it is so clearly and manifestly made out that it is restricted in that way that when used in the sentence "to obey and perform" the other conditions and provisions the word "provisions" is applicable only to those provisions which are strictly synonymous with conditions.

In this case there might, perhaps, have been something said if the words had been "obey the conditions and provisions." But the words are, "shall fail or neglect to obey or perform" the "conditions and provisions." "Obey" might be thought, perhaps, to be applicable more to a restriction than to a condition, and "perform" to be applicable rather to a condition than to a restriction. But here you have both the words "obey" and "perform," and the very use of these two words, instead of assisting the argument of the appellant in any way, rather tends to shew that the conveyancer had before his mind in explaining the word "contravene" to us two points to which he wished to draw attention, the first being that the heir is to obey that which he is subject to, namely, the restrictions, and the second being, that he is to perform what it would be his duty to perform before taking possession of the estate or enjoying its privileges, namely, the conditions attached to the possession of the estate and the acquisition of the privileges. Accordingly, you find that the word "contravene," as applied to the whole of the conditions, provisions, restrictions, and limitations is, as it appears to my mind, very well paraphrased in the sentence introduced by the words "that is" (which shews what the conveyancer was doing) "fail or neglect to obey or perform" the other conditions and provisions." Construing it in that way, you give to each of the words its proper meaning—you strike nothing out of the deed, and you make the latter sentence a clear and satisfactory explanation of what it was that the settlor, the author of the deed, intended.

Then, my Lords, come these words, which are supposed to create some ambiguity:—If the heir "shall fail or neglect to obey or perform the said other conditions and provisions, and each of them, or shall act contrary to the said other restrictions to be hereinafter added and appointed by me." Now, the whole of that comes under the head of explanation, as has been shewn by the Lord Chancellor, because the next words are, "excepting as is before excepted."

No. 5.

Mar. 12, 1875.
M'Donald v. M'Donald.

Therefore, the words "that is" must include the whole of the sentence which follows, or else you must refer back the expression "excepting as is before excepted" to the contravening of "the before written conditions, provisions, restrictions, and limitations," inasmuch as these words are not applicable to any restriction by way of limitation contained in the deed afterwards.

Therefore, all we now have to do is to interpret what is meant by "acting contrary to the said other restrictions to be hereinafter added." There is no difficulty whatever in that, as has been already observed, except as regards the use of the word "said," and the introduction of that word would not, in my opinion, produce any ambiguity in the sense of there being two meanings, either of which might be adopted. If there were such ambiguity the entail would fail, because ambiguity is not allowed in Scotch deeds of entail; and if words were to be found in this instrument which could not be interpreted on account of their doubtful meaning, the result would be the total destruction of the deed. But nothing of that kind occurs here. There is no doubt that "other restrictions to be hereinafter added" are intended, and therefore if other restrictions afterwards added happened to be called "said" I do not apprehend that the introduction of a word which creates no ambiguity in construction, and can only be said at the most to be inappropriate and unnecessary, can have the effect of destroying the validity of the instrument.

But, my Lords, I think it would be possible to give an interpretation to the word "said" if it were necessary to find one, which I do not think it is. It would not be straining the English language too severely to read the deed thus:—The settlor has carefully from the beginning to the end said—"Mind, every provision and limitation" (I am using that word in the English sense again) "which I introduce into my deed, every estate which I grant, every possible benefit which I confer by my deed, is to be subject to the 'conditions, provisions, restrictions, limitations, exceptions,' that follow afterwards." That is twice repeated in the earlier part of the deed; and therefore having had that very strongly impressed upon his mind, when he is saying, "I condemn by this resolutive clause every contravener," he goes on to say, "I explain what I mean by every contravener—I mean every contravener of all the limitations before contained in the deed—aye, and I mean something more too—I extend it to a person not performing those said other conditions and provisions which I have spoken of, to be hereinafter added, for all my provisions are not yet exhausted—those said other provisions mean the provisions which I have spoken of in the beginning of the deed, and which I intend to insert at the end of it." It is not an elegant, indeed it is a clumsy, mode of expression; at the same time it does not appear to me to be deficient in sense, and, what is more important a great deal, there is no other sense that can be given to the expression which can create ambiguity and thereby destroy the instrument.

Therefore, my Lords, upon the whole case, I agree in the conclusion at which my noble and learned friend the Lord Chancellor has arrived.

LORD O'HAGAN.—I am quite of the same opinion, both upon authority and upon a careful consideration of the details of this deed. After the very exhaustive criticism which the deed has undergone by my noble and learned friends I shall only say a single word upon it, and even that would not be necessary, if it were not, in my opinion, important that it should be known, that the views which I, at all events, take, are not the views of the Second Division of the Court of Session. I think the view which was presented, in a very simple, lucid, and satisfactory way by the Lord Ordinary, is the view which may fairly be sustained by your Lordships. The view upon the other side, or rather the view of the Second Division, was one which I for one cannot adopt, and if the case had been, as presented by one of the learned Judges there, a case in which this clause was wholly incapable per se of construction, I should have said that the decision of your Lordships ought to be the other way, and that the decree of the Court below ought to be reversed. I shall only just point to the real ground of decision of the Lord Ordinary, which I venture to adopt.

No. 5.

Mar. 12, 1875.
M'Donald v. M'Donald.

The question in the case is, substantially, to what extent, value, and effect, should be given to the word "provisions" in this deed; and all the argument which has been offered on either side, and all the observations which fell from my noble and learned friends who have preceded me, bear ultimately upon that. Of course, with a view to ascertain that, it is necessary to examine this deed through all its parts, to look at its various clauses, and carefully to dissect them. That having been done, it appears to me very clear that the word "provisions" in the resolutive clause with which we have to deal, bears the ordinary general comprehensive meaning which is attributed to it in common parlance; and if so, there is an end of this case.

The word "provision" is, as has been said by Lord Brougham and other Judges, a word of the most comprehensive character. It reaches every clause, whether it be restrictive, whether it be conditional, or whatever it may be, that the deed may contain. And unless there are other words to limit the operation of the word "provisions" in that respect we should take it in its ordinary sense. We have heard a good deal here about the special view of the Scotch Courts as to the interpretation of deeds of entail. No doubt there is a certain amount of strictness applied in such cases, but unless there be, as has been said, some difficulty or doubt in construction, some balance upon the one side and the other, we ought to take the words of a deed of entail just as we would take the words of any other deed, and interpret them according to the natural and ordinary course of things, and the common understanding of mankind.

Now, the word "provisions" in this particular instrument does not appear to me, I confess, by anything that is attached to it or that surrounds it, to be limited to something within the sphere of its common operation. The word occurs twice in this resolutive clause, and I endeavoured to ascertain from the learned counsel who so ably argued the case for the appellant what meaning he would put upon that word if it were not to have its ordinary and universal value, but I certainly was not able to learn from him, if the word was to be restricted at all, within what precise sphere it ought to be restricted, or what it would be taken to regard, unless it regarded all the clauses, whether restrictive or conditional, in this deed.

So far as the use of the word "provisions," in the first place, in this resolutive clause goes, it is used in this way: It is said that if M'Donald "shall contravene the before written conditions, provisions, restrictions, and limitations herein contained, or any of them." I see nothing, and the Lord Ordinary saw nothing, to limit the effect of the word "provisions" in that portion of the clause. It was said by Mr Cotton that the words "conditions, restrictions, and limitations" being used along with the word "provisions" it must necessarily be taken to have a different meaning from those other words, and to represent a particular class of things which was not described by these other words. But, at the same time, he said that if that word "provisions" were put at the end instead of in the middle of those four words it might be taken to have a universal operation. I confess, my Lords, I cannot see the force of the distinction. It is a mistake no doubt; it is a technical error; perhaps it may be an error of the transcriber of this deed. But the word "provisions" there seems to me to have precisely the same operation as it would have had if it had been placed in another portion of the sentence, and I was not able to get from the learned counsel any definition of the word on account of its particular collocation in that place.

No. 5.
Mar. 12, 1875.
M'Donald v. M'Donald.

Well, if that be so, and if the word be as it was taken by the Lord Ordinary, used in its common and ordinary sense, we come next to the words "that is." I take the view of the Lord Chancellor to be irrefragable with respect to these words. They are equivalent to "I mean to say," "shall fail or neglect to obey or perform the said other conditions and provisions." Now, undoubtedly the word "other" there did appear to me originally to present a considerable difficulty in the case, and but for the authority of the case to which we have been referred, namely, Stirling v. Moray or Home-Drummond,[1] the word "other" would still appear to me to create very considerable doubt as to the construction of this clause. But that case is decisive upon it, and shews that the resolutive clause itself, and its conditions, must be taken as the antithesis to the other clauses referred to by the word "other." That being so, my Lords, that difficulty is entirely removed.

Then, for the purpose of construction, you may read that portion of the sentence as if the word "other" were altogether omitted. Reading it in that way, how will it run? It will run thus:—"The before written conditions, provisions, restrictions, and limitations herein contained, or any of them." If, so far, there be nothing to limit the operation of the word "provisions," and if, as the Lord Ordinary held, it reached to all the antecedent provisions of this deed, then the sentence will proceed thus,—"that is, shall fail or neglect to obey or perform the said conditions and provisions;" and whatever was the meaning of the word "provisions" antecedently in this clause ought to be the meaning of the word "provisions" with the word "said" before it in the subsequent part of the clause. If that be so, the universality of the operation of the word "provisions" is preserved. It will affect restrictive clauses, and conditional clauses, and all clauses; and if that be so there is an end of the controversy, and this deed is perfectly good.

Now, my noble and learned friends have gone minutely through the clauses of the deed through which I have looked myself, and there is scarcely a portion of it in which there are not words corroborating the view of the Lord Ordinary in this respect. There is scarcely a clause in the deed, whether restrictive, conditional, or of any other kind, which does not contain the words "provision" and "provided." Those words pervade the whole instrument, shewing manifestly that there was not in the mind of the person who prepared or dictated that deed any distinction between the "provisions" of it and the restrictive clauses, or the other clauses, but that the word "provision" was intended to operate throughout the whole, affecting all the clauses equally from beginning to end.

Upon that short ground, and not going into detail, I am clearly of opinion

[1] Stirling v. Moray, May 28, 1845, 7 D. 640, 17 Scot. Jur. 359.

No. 5.
Mar. 12, 1875.
M'Donald v. M'Donald.

that the judgment of the Court below was right. I do not think that it would have been right, upon the grounds and for the reasons stated in the Second Division of the Court, but I need not go into detail upon that. I do not think there was any right or reason to assume that there was a mistake in this deed. It is possible that there may have been; it is possible that there may have been the omission to which the learned Judges point; it is perfectly possible that that omission might be supplied in accordance with the fact upon the ingenious view which they present. But a court of construction is bound to construe; it is not to invent; and it is not to imagine; and I am very happy, in this particular case, to say that, in my opinion, there is no necessity for invention, there is no necessity for imagination, but that, taking the plain words of the instrument within the resolutive clause, and throwing the light of the other clauses from beginning to end upon that clause, there is no reasonable doubt in my mind that that clause means to extend the effect of the word "provision" through the whole of the instrument. And, that being so, the resolutive clause is good, and the deed ought to be maintained.

Lord Selborne.—I entirely agree with the very able judgment of the Lord Ordinary in this case, and with the opinion that has been delivered to your Lordships by my noble and learned friend on the woolsack; and I am so entirely satisfied with the grounds stated in that opinion, and with the general reasons on which it is founded, that I propose to add nothing.

The whole argument for the appeal appears to me to have rested upon the theory of a blank or omission of words having occurred in the latter member of the explanatory part of the resolutive clause in the deed, and I am bound to say that that view seems to me to have been adopted in the judgment of the Inner-House. With all respect for their Lordships, I cannot at all agree in that view. If, indeed, I have seen any ground on which we could judicially assume the existence of a blank or omission of words in that portion of the deed, I certainly should not have seen how, consistently with principle or with authority, we could have taken upon ourselves to fill up any such blank or omission.

The blank or omission, if well established upon judicial grounds, might, I imagine, have been fatal to the deed. But the only ground upon which this theory of a blank or omission of words in the deed appears to be founded is that, in that portion of the clause, the word "said" is either insensibly or inaccurately used. My Lords, if the word "said" there be entirely without sense it is wholly innocuous, because the rest of the clause is sufficiently sensible and distinct to leave no doubt whatever that what is there spoken is something afterwards to be done. And if it were necessary I should have no difficulty in saying that the explanation offered by my learned friend opposite (Lord Hatherley) is as reasonably probable as any which occurs to me of the circumstances which may have led to the use of that word "said;" that is to say, in the general introductory portion of the deed there is by anticipation a collecting together of all the clauses, conditions, provisions, limitations, and restrictions which are to occur afterwards throughout the deed, and it may well be that if we were bound to put a meaning upon that word "said" we might properly apply it to the antecedent mention of restrictions and conditions, which would include everything that follows.

If we were to go outside the deed and to speculate upon what may have led to this or any other inaccuracy or obscurity of language in the deed, we should be departing wholly from the settled principles of construction. I cannot for a moment admit that there is any impropriety in this deed with reference to the forms used by conveyancers or books of style; but to compare the language of a particular deed, said to be imperfectly expressed, with those forms and styles, in order to arrive at the conclusion that something was meant to have been introduced into the deed which would have occurred there had the common form or style been accurately followed, and then to deal with it as if in that manner it had been ascertained that the deed contained an omission or a blank, is a mode of dealing with the construction of instruments from which, my Lords, I am bound to say, I entirely dissent.

No. 5.

Mar. 12, 1875.
M'Donald v. M'Donald.

INTERLOCUTORS appealed from affirmed, and appeal dismissed, with costs.

LOCH & MACLAURIN—G. H. & S. DICKSON, W.S.—GRAHAMES & WARDLAW—DEWAR & DEAS, W.S.—WEBSTER & WILL, S.S.C.

No. 6.

Mar. 18, 1875.
Symington v. Symington.

ANDREW JAMES SYMINGTON (Defender), Appellant.—Sol.-Gen. Holker—Spinks.
MRS MARY SANDERSON EDMONSTON OR SYMINGTON (Pursuer), Respondent.—Cotton, Q.C.—Thesiger.

Parent and Child—Custody of Children—Husband and Wife—Conjugal Rights (Scotland) Act, 24 and 25 Vict. c. 86, sec. 9.—In an action of separation and aliment at the instance of a wife against her husband, in which the husband's adultery was proved, and separation granted, held, in the circumstances of the case, that it was expedient that the custody of the daughters of the marriage should be given to the mother, and the custody of the sons to the father, during their respective pupillarities, so long as no other order should be made by the Court of Session, but subject to such regulations as the said Court might consider reasonable for access of each parent to the children in the custody of the other, and subject to an obligation by the parents respectively not to remove the children in their custody from the jurisdiction of the Court.

Observed, per Lord Chancellor,—"It appears to me that the Conjugal Rights Act has given the Court the widest and the most general discretion, and has purposely done so. It appears to me that it must be the duty of the Court in every case to consider the whole of the circumstances—the circumstances of the misconduct which leads to a separation no doubt, the circumstances of the general character of the father, the circumstances of the general character of the mother, and, above all, it should be the duty of the Court to look to the interests of the children, and carefully to weigh, as regards the interests of the children, the comparative advantages or disadvantages of leaving the custody of all or of any of them to the one parent or to the other."

(IN the Court of Session, 20th March 1874, ante, vol. i., p. 871).

Ld. Chancellor (Cairns).
Ld. O'Hagan.
Ld. Selborne.

Mr and Mrs Symington were married in July 1860, and lived together as husband and wife until January 1871.

In April 1873 Mrs Symington raised an action of separation and aliment against her husband on the ground of adultery. There was no conclusion for custody of children.

There were five surviving children of the marriage, all of whom were then pupils, the three eldest being boys, aged ten, eight and a half, and seven, the two youngest being girls, aged five, and three and a half years.

The pursuer's averments were to the effect that from the commencement of the year 1870 the defender had used familiarities towards a girl

No. 6.
Mar. 18, 1875.
Symington v. Symington.

named Elizabeth Heron, who acted as nurse in the family, and that in the month of January 1871 he succeeded in seducing her, and carried on an adulterous intercourse with her.

The defender met the pursuer's averments by a denial, and, further, accused the pursuer of being in the habit of indulging in narcotics and alcoholic liquors to excess.

Among the documents produced was a letter addressed by the defender to the pursuer on 15th May 1871, in which, after accusing her of habitually using stimulants, &c., to excess, and, further, of being very untruthful, he wrote,—"Don't delude yourself with the false hope that the uncertainties of the future will make black white. Truth shall not and cannot be so hid. I shall look carefully to that; and in the event of your persisting in your present evil course the children, who as yet know nothing of all this, will, as they grow up, have to be told the plain truth concerning you, and be warned against you and your sinful untruthful ways, and, painful though the duty be, I shall not have them either misled or contaminated by the neglect of it."

On 27th August 1873 the Lord Ordinary (Shand) pronounced an interlocutor assoilzieing the defender from the conclusions of the action. At the debate before the Lord Ordinary the pursuer had moved that, in the event of the adultery being held to be proved, the custody of all the children should be committed to her.

The pursuer reclaimed, and renewed the motion for custody of the children which had been made before the Lord Ordinary. On 19th March 1874 the First Division unanimously recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and found the adultery proved. The pursuer, accordingly, obtained decree of separation against the defender, and also a decerniture for aliment.

All the Judges, in their opinions, stated that they considered the charges made by the defender against the pursuer to be completely disproved, and that they were false charges, knowingly and wilfully made by the defender.

With reference to the custody of the children the Court pronounced the following findings:—"Find the pursuer entitled to the custody of the children of the marriage during their respective pupillarities, so long as no other or different order may be made by the Court with regard to them, or any of them, and decern and ordain the defender forthwith to deliver over the said children to the custody of the pursuer accordingly: Find the defender liable to the pursuer in aliment at the rate of £25 per annum for each of the said children," &c.

The defender appealed.

Lord Chancellor.—(After stating that the fact of adultery had been clearly established by the proof, continued)—But now, my Lords, I turn to a very difficult and hardly less painful part of the case—with regard to the custody of the children, five in number. By the 9th section of the Conjugal Rights (Scotland) Act[1] there is a provision very analogous to the provision in the English Act upon the same subject,[2] viz.,—"In any action for separation a mensa et thoro, or for divorce, the Court may from time to time make such interim orders and may in the final decree make such provision as to it shall seem just and proper with respect to the custody, maintenance, and education of any pupil children of the marriage to which such action relates."

Reference was made in the course of the argument to authorities both in

[1] 24 and 25 Vict. c. 86, sec. 9.

[2] 20 and 21 Vict. c. 85, sec. 35.

England and in Scotland, and it was suggested that, certainly in England, the analogous provision to that which I have read had been acted upon in this way, that where a wife established her title either to a divorce or to a separation, it was either matter of course, or almost matter of course, that that should carry with it for her the custody of the children; and that having shewn good cause for severing the conjugal tie, she, not being in fault herself, should not be amerced or punished by being deprived of the custody of her children. My Lords, I should greatly regret that any general rule, so sweeping, and, as it appears to me, so inconvenient in its working, should be laid down on a subject of this description. It appears to me that the Act of Parliament has given the Court the widest and the most general discretion, and has purposely done so. It appears to me that it must be the duty of the Court in every case to consider the whole of the circumstances of the particular case before it—the circumstances of the misconduct which leads to a separation no doubt, the circumstances of the general character of the father, the circumstances of the general character of the mother, and, above all, it should be the duty of the Court to look to the interest of the children, and carefully to weigh, as regards the interests of the children, the comparative advantages or disadvantages of leaving the custody of all or of any of them to the one parent or to the other. I am at a loss to conceive how any general rule upon such a subject can be laid down. Certainly I should prefer to ask your Lordships in this case to act not upon any general rule, but upon the circumstances of the case which is now before us.

Now, my Lords, turning to those circumstances, it appears to me that your Lordships have, in the first place, the somewhat disagreeable duty of considering the charge made against the lady in this case, for the purpose of shewing that, at all events, she, from her character and habits, is not entitled to have the custody of the children, for such I understand to be the meaning of the charge in the condescendence. But before observing upon the view which was taken upon this part of the case by the Court of Session, I will state as shortly as I can to your Lordships what appears to me to be the conclusion to be drawn from the materials before us upon this point.

My Lords, the husband and wife, Mr and Mrs Symington, appear to have lived, so far as the outside world could observe, in great happiness, from the time of their marriage, which, I think, was about the year 1860, up to the year 1870, and during these ten years the five children I have spoken of, and another child who is dead, were born. In the year 1870 it appears clear that the health of Mrs Symington—possibly from the many illnesses to which, as the mother of a family, she had been subject—was considerably impaired. It appears further, that whether from her state of health and the natural consequences of it, or from some other reason, there arose in the mind of her husband, as between him and his wife, some want of that complete harmony and agreement which had prevailed up to that time; and we find the husband making suggestions in communications with his wife's family—in the first place, that the state of her health had more or less affected the state of her mind. We find that afterwards these statements by the husband assumed a different shape, and he suggested, indeed broadly stated, to the family of his wife that she had been in the habit of indulging to excess in narcotics and in the use of stimulants. I pass over a lengthened correspondence which arose upon that subject, in which the family of the wife appears to have commented mainly upon the statements made by the husband, and to have had no other knowledge upon the subject.

No. 6.

Mar. 18, 1875.
Symington v. Symington.

(After referring to the evidence, his Lordship continued)—Looking at the evidence in the case, I find nothing which can satisfy my mind that these charges against the wife are capable of being supported.

But I must pause there for the purpose of saying that I am unable to follow the conclusions to which, upon this point, I understand the Court of Session have come. I will not delay your Lordships by reading the judgments, which are of some length, but I understand the learned Judges of the Court of Session to have arrived at this conclusion, not merely that adultery was committed on the one hand, and that the charges on the other hand were groundless, but also that the husband, in making the charges, knew or believed that they were groundless, and made them for the sinister and most wicked purpose of so discrediting his wife in the eyes of the world that he might be left free to pursue that course of conduct which, according to this theory, he had proposed to himself, namely, the seduction of the girl Elizabeth Heron. My Lords, I am unable to arrive at that conclusion. The conduct of the husband was in all truth bad enough, but I am unable to say under this evidence that it was as bad as that which the Court of Session have in this respect imputed to him. Although he was perverse and obstinate enough to believe, with insufficient foundation, the charges which he made, yet, while I find no evidence for the charges, at the same time I find nothing which satisfies my mind that the husband did not believe that the charges were well founded.

My Lords, the result of the view which I take of the case up to this point is this, that there is nothing, in dealing with the custody of the children, established against the wife which can disentitle her to be considered a person who ought to have the custody of the children if, on other considerations, it is proper to assign that custody to her. That, of course, is a different and a separate question. I have entered upon a consideration of the charges made against her entirely for the purpose of ascertaining whether, after weighing these charges, she can be said to stand recta in curiâ, for the purpose of proceeding with the further question to whom, as between the husband and wife, is the custody of these children to be assigned? The children are five in number, and the three elder are boys. The boys were born in the years 1863, 1864, and 1866, and they are now, as we understand, boarders at school. The two younger children are girls; they were born in the years 1868 and 1870. The husband is engaged in business, which appears to be not otherwise than profitable. He is in middle life, and it is proved that he is affectionately attached to his children, and has always been so. My Lords, I must say also that, although deploring, and, as a Judge should do, gravely and severely reprehending the conduct established and the crime proved against the husband in this case, it is also, at the same time, to be borne in mind that, until the commission of that offence, he bore, and apparently justly bore, a high character for uprightness and morality in the world. And it is some consolation to observe that, grave as the offence proved in this case was, there appears to have been no continuance of immorality, and I trust that I am not saying too much when I say there is reason to hope for a return on the part of the husband to the paths of morality and propriety of life.

The Court of Session have removed the custody of the whole of the children from the husband and given it to the wife. With regard to the boys, I cannot, for my own part, perceive that an order which should take their custody from their father and hand it over to their mother would be an order which would be conducive, so far as we can judge, to the future welfare of the children. It is a very different matter with regard to the girls. I think their mother, not being proved to be in any way disqualified from having the custody and care of the girls, is the natural person to have that custody and care. On both sides there ought, as it appears to me, to be a full and careful opportunity of access, so that none of the children may grow up without as full knowledge and full intercourse as the case will admit of with both parents. I do not forget what weighed very much with the Court of Session, viz., an expression in one of the letters of the husband, which I trust fell from him in a moment of irritation, and which we have been led by the statement made by his counsel to believe he already much regrets—an expression declaring that the children would, as they grew up, so far as he could bring that about, be led to look upon their mother as open to the charges he made against her. My Lords, I trust that nothing of the kind will occur, and that, painful as are the circumstances which have arisen between this husband and wife, wherever the custody of the children may be, before the children, at all events, a curtain of oblivion will be drawn over all that has occurred.

No. 6.
Mar. 18, 1875.
Symington v. Symington.

The order which I should suggest to your Lordships—(His Lordship then read a draft of the judgment afterwards pronounced, infra, p. 49.)

If your Lordships should concur in the variation of the interlocutor which I now propose, I think, having regard to the fact that, upon the main question in the suit, your Lordships agree with the Court below, and also having regard to the fact that the respondent could not be made to bear costs as against her husband, the costs of this appeal should be awarded to the respondent.

Lord O'Hagan.—My Lords, in this lamentable case there are two questions —a question of fact, and a question of discretion. We are required to determine whether the adultery of the appellant has been sufficiently established, and if it has been, to what custody his children should be committed.

(After referring to the evidence of the husband's adultery his Lordship continued)—On the question of fact, therefore, I am obliged to concur with my noble and learned friend; and on the question of discretion I also concur with him. The jurisdiction as to the custody and education of children committed to the English and Scotch Courts by the Conjugal Rights Act and the Divorce Act is identical and very extensive, and involves great responsibility for its judicious exercise. We are bound, in considering a case like this, to have regard not to mere technicalities or hard-and-fast rules of practice, but to the real interests of all the parties whom our decision may affect, and to do for all what may seem best and wisest. The father's right to the guardianship of his child is high and sacred. Our law holds it in much reverence, and it should not be taken from him without gross misconduct on his own part, and danger of injury to the health or morals of the child. His proved adultery may, under certain circumstances, make the withdrawal of it inevitable; but, per se, bad as the offence may be, it may not necessarily involve the infliction of such injury, and there may be considerations of convenience and advantage to the children which, if that infliction be not probable, should forbid their withdrawal from the father's care.

In the case with which we are dealing the crime imputed to the appellant was in itself and its circumstances very grievous, and if he only were concerned would make him entitled to small consideration. But we are reasonably asked to remember that his adultery was secret, that he did not lead an openly immoral life, or do any acts which, coram populo, could deprive him of the character he had acquired as a religious and upright man; and that in his general dealings with his household he acted with strict propriety. Upon the evidence he is entitled to say that neither before nor after the one seduction has anything of immorality been proved against him. It is not likely that the bitter experience he has had of the consequences of a departure from the line of duty will induce him to a change of conduct calculated to justify the accusations he has so strenuously denied, and there is therefore apparently reason for expecting more careful avoidance at least of any open misconduct or ill example in the future than in the past. Then he seems to have a genuine love for his children, and to have exhibited a watchful care of them.

No. 6.

Mar. 18, 1875. Symington v. Symington.

Considering these things, there does not seem any reasonable ground for anticipating that the male children will be injured, morally or otherwise, if their custody be continued with their father, especially as they are of sufficient age to be kept at school. And he will be subject at all times to the vigilant observation of their mother, who will have full access to them, and the continual supervision, and, if it should be necessary, the prompt intervention, of the Court for their protection from any evil. And if this be so, there are, on the other hand, patent considerations affecting the interests of the children and their prospects in the world which make it undesirable that the connection with their father should be broken off, leaving them in lifelong isolation, and depriving them of the material benefits which they may anticipate at his hands. The words of Lord Neaves in Lang v. Lang (7 Macph. 447), to which we have been referred, are sensible and just—"If we take a man's children from him we leave him a solitary being, and deprive him of the most powerful inducement to amendment of life. It is not that he has committed faults, but that he teaches or is likely to teach evil to them, and to corrupt their morals, that can alone entitle us to interfere." And, in addition, I am affected by the consideration that an absolute separation of the appellant from all his children might not only deprive them of important advantages to be derived from him hereafter, but would also destroy the possibility of that reunion of the husband and wife which, notwithstanding all that has occurred, may yet, I trust,—and perhaps through their intercourse with the children, to whom they are bound by a common affection,—be happily accomplished.

I am bound to say that I fully concur with the Lord Chancellor as to the failure of proof of the charges against Mrs Symington; and I concur with him further in his condemnation of the excessive harshness and severity with which she was treated, and which, in my opinion, would have had no adequate justification even if every one of those charges had been clearly established.

Agreeing on both the questions in the case with my noble and learned friend, I fully approve of the advice he has given your Lordships.

Lord Selborne.—My Lords, entirely agreeing as I do with the explanation which my noble and learned friend on the woolsack has given to your Lordships of the grounds for adhering to the decision of the Court of Session in this case, so far as relates to the painful subject of adultery, I do not propose to say one word more on that part of the case.

With respect to the more difficult and not less anxious portion of the case, as to the custody of the children, I will take the liberty of making a few, and only a few, observations. As to the girls, I do not think it necessary to add anything to the reasons stated, which are obvious, for leaving them under the mother's charge. The difficulty in my mind has had relation to the boys alone. My Lords, I do not think that as to the boys the right of the father or the right of the mother stands in a position which can make it otherwise than proper for your Lordships to turn the balance, by having regard to the interest of the children. The interest of those children, of course, is to be regarded in two points of view. Their material interest obviously is not in the direction of complete separation from their father, from whom their means of support in life apparently are entirely derived. No doubt, my Lords, the moral interest is, in cases of this kind, of even greater importance than the material, and, looking to the moral interests of these boys, I am not satisfied that it will be compromised by leaving them in care of him who is prima facie their natural and legal guardian, and on whom their material interest must mainly depend. The offence, aggravated as it is, of the father's, was, as my noble and learned friends have rightly said, neither preceded nor followed by any generally vicious course of life. On the contrary, but for the painful proof which we have of that offence, and of the circumstances accompanying it,—to which I should perhaps add that harshness to the wife, of which mention has been justly made—but for those things, the character of this gentleman would stand in a very favourable light, if tried by all the tests that could be applied to it.

No doubt, my Lords, that fact in itself suggested the possibility of a painful interpretation. It may be said that his whole life was false, and that all the profession of good made by him is now discovered to be entirely hypocritical. It must be admitted, and I say it with great pain, that when we bring those high professions into direct contact and proximity with deliberate acts of gross vice, no other judgment can be formed of them than that at that time and on those occasions the vice was aggravated by hypocrisy. But, my Lords, I do not think it necessary or charitable to adopt that hypothesis as applicable to the whole life of the man. All who have experience of human nature know that there is in all men a constant inward struggle between the principles of good and evil; and because a man has grossly fallen, and, at the time of his fall, added the guilt of hypocrisy to that of immorality, it is not necessary therefore to believe that his whole life has been false, or that all the good which he ever possessed was insincere or unreal. I will hope better things of this gentleman, and therefore, not relying upon that which nevertheless is true, that even hypocrisy is, as it has been stated to be, a tribute paid by vice to virtue, and that a man whose mind is in that condition is perhaps not likely grossly and openly to use his opportunities of influence over the children whom he loves for their moral perversion,—not relying upon that, I am willing to believe that before these unhappy events the appellant was a man sincere in his profession, and desiring to do what was right, and that it is not beyond hope that he may afterwards live in accordance with his profession.

My Lords, in these circumstances, unless we are to be guided by that which seems to have exercised influence over the mind of the Court of Session, namely, the belief that his whole conduct towards his wife, all the imputations made upon her, and all the harshness exhibited towards her, were parts of a concerted scheme for the indulgence of his vicious passion towards a servant maid—unless we are to believe that—I do not see that the grounds exist upon which these boys—contrary to what, in other respects, is their own apparent interest—should be taken from the custody of the father. The Court of Session seems to have relied mainly upon that aggravated view to which I have adverted, of the motive and the purposes of the imputations upon the wife and the conduct pursued towards her, and I am not prepared to say, my Lords, that if they had been right in that there would not have been such an exhibition of deep and deliberate depravity on the part of this gentleman as, coupled with the rest of the case, might have justified the conclusion arrived at by the Court of Session. But, my Lords, entirely concurring in what has been said as to the absence of any evidence to justify the imputations upon the wife, also entirely concurring in what has been said as to absence of any justification of the husband's conduct, even upon the hypothesis that he fully believed those imputations to be true, still I am bound to say that I cannot come to the conclusion that those imputations originated in any deliberate purpose of injustice to the wife, much less in any purpose to cover, by means of that injustice, the further wrong.

No. 6.

Mar. 18, 1875.
Symington v. Symington.

My Lords, there is one fact in the case which alone has completely satisfied my mind that that portion of the view adopted in the Court of Session is not correct, and that is this: Dr Stark,—a witness not impeached, on whose own impressions as to the condition of the wife on two occasions when he saw her I do not rely, because I think it may be probable that he may have misinterpreted the symptoms from which he drew his conclusions,—distinctly proves that in the year 1866 (I think four years or more before these unhappy events, and when the husband and wife were living on terms of apparently uninterrupted affection) the husband consulted him on the same subject, being even then under the impression that the wife was injuring her health by the use of stimulants, and that stimulants were on that account forbidden. Dr Stark himself, though, as I believe, erroneously, did himself, from the appearance and manner of the wife on two latter occasions, draw a similar conclusion to that which the husband—I doubt not upon equally insufficient grounds—seems to have drawn. Those facts convince me that in the state of health of this lady, or in her habits of body connected with that state of health, there were circumstances which misled the husband at an early period, and afterwards in part misled even her medical attendants, into the belief which now proves to have rested upon insufficient foundation, that she did use (probably for medical reasons, in the first instance) stimulants or narcotics, which had an injurious effect upon her health. Now, the lady has been since placed in circumstances which have enabled her other friends to bring those views to the test, and I am happy to say the result has been to exonerate her from that construction of all or any of the appearances. But, my Lords, I cannot but believe Dr Stark, who, if he is to be believed, distinctly proves that these ideas in the husband's mind originated at a time and under circumstances which are absolutely inconsistent with the hypothesis of his motives which the Court of Session thought it right to adopt.

My Lords, in that state of things, I do not think that the conduct of this gentleman, bad as in many respects it has been, has been such as to give your Lordships good reasons for apprehending that the moral, any more than the material, interest of the boys will suffer if they are, upon the terms and under the safeguards which have been recommended to your Lordships, left under their father's care. No. 6.

Mar. 18, 1875. Symington v. Symington.

THE House pronounced a judgment affirming the interlocutor of the First Division, with the exception of the findings and decernitures regarding the custody of the children of the parties, which were recalled. In place of these findings the House "ordered and adjudged that the pursuer (respondent) is entitled to the custody of the two youngest children (Agnes and Margaret) of the marriage during their respective pupillarities, so long as no other or different order may be made by the Court of Session with regard to them or either of them, but with such direction for access of the defender (appellant) as the said Court shall think reasonable, and subject to the obligation of not removing them or either of them from out of the jurisdiction of the said Court; and it is hereby ordered that the defender (appellant) do forthwith deliver over the said two children to the custody of the pursuer (respondent) accordingly: And it is further ordered that the defender (appellant) is liable to the pursuer (respondent) in aliment at the rate of £25 per annum for each of the said children so long as, &c. . . . . And it is further ordered that the defender (appellant) is entitled to the custody of the other children of the marriage during their respective pupillarities, so long as no other or different order may be made by the said Court with regard to them or any of them, subject to the obligation of not removing the said children or any of them from out of the jurisdiction of the said Court, and also to the burden of providing for the maintenance and education of the said children, according to such directions as shall from time to time be given by the said Court for that purpose, and also subject to such regulations for securing the access of the pursuer (respondent) to the said children, or the occasional residence of the said children with the pursuer (respondent) as the said Court may consider reasonable; reserving to both parties respectively liberty, in the event of any difficulty, dispute, or change of circumstances, to apply to the said Court for such variation on the foresaid terms of aliment, or the foresaid direction as to custody, education, and access as the said Court may consider reasonable; . . . . and it is further ordered that the cause be and the same is hereby remitted back to the Court of Session in Scotland to do therein as shall be just and consistent with this judgment." *

WILLIAM ROBERTSON, Westminster—J. GALLETLY, S.S.C.—GRAHAMES & WARDLAW, Westminster—J & R. D. ROSS, W.S.

JAMES M'DOUALL, Appellant (Defender).—Cotton, Q.C.—Blair. No. 7.
THE RIGHT HON. THE LORD ADVOCATE (on behalf of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests), Respondents (Pursuers).—Lord-Adv. Gordon—Manisty, Q.C.—Badenach Nicolson.

April 16, 1875. M'Douall v. Lord Advocate.

Salmon Fishing—Prescription—Possession.—Held (in rev. judgment of the First Division) that a proprietor of lands on the sea coast under a barony title or a crown grant cum piscationibus may instruct a title as against the Crown to salmon fishings in the sea ex adverso of his lands by proof of salmon fishing by net and coble for the prescriptive period.

* For the order made by the Court of Session in applying this judgment see Court of Session report, postea, p. 974.

No. 7.

April 16, 1875. M'Douall v. Lord Advocate.

Fishings—White Fishings in the Sea—Act 1705, c. 2.—Observed (per the Lord Chancellor),—"Beyond all doubt the law in Scotland is, that white fishing in the sea round the whole coast of Scotland is perfectly free, and not only is it perfectly free, but there is a title on the part of the subjects to use the shore for the purpose of conducting white fishing in a proper mode."

Ld. Chancellor (Cairns). Ld. Hatherley. Ld. Selborne.

(IN the Court of Session, June 13, 1873, 11 Macph. 688, 45 Scot. Jur. 426.)

This action was raised at the instance of the Lord Advocate against James M'Douall, the proprietor of the estate of Logan in Wigtownshire, concluding for declarator that the salmon fishings in the sea ex adverso of the lands of the defender, in the parishes of Kirkmaiden and Stoneykirk, specified in the summons, belonged to the Crown, and that the defender had no right to fish for salmon, grilse, or salmon trout in the sea ex adverso of his said lands by stake or bag nets, or by net or coble, or in any other way, or to grant leases of such salmon fishings.

The lands in question were held partly under a barony title, without any mention of salmon or other fishings, and partly under crown charters cum piscationibus.

The pursuers averred that the defender and his predecessors had not under their titles fished for salmon, grilse, or salmon trout ex adverso of the said lands for such a time or in such a way as to give them a prescriptive right to the salmon fishings in the sea.

The defender averred that he had exercised such an exclusive right of salmon fishing for time immemorial.

A proof was taken, the import of which is given in the opinion of the Lord Chancellor.

The Lord Ordinary (Ormidale) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary having heard counsel for the parties, and considered the argument and proceedings, including the proof, finds it has been sufficiently proved that the defender and his predecessors have for more than forty years, or for time immemorial prior to the institution of this action, enjoyed and exercised, under and in virtue of good and habile titles, the exclusive right of fishing for salmon, grilse, and salmon trout in the sea ex adverso of the following lands belonging to them mentioned in the conclusions of the summons, viz.,—All and Whole the lands forming or embraced in the barony of Logan, situated in the parish of Kirkmaiden and county of Wigtown, bounded by the sea, extending, the coast of the said barony, on the Irish Channel or western side, from Dumbreddan Bay on the north to Crummag Head on the south, and on the Bay of Luce or eastern side from Chapel Rossan on the north to Kilstay or Palwhinrick Burn on the south, and the five merk lands of Crichen, and the five merk lands of Carrachtree, also lying within the said parish of Kirkmaiden and county of Wigtown: Therefore, quoad the right of fishing for salmon, grilse, and salmon trout in the sea ex adverso of said lands, assoilzies the defender from the conclusions of the summons, and decerns; and in respect the defender does not claim and has not attempted to prove a right to fish for salmon, grilse, or salmon trout in the sea ex adverso of the following lands mentioned in the conclusions of the summons, viz.," &c. (as to which the Crown's claim was not opposed),—"therefore, quoad these last-mentioned lands, finds, decerns, and declares in terms of the conclusions of the summons: Finds that the other lands mentioned in the conclusions of the summons are not to any extent bounded by the sea: Therefore, quoad these other lands, assoilzies the defender from the conclusions of the action, and decerns: Finds the defender entitled to expenses," &c.

The pursuer having reclaimed, the First Division, on 13th June 1873,

No. 7.

April 16, 1875.
M'Douall v. Lord Advocate.

recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and found that certain of the defender's lands were inland lands, and had no sea boundary; "and therefore, quoad the right of fishing for salmon, grilse, or salmon trout, concluded for as ex adverso of the said lands, dismiss the action, and decern: Quoad ultra repel the defences: Find, declare, and decern in terms of the conclusions of the summons: Find the defender liable in expenses, and remit," &c.

Mr M'Douall appealed.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—In this appeal there is not, so far as I can understand it, any question of law involved, nor is there, indeed, any controversy of any moment as to the statements of fact. The controversy relates principally to what is the proper conclusion to be drawn from the statements of fact which we have in the case. The question is as to the right to the salmon fishing in the sea on certain parts of the east and west sides of the peninsula of the county of Wigtown which terminates in the Mull of Galloway. Does this salmon fishing belong to the Crown or does it belong to the appellant? As regards the law applicable to such a case there is, as I have said, no controversy. If it were a matter of doubt before the decision of Gammell's case,[1] it is now clearly established by that decision that the right of salmon fishing in the sea round the coast of Scotland belongs to the Crown, and is inter regalia of the Crown, except in so far as it has been parted with by grant. Nor is there any doubt of this further proposition, that the onus lies upon those who maintain the right as against the Crown, of shewing that they derive that right either by express grant or by a grant sufficiently large to carry salmon fishing if connected with user and enjoyment for the requisite period. The title of the appellant, as regards by far the greater portion of the case, consists of his title to a barony in which there are no express words with regard to fishing, but as to which it is undoubtedly clear upon all the authorities that the title, being baronial, is sufficient to be a habile foundation for a claim to salmon fishing if the requisite enjoyment and user of salmon fishing is established. As regards one part of the case, a much smaller and more insignificant part, called the five merk land of Crichen, the title is not a baronial one, but a title by grant cum piscationibus, which upon all the authorities will be a habile title for the foundation of a claim to salmon fishing if connected with the requisite enjoyment and user.

The law, therefore, upon this point being entirely clear, it now becomes a question of fact, has the appellant in the present case, having a habile title upon which to found his claim, shewn a user and enjoyment sufficient to perfect that claim for a period of forty years and upwards? The Lord Ordinary was of opinion that he had done so. The First Division took a different view of the evidence and repelled his claim, and it is from that decision that the appeal is brought to your Lordships.

Now, I will ask your Lordships' attention to one piece of evidence, because it appears to me one the importance of which cannot be overstated—I mean the evidence of the late defender in the case, Colonel James M'Douall of Logan, the father of the present appellant. He was an old man when his evidence was taken, and it was taken by commission, about six months before the general evidence in the case was taken. The parties, therefore, had the whole of his evidence before them, the advisers of the Crown saw exactly what was the statement of facts which he made, and they had the whole of the intervening period between that time and the time when the rest of the proof in the case was taken to consider the statements which Colonel James M'Douall had made, and to controvert them, if any of them could have been controverted.

[1] Gammell v. Commissioners of Woods and Forests, March 28, 1859, 3 Macq. 419, 31 Scot. Jur. 431.

No. 7.

April 16, 1875. M'Douall v. Lord Advocate.

He says—"I am proprietor of the barony of Logan, and of the other lands mentioned in the conclusions of the summons. I am seventy-six years of age," (that was in the year 1872). "In 1808 I remember my father having a net for salmon fishing. We came from England in that year, and it was my great pleasure to go with him to the fishing. We had an old net and a new net. They were both draught nets. They were for drawing the shores of the bays. Almost every year since that year down to the time when they were let on lease for stake net fishing," (that was in 1856), "I assisted at fishing in the bays on both sides of the peninsula at the places where there were no rocks to prevent us. My father was in the habit of granting permission to other persons to fish, on condition of their paying a lordship of salmon and salmon trout to him at Logan House. We had both salmon and salmon trout. His father, my grandfather, was in the habit of doing the same thing since he came into the property in 1717. I have been told this by my father. My father died in 1834. I have, since I succeeded to the property, continued to grant permission on the same terms, and I have also stopped persons fishing without my permission. In 1856, for the first time, I let the salmon fishing for a money rent."

Then he is cross-examined for the Crown, and depones,—"The nets my father and I used were generally kept at the fish-pond, under the care of the fisherman, but not always. Sometimes they were kept at Longrig. Interrogated—Was not the object of your fishing to catch blockers and other white fish? Depones—No, salmon principally. One of our purposes was to get salmon for the fish-pond. Interrogated—What bays have you fished in? Depones—Port Logan. Port Gill we have tried, but without much success. Clangeard also, and on the other side, beginning with Chapel Rossan, which is on the farm of Auchness, all the bays, down to the Mull in which there was a sandy bottom. I was very fond of this fishing. I did it frequently. I am sure I did it every year. When I had a tutor I was here all the year round. I had a tutor for four years when I was at school; and afterwards when I was in the Guards, I was here always during the fishing season. The East and West Tarbets are in the Mull farm. Interrogated—Do you remember the names of the persons to whom you granted permission to fish? Depones—They were so many that I do not remember the names. Generally they were tenants."

I put aside for a moment the reference to the permissions given to fish, inasmuch as no names are mentioned here of persons to whom such permission was given; but I take the evidence as dealing with the acts and the conduct of Colonel James M'Douall himself, and of his father and grandfather, so far as his father could inform him of those acts and that conduct. It appears to me that this evidence, being wholly uncontradicted, is evidence of the clearest and most satisfactory kind of an exercise for the prescribed and requisite period of the right of salmon fishing round both sides of the peninsula opposite the property of the Laird of Logan by the father and grandfather of the present appellant. The facts which he speaks of are facts which were palpable and notorious. Everything done by the laird on one of the principal properties in that neighbourhood must have been observed and perfectly well known to the inhabitants of the neighbourhood. Six months after this evidence was given several of these inhabitants were called. They were persons who had lived on the spot. They were old men, who must have known perfectly well the accuracy or inaccuracy of the statements which I have read. The very boatman or some of the boatmen, who must have been in attendance on Colonel James M'Douall at the time he speaks of, were examined. But no single question that I can discover was asked on the part of the Crown of any one of those witnesses for the purpose of controverting these statements of fact as to what had been done by the Lairds of Logan personally in their own pursuit of salmon.

No. 7.

April 16, 1875.
M'Douall v. Lord Advocate.

A suggestion was indeed made in the cross-examination which I have read that the primary object of the fishing had been not to catch salmon, but to catch white fish. That was denied by the witness who was under cross-examination, Colonel James M'Douall. He said,—"No, salmon principally." But that connects itself with two other pieces of evidence upon the same point. I am still dealing with the intention and the object of fishing on the part of the Laird of Logan himself. Alexander M'Craken, an old boatman, says,—"I do not remember how often in a season we might draw the net. It was drawn just when Colonel M'Douall's fishermen thought proper; when he saw the trouts jumping" (the salmon trout jumping) "along the shore, he out with the net. We just drew it when he wanted us." In addition to that one of the witnesses for the Crown, Quintin Limond, depones in his re-examination,—"It was for salmon that they drew the net at Port Logan. They never drew the net till they saw the salmon come in. I don't think they ever drew for white fish there. It might be thirty-five years ago when I saw them drawing the nets at Port Logan, but I cannot say I recollect how long ago." Therefore I think your Lordships have it established on the most satisfactory evidence that so far as regards the personal acts of the Logan family, the laird for the time being for the requisite time was in the habit of drawing the net, as it is called, along his property, for the purpose of taking salmon, and with the primary object of taking salmon.

The expression "drawing the net," which I have used, is explained at length in other parts of the evidence. As I read the explanation of the term, it describes particularly the proper mode of fishing by net and coble. I do not pause to examine what the size of the meshes of the net may have been; I shall have a word to say about that afterwards. But as regards the mode of shooting the net, and bringing it round and carrying it in, it is exactly that which has been described upon various occasions on which evidence has been laid before your Lordships to be net and coble fishing.

That being the state of the evidence with reference to the acts of the Laird of Logan, it appears to me that the only suggestion which could be made upon that evidence is this,—It is very true that the Laird of Logan has been in the habit for upwards of forty years of fishing round the coast and catching salmon for his own consumption and that of his family, but then, after all, there was a general right of fishing by the public for white fish; any one of the public might have fished for white fish, and the Laird of Logan was only doing what any member of the public might be doing; he appeared to be fishing generally, and the circumstance that he caught salmon and that his own private motive in fishing was to catch salmon, would not make the appearance of his fishing different from the appearance of any other member of the public fishing round the coast.

No. 7.

April 16, 1875. M'Douall v. Lord Advocate.

That observation appeared to me to make material other evidence in the case, which is of considerable amount, and, as it appears to me upon the whole fairly given, and given without any serious discrepancy between the statements of the different witnesses. I understand that evidence to amount to a satisfactory confirmation of the general statement of Colonel James M'Douall, that he not only practised the course of fishing for salmon himself, but that he did that as a matter of right, that he asserted his right by not only following the practice himself, but by preventing others from fishing for salmon, or by making it a condition that if they did fish in a way to catch salmon they should make to him a render in return for the privilege or permission to fish. And what I read the evidence as amounting to is this—I refer particularly to the evidence of the M'Crakens, but there is other evidence of great importance, all bearing the same way—I read the evidence as establishing this fact, that there were several persons who were in the habit of fishing round the particular part of the coast of which I am speaking. They were, generally speaking, tenants of the Logan property, or retainers connected in some way with the property. They applied for permission to fish—they fished by net and coble, which is called, in the evidence I have spoken of before, draught net fishing. It is true that they caught white fish frequently and most commonly, and it is true that they appear to have been anxious to catch white fish; but they appear invariably before they fished to have sought for the permission of the Laird of Logan, or of his factor, and to have obtained that permission upon the terms sometimes that they would give up all the salmon that they caught, at other times that they would give good fish or the best fish, whether they were salmon or white fish.

Some remark was made upon the circumstance that the render was not always a render of all or some of the salmon caught, but was occasionally a render in white fish also. I can conceive nothing more natural than that arrangement. I can conceive nothing more natural than that, the Laird of Logan having in these years of which I am speaking (now long since passed) no object as regards selling, and no opportunity of selling salmon, his desire would be to have his table supplied, not always with salmon merely, but also, when he had an opportunity, with fish of other kinds, and that the natural and probable arrangement would be that his boatmen should take from those who were to give the render such fish as would be convenient to be selected, whether they might be salmon or white fish. At all events, a render there was of fish, and it was a render in return for the privilege or permission to fish. And, although there is evidence that occasionally persons fished opposite some part of the Logan property who had not received this permission, the conclusion which I draw from the evidence as to those cases is that they were doing it with a greater or less amount of secrecy, that they were doing it, feeling on their own part that they were trespassers, and that if their fishing had been known they would have been called to account, and would have been put under the same terms as the other persons were put under.

That being the result which I draw from the evidence, the question which has been raised upon the evidence which your Lordships have to consider, and the only question, appears to me to be this, on what ground was it that the Laird of Logan exercised a control over this fishing, gave the permissions which I have referred to, and insisted upon his right to prohibit fishing where the permission was not given? Was it upon the ground that he had in some way the absolute right to prevent ex adverso of his lands any fishing of any kind, whether white

No. 7.

April 16, 1875.

M'Douall v. Lord Advocate.

fishing or salmon fishing? Or was it a right of prohibition exercised and a permission given upon the footing of his property in the salmon fishing alone? If your Lordships had here a case in which, commencing with a habile title on which to found a claim of salmon fishing, you had the exercise of that right attempted to be established by a user of the right, on the one hand, on the part of the person claiming it, and a prohibition by him, on the other hand, of fishing in the sea of every kind, white fishing included, if, I say, such a case were presented to your Lordships, I am not prepared to say that the exercise on the one hand of the salmon fishing, and on the other hand the absolute prohibition submitted to, of all fishing of whatever kind, although that prohibition may have been much larger than there was any title to impose, would not have been to my mind a sufficient proof of the exercise and the enforcement of the right of salmon fishing. But it is not necessary, as it appears to me, to entertain that question, or to decide it in the present case, because I cannot, as I read this evidence, arrive at the conclusion that the prohibition to fish, where it was asserted, and the permission to fish where it was given, on the part of the Laird of Logan, was put upon any such paramount title as I have referred to,—a title to all fishing of any kind.

I cannot arrive at that conclusion, for these reasons:—In the first place, it is not asserted by Colonel M'Douall himself in the evidence which I have read, nor is it asserted in the evidence given on his behalf. Some of the old witnesses, not learned men or very accurate in their modes of expression, make general statements about leave being given to draw the nets, and so on. But it appears to me that they were speaking on the point as to which they were examined, namely, what had been done relative to the salmon fishing, and that they did not mean to lay down any general statement applicable to fishing of every kind.

But, my Lords, I will proceed on a higher ground than that. Beyond all doubt the law in Scotland is that white fishing in the sea round the whole coast of Scotland is perfectly free, and not only is it perfectly free, but there is a title on the part of the subjects to use the shore for the purpose of conducting white fishing in a proper mode. Now, it is impossible that that right, existing, as it does in Scotland, could have been a right of which the people of this locality were ignorant. They must have known perfectly well that they had the right to fish for white fish in the sea, and that no person had a right to prevent them, and I do not believe that it would have been possible at the time of which we speak for the Lairds of Logan to have asserted any such general right, or to have had that general assertion submitted to.

There is an incident which comes out in the evidence in this case which appears to me to shew this in a satisfactory way. It comes out, not in the evidence of the Laird of Logan, but in the evidence for the Crown. William M'Gan in his evidence, speaking of the time immediately after the year 1856, when the first stake net was put up under M'Creadie, says:—"After M'Creadie took the salmon fishing he interfered with me very little. On one occasion he spoke to me about my fishing. He said that I was not to come near his net or trouble it, and I said that I would not. I did not go to the Colonel about that. It was when I heard that there was no liberty to fish that I went to the Colonel to ask leave. The Colonel spoke to me about an Act of Parliament that he had about the drawing of the net. That was Queen Anne's Act. He spoke to me about that Act in M'Creadie's time. He once said to me that I was not to draw the net, but he only said that once. The Colonel when speaking about the Act of Parliament, said that he would allow me to draw the net, and that they could not stop me."

No. 7.

April 16, 1875.
M'Douall v. Lord Advocate.

One of your Lordships pointed out that the Act of Parliament to which this must refer was the Act of Queen Anne, which is not perhaps the only Act, but is one of the most important Acts, affirming the right of the public to white fishing in the sea round Scotland, and to the use of the shore for the purpose of conducting that white fishing.* It appears to me to be quite impossible to suppose that the Laird of Logan at this time can have referred to this Act upon an application by one of his tenants as shewing the general right, if he had been in the habit of contending for a right entirely in opposition to the right which was declared by that Act of Parliament.

The conclusions which I draw from the evidence are, that there is on the one hand proof of the exercise of the right personally by the Lairds of Logan themselves for the requisite period of time, and proof on the other hand of no adverse exercise of the right, but, on the contrary, of a further enjoyment of the right by them through others to whom they gave permission and from whom they received their return, so that it appears to me that the enjoyment under a habile title which the law requires is clearly established. I do not find that the Court of Session arrived at any conclusion different from that which I have arrived at upon the question of fact; I do not understand that they viewed the evidence differently from the way in which I view it; and, so far, I think the Inner-House were at one with the Lord Ordinary. But I understand the ground upon which the Court of Session felt constrained to reverse the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary was this: I understand, in the first place, that the Court of Session have taken this view, that there was not here proof of that mechanical kind or description of fishing being followed which would instruct a right of salmon fishing in the sea. I will read to your Lordships the observations of Lord Ardmillan, but I understand them to amount to this: now that it is decided that the Crown have the right of salmon fishing in the sea round the coast of Scotland it will not be sufficient to instruct a right of salmon fishing as against the Crown to shew that you have practised the salmon fishing by net and coble merely—there must be something more—there must be something of that which was called the fixed net fishing by stakes or otherwise.

Now, my Lords, this becomes an extremely important point, not merely in the present case but in other cases which may arise. Lord Ardmillan says,—"The proof of possession in the present case is, in my opinion, altogether inadequate to support the claim of Mr M'Douall to a right of salmon fishing. The ordinary and well understood mode of fishing salmon in the sea ex adverso of the Logan

---

* The statute 1705, c. 2, entitled an "Act for advancing and establishing the fishing trade in and about this kingdom," upon the narrative that, "albeit there be several good Acts already made to encourage and carry on that trade, yet they are either in desuetude, defective, or do not answer the present circumstances," enacts . . . . "Her Majesty, with advice and consent of the Estates of Parliament, authorizes and impowers all her good subjects of this kingdom to take, buy, and cure herring, and white fish, in all and sundry seas, channels, bays, firths, lochs, rivers, &c., of this Her Majestie's ancient kingdom, and islands thereto belonging, wheresoever herring or white fish are or may be taken; and for their greater conveniency, to have the free use of all ports, harbours, shores, fore-lands, and others, for bringing in, pickling, unloading and loading the same, upon payment of the ordinary dues where harbours are built. . . . ."

No. 7.

April 16, 1875.
M'Douall v. Lord Advocate.

estate was certainly introduced for the first time in 1856, about seventeen years ago. We know that such fishing was first introduced on the coast of Ayrshire, a good many years before that date, I think about 1838, but not so long ago as to amount to prescriptive possession." So that his Lordship's judgment, if I understand it rightly, would go to this, that as regards salmon fishing in the sea there cannot be prescriptive possession against the Crown, because this which the learned Judge calls "the well understood mode of salmon fishing in the sea," was not introduced at the time when the prescriptive possession must be shewn to have commenced. (This was ascertained in the case of Carlton.[1])" Lord Ardmillan continues,—"Therefore unless Mr M'Douall has been able to instruct some kind of possession different from the usual and appropriate and recognised mode of fishing by net and coble, he cannot carry back his possession to a period earlier than 1856. We have here no case of salmon fishing till within twenty years, and no salmon fishing distinct from other fishing." . . . "I need not enlarge on this point; I think it free from doubt; and I concur in the remarks which have been made in the case of the Duke of Sutherland v. Ross,[2] and other cases as to requiring proof of possession by the recognised and appropriate mode of fishing."

My Lords, this appears to me to raise a question of very great importance. We all know that until the decision of this House in the Kintore case,[3] in the year 1828, it was not understood in Scotland that stake net fishing in the sea was lawful. This House decided that it was lawful; but we know, as matter of history, that a very considerable interval after that elapsed before stake net fishing became at all general in the sea in Scotland, and for this obvious reason, that at the time when there was little or no consumption of salmon, except such as was local, enough salmon could be procured to answer the requirements by the ordinary old and much more inexpensive mode of fishing by net and coble. When salmon became a more valuable commodity persons were found who were willing to go to a greater expense in establishing fixed engines and fixed nets in the sea for the purpose of taking salmon. Then, as we have had occasion to see, stake nets were resorted to; but that did not occur in the present case until the year 1856. Now, as I understand the reasoning of Lord Ardmillan, it is this:—In the Sutherland case, the case of the Shinn river, it was held, as it has been held in many other cases, that the proper mode for a river, of practising salmon fishing under a title, being by net and coble, any fishing by rod goes for nothing. It is not the appropriate mode by which to gain a prescriptive title. Then, says Lord Ardmillan, stake net fishing in the sea having now become the great and wholesale way of catching salmon, stake net fishing in the sea stands towards fishing by net and coble in the same relation that net and coble fishing in a river stands to rod fishing. Rod fishing in a river will not give you a prescriptive title where you have not net and coble fishing. So in the sea, net and coble fishing will not give you a title where you should have the greater and larger mode of fishing by stake net.

I must say this is a principle which is, to my mind, altogether novel. I do not know any authority for it, and I look with some anxiety upon the introduction of such a principle. Its introduction would, I fear, lead to a repetition of [1] Lord Advocate v. Cathcart, May 19, 1871, 9 Macph 744, 43 Scot. Jur. 500.

[2] Duke of Sutherland v. Ross, June 11, 1836, 14 S. 960, 16 Scot. Jur. 420.
[3] Earl of Kintore v. Forbes, 1828, 3 W. and S. 261.

No. 7.

April 16, 1875. M'Douall v. Lord Advocate.

the remark once made by Lord Eldon in this House with regard to the salmon fishing decisions in Scotland, that they had gone to lengths which it was extremely difficult to justify upon any other hypothesis but that the Judges had introduced principles of law, for the first time, applicable to salmon fishing alone. My Lords, I cannot recognise this principle which I find here laid down, that stake net fishing is "the ordinary and well understood mode of salmon fishing in the sea," and the mode by which a prescriptive title is to be obtained. It is perfectly true to say that you have this incident with regard to net and coble fishing in the sea that you have not in a river. Net and coble fishing in a river can be only for the purpose of catching salmon, but net and coble fishing in the sea may be, and very often is, for the purpose of catching both salmon and white fish, and it may be a very proper inquiry to make in every case, was the net and coble-fishing in the sea, upon which you rely, intended and used for the purpose of taking salmon, or was it merely used in pursuit of white fish, and was the taking of salmon merely an accident and not part of the object or aim of the fishing? That may be a very proper inquiry, but even as to that the same observation may be made with regard to stake net fishing, because stake net fishing, as you have heard in the present case from Mr M'Creadie, results in the capture not only of salmon but also of white fish, and although the probability is that so expensive a mode of fishing would not be used for white fishing, still there is nothing to prevent its being so used. Therefore, my Lords, I am bound to express my dissent from the first ground of the decision of Lord Ardmillan, though it is agreed to by the other Judges.

The second ground, as I understand it, is this, that with regard to the ownership claimed to be exercised by the Lairds of Logan in connection with permission given and prohibitions to others, that was done not with reference to the salmon fishing, but with reference to all fishing of every kind. I have already commented upon the evidence as to that. It appears to me to be neither a necessary nor a fair inference from the evidence, and to be one which ought not to be drawn.

The third ground of the decision of Lord Ardmillan is this, that in the year 1856, after the tack was made to Mr M'Creadie, and the stake net fishing introduced, persons were allowed by Mr M'Creadie to go on fishing with draught nets (the net and coble) as they had done before, at all events, to some extent as they had done before. My Lords, it appears to me to be impossible to say that that can alter in any way the rights, whatever they were, of the Laird of Logan. It was for Mr M'Creadie, having got the tack which he had received, to consider how far he would insist upon his extreme rights. He may have been satisfied with the quantity of salmon he was able to catch in his stake nets, and may have been quite indifferent as to one or two or more persons doing their best with their draught nets, or net and coble. That, to my mind, cannot possibly alter the rights of the Laird of Logan.

My Lords, those are the grounds which I find in the judgment of the Inner-House. They do not take a different view of the facts from the view which I take, and which is taken by the Lord Ordinary. They take a different view as to the conclusions and inferences to be drawn from those facts. I arrive in the result at the conclusion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary was in the main correct.

There are two minor questions which I have to advert to before I have done. An argument was raised whether, if this right was established on the part of the Laird of Logan, it was a right extending along the whole of the coast belonging to him on either side of the peninsula. It was pointed out, and truly, that there were parts of the coast, certainly on the west side, and perhaps on both sides, where no salmon fishing had taken place. We find that the coast is, very much on the west side and partly on both sides, so constituted that there are parts of it where no salmon fishing can take place, and other parts where salmon fishing can be conducted, namely, in bays and smoother parts of the coast where it is not rocky and iron-bound. If your Lordships find that a right of salmon fishing was exercised on both sides in all the bays and places where salmon fishing could be conveniently exercised, I think your Lordships will arrive at the conclusion that it would be quite impossible to make a division between different parts of the coast, and to say that the exercise of the right of salmon fishing in all the places where salmon fishing could possibly be carried on is not a sufficient proof to carry the right for the whole of the coast which is held under the same title.

No. 7.

April 16, 1875.
M'Douall v. Lord Advocate.

My observations as to the larger part of the case where there is a baronial title will apply also to the smaller piece of land called Crichen, which, although not held under a baronial title, is held under a title which contains the words "cum piscationibus." But there appears to be in the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary a reference to another piece of land called "the five merk land of Carrachtree." It appears to me not to be controverted on either side that that is an inland piece of ground upon which there can be no salmon fishing; therefore it seems to have crept into the interlocutor per incuriam, and it must, as it seems to me, be excluded.

Upon the whole case I submit to your Lordships that the interlocutor appealed from must be reversed, and the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary restored, omitting that reference to "the five merk land of Carrachtree," and of course there should be a declaration that the reclaiming note to the Inner-House ought to have been refused, with expenses.

LORD HATHERLEY.—I fully concur in the view which has been expressed by my noble and learned friend the Lord Chancellor with reference to the decision which it is incumbent on this House to arrive at upon the evidence before the House, and upon the state of the law applicable to that evidence.

It would have been extremely to be regretted if this case had been entirely, as I at first thought it was, a matter on which the House had to arrive at a conclusion on conflicting evidence. Nothing, I think, could be more inexpedient than that it should be reserved for the Court of last resort to decide upon conflicting testimony, instead of upon facts ascertained either by a jury or by a Court below, before whom witnesses have been examined.

But it appears to me that there is not the slightest conflict of evidence of any substantial character in this case. The difference between the Lord Ordinary and the Inner-House seems to be mainly reduced to that point which was indicated by Lord Ardmillan—namely, whether or not the evidence as it was given on the part of the defender, and taken as undisputed on the part of the Crown, was sufficient to instruct such a possession of the right claimed as is necessary by the law of Scotland. Now, that law sanctions a right of salmon fishing as vested in an owner of property under a habile title when possession of the salmon fishing has accompanied that habile title. And that possession, the Lord Advocate told us, in addressing the House, must be a possession for forty years,

No. 7.

April 16, 1875.
M'Douall v. Lord Advocate.

shown by the user of taking the fish continually during that time in the accustomed mode, and exclusive of the right of all other parties, including, of course, the Crown. I have not much to object to in the law as laid down in that proposition, beyond saying that the question of the "accustomed mode" is open to observation, and it is upon the question of the accustomed mode that the difference will probably be found to exist between the conclusion of the Inner-House and the conclusion of the Lord Ordinary, to which your Lordships are, I believe, unanimously of opinion that we also ought to arrive.

That there is evidence here of taking salmon, and evidence of the right to take salmon being claimed by exclusive title, is, I think, beyond all possibility of contradiction.

What is there wanting to make out a complete title, unless it be with reference to a requirement of the law as laid down by the Lord Advocate, namely, that the exercise of the right must be in the accustomed mode? I apprehend, my Lords, that that term "accustomed mode" cannot be held to mean that for all time a particular mode and no other shall be used for catching fish. The mode must vary from time to time as improvements are suggested. What seems to have led to some degree of misapprehension on that subject is this,—In order to establish this right you must shew that you have fished in a lawful mode. I have no doubt also that it must not be a mode which simply indicates, as fishing by an angle would, that some persons have been allowed to fish for pleasure. Non-interference with an angler will not have the same effect as non-interference by the Crown with a person who is sweeping the whole body of the fish into his net, and therefore the simple fact that people have from time to time been allowed to angle will not be enough to instruct an exclusive right as against the Crown. That is reasonable enough, but what is proved in this case? You have fishing proved first of all by draught net and then by stake net, when it was found that stake nets could be used in the sea. I apprehend that the notion of your being obliged to prove that the fishing has been in the accustomed mode only comes to this, that in order to instruct the right, the user must be of a character such as would be necessary in an exactly analogous state of things in a claim to a right by custom in this country. It must not be a right exercised tam Marte quam Mercurio. The right cannot be acquired by fishing by an unlawful mode. The right cannot be acquired by a casual casting of a line to take fish here and there, or angling for sport. It is to be a right plainly asserted of catching fish in a lawful and effective manner, shewing a distinct intention to claim the right of exercising your power over all the fish that you claim under the habile title which you produce.

Lord Selborne.—My Lords, I agree with the rest of your Lordships.

It is said that in cases of this class the evidence of the right to salmon fishing ought to be "clear, continuous, exclusive, and unequivocal." I do not inquire whether this really means more than that there is a strong onus probandi laid upon the person making the claim. But in the present case, taking these words most strictly, if the evidence satisfies the last condition, that of being "unequivocal," it satisfies all the rest. It is clear, because there is in truth no real controversy as to the facts,—continuous, because it extends over the whole period from 1808 to the commencement of the action in 1872, and exclusive, because the right of excluding the public from these fishings was unquestionably asserted and exercised by the owners of the Logan estate, and was practically submitted to by the general public. Does, then, the evidence also satisfy the condition of being unequivocal? I apprehend that what is required for that purpose is only that the evidence should relate specifically to salmon fishing carried on in a lawful and proper manner, as distinct from fishing of any other kind. The accidental capture of salmon by persons fishing for other fish would, no doubt, be insufficient to satisfy this condition, but, on the other hand, the capture of white fish by those claiming the right of salmon fishing, or by other persons fishing with their leave, would not prevent acts done for the express and specific purpose of taking salmon from being unequivocal.

No. 7.

April 16, 1875.
M'Douall v. Lord Advocate.

It appears to me that the evidence of Colonel James M'Douall (confirmed as to Port Logan by that of James Goudie) proves unequivocally (if credit is given to it) the habitual capture of salmon as of right by the proprietors of Logan from 1808, or earlier, till 1856, and it is not disputed that since 1856 the same right has been claimed and exercised in a manner which, if connected with a sufficient length of previous user, would be enough to establish the appellant's title. The evidence of Colonel James M'Douall is not only itself unshaken, but it is confirmed by other witnesses who speak of acts distinctly and specifically referable to the assertion and exercise of the right of salmon fishing by the proprietors of Logan at various places on both coasts, and at various times, extending over more than the necessary period. Some of the witnesses who prove these facts are witnesses for the Crown. The evidence of David M'Clymont (applicable to the year 1825), that of Alexander M'Craken (applicable, as to the west coast, to the six years from 1825 to 1831, and as to the east coast, to the whole subsequent period), that of Quintin Limond as to Port Logan, applicable to 1837, appear to me to be distinctly and emphatically of this character, and the rest of the evidence, interpreted in the light of the facts which these witnesses prove, is consistent with and confirms and strengthens it. The known state of the law as to the public right of fishing and drawing nets for white fish is also inconsistent with the supposition that the claim of a right to exclude the public from fishing and drawing nets upon the shores of the Logan estate was referable or could have been understood as referring to anything else than an exclusive claim to salmon and salmon fishing, which would render necessary the permission of the proprietor in all cases in which any salmon might be caught and brought to shore, whether by persons fishing for white fish or by those whose principal object might be the capture of salmon.

Interlocutors appealed from reversed: The Lord Ordinary's interlocutor of the 16th January 1873 restored, with the omission of the "five merk lands of Carrachtree:" Declared that the reclaiming note in the Court of Session against the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor of the 16th January 1873 ought to have been repelled, with expenses.

PRESTON KARSLAKE—HUNTER, BLAIR, & COWAN, W.S.—HORACE WATSON—DONALD BEITH, W.S.

No. 8.
May 3, 1875.
Learmonth, &c. v. Miller.

THOMAS LEARMONTH AND OTHERS (Mr and Mrs Finlay's Marriage-Contract Trustees), Defenders and Appellants.—Lord-Adv. Gordon—W. Pearson, Q.C.
JOHN MILLER (Finlay's Trustee), Pursuer and Respondent.—J. Pearson, Q.C.—J. T. Anderson.

Husband and Wife—Postnuptial Contract—Provision—Mutual Contract—Retention—Conjugal Rights Act, 1861 (24 and 25 Vict. c. 86), sec. 16—Bankruptcy.—By postnuptial contract in 1852 a husband and wife who had no antenuptial marriage-contract conveyed to trustees £2600, to which the wife was entitled from her deceased father's estate, while the husband became bound to pay in 1862 a sum of £1999 to the trustees for the purposes of the trust, and in the meantime to grant security therefor, either heritable or by insuring his life to the amount, and assigning the policy to the trustees, and paying to them an annual premium, or, in their option, a single payment sufficient to redeem the annual payments. The purposes of the trust were to pay the liferent of the trust-funds to the husband, and after his decease to the wife if she should survive him, and the fee to the children nati and nascituri. These provisions were declared to be alimentary. The husband did not implement his obligation by granting security or otherwise, and he became bankrupt in 1860.

In a question between the marriage-contract trustees and the trustee on the bankrupt's estate, held (aff. judgment of Second Division), (1) that the husband's right to the annual proceeds of the £2600 was vested in the trustee on his sequestrated estate; (2) that the marriage-contract trustees were not entitled to retain the income, on the ground that the husband had failed to fulfil the obligation he had undertaken; and (3) that the wife was not entitled to a present provision under the Conjugal Rights Act out of the income of the £2600 so payable to the husband.

Ld. Chancellor (Cairns).
Ld. Hatherley.
Ld. O'Hagan.

(IN the Court of Session November 21, 1871, 10 Macph. 107.)

In 1845 John Finlay married Mary Anne Alexander, eldest daughter of Mr Alexander, proprietor of the Theatre Royal, Glasgow. There was no antenuptial contract of marriage entered into between them.

Mr Alexander died on 15th December 1851, leaving considerable estate. As there was no contract of marriage between him and his wife, his daughter, Mrs Finlay, had right to her share of legitim out of her father's moveable estate.

On 28th February 1852 Mr and Mrs Finlay executed a postnuptial contract, whereby they conveyed to the defenders as trustees the whole estates, heritable and moveable, belonging or which should belong to Mrs Finlay, and particularly "all right, title, and interest which she or the said John Finlay, her husband, now have or may hereafter have in the succession or estates" of her deceased father.

By this deed Mr Finlay bound himself to pay, on or before 1st January 1862, £1999 to the trustees for the purposes of the trust, and to open and keep up policies of insurance on his life or to grant security over his heritable estate in their person for that sum.

He also thereby renounced his jus mariti over the estate then belonging or which should thereafter belong to his wife, declaring the same unaffectable by his creditors or by his debts and deeds.

The second purpose of the trust created by the postnuptial contract was "for payment of the free yearly proceeds of the trust-estate to the said John Finlay during his life, for his liferent use allenarly, and, after his death, in the event of his being survived by his said wife, in trust for the payment to the said Mrs Mary Anne Alexander or Finlay, in like manner, of the free yearly proceeds of the trust-estate during her life, for her liferent use allenarly; and after the death of the survivors of the said spouses, in trust for the whole children born and to be born of the marriage between the said John Finlay and Mrs Mary Anne Finlay."

No. 8.

May 8, 1875.
Learmonth, &c. v. Miller.

The deed contained the following clause:—"It is hereby expressly provided and declared that the whole of the foresaid provisions, as well those in favour of the spouses as those in favour of the children of this present marriage, and their interest in the present trust, shall be nowise attachable for debt, but that the same shall be considered alimentary."

Mr Finlay did not implement the obligations undertaken by him in the marriage-contract by granting security or otherwise. His estates were sequestrated in 1860, and Mr John Miller, accountant, Glasgow, appointed trustee thereon.

In an action raised in 1863 by the defenders, as trustees under the postnuptial contract, against Mr Finlay and the trustee on his sequestrated estate and others, it was decided by judgments of the Court of Session and of the House of Lords that the defenders were entitled to recover and receive the sum of £2600, being the amount of the legitim due to Mrs Finlay from the estate of her father, with interest from 15th December 1851, the date of his death; and to hold and administer the same for the purpose of the trust declared in the postnuptial contract between Mr and Mrs Finlay, all questions in reference to the right to the interest or annual proceeds of the said legitim fund from that date being reserved.[1]

The present action was then raised by the trustee on Mr Finlay's sequestrated estate for the purpose of having it found and declared that he had right to the whole annual proceeds of the said sum of £2600 from 15th December 1851, and so long as the sequestration should subsist during Mr Finlay's life, and of obtaining decree against the postnuptial contract trustees ordaining them to make payment of the same to him accordingly.[2]

The pursuer pleaded;—1. The legitim to which Mrs Finlay became entitled on her father's death vested absolutely at that date in the said John Finlay jure mariti, and, having so vested, the said John Finlay had no power to confer on himself and place beyond the diligence of his creditors a liferent alimentary provision out of the same. 2. The liferent provision conferred by the said John Finlay on himself by the postnuptial contract in question fell under the sequestration of his estates, and was carried to the pursuer as trustee in the sequestration by virtue of his act and warrant. 4. The defenders' plea, founded on the Conjugal Rights Act, ought to be repelled, in respect that (1) Mrs Finlay succeeded to the legitim in question before the said Act came into operation; (2) the right to the said legitim had vested in Mr Finlay jure mariti, and was in the possession of him, and of the pursuer, as trustee on his sequestrated estate, within the meaning of the said Act, before Mrs Finlay's claim for provision out of the same was made; (3) it is incompetent to claim such provision in this action; (4) the said claim is excluded by the marriage-contract; and (5) the provision claimed is excessive.

The defenders averred,—"Mr Finlay, in consequence of his bankruptcy and ill health, has been unable to fulfil the obligations undertaken by him in the marriage-contract. He has neither supported his wife and

---

[1] Miller v. Learmonth, H. of L., May 17, 1870, 42 Scot. Jur. 418.

[2] Another case between the parties to the present action in relation to another part of Mr Alexander's succession is reported under the name Miller v. Finlay's Trustees, Feb. 25, 1875, supra, House of Lords cases, p. 1.

No. 8.
May 3, 1875.
Learmonth, &c. v. Miller.

children in a manner suitable to their station in life, nor has he paid over to the defenders, the marriage-contract trustees, all or any part of the sum which he undertook and bound and obliged himself by the contract to pay. He failed to procure the policy or policies of insurance on his life required by the contract. And neither he nor the pursuer has offered or is now willing to fulfil any of these obligations."

The defenders pleaded;—1. The postnuptial contract being a mutual and onerous deed, the liferent alimentary provision thereby constituted for behoof of Mr Finlay, in which his wife and children have an interest, must receive effect; and, separatim, the moveable fund, which has become available for the purposes of the trust having been a portion of Mrs Finlay's patrimony, the disposal of the interest thereof, during Mr Finlay's life, was an equitable and reasonable provision, in which Mrs Finlay had an interest, and was therefore not revocable and not affected by the sequestration of Mr Finlay's estates. 3. Mr Finlay and the pursuer having failed to aliment and educate the children of the marriage, or to procure the policy or policies of insurance, and fulfil the other obligations in said contract, the defenders are entitled to retain the sums sued for as against them. 4. Mrs Finlay, and the defenders, her marriage-contract trustees, are entitled at common law, as well as under the Conjugal Rights Act, 1861, to the liferent of the legitim fund in question, which is no more than a reasonable provision out of her own patrimony, and of which neither Mr Finlay nor the pursuer have ever obtained possession.

A proof was led before the Lord Ordinary, who afterwards pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that the life interest or provision made in favour of John Finlay by the postnuptial contract of marriage between him and his wife libelled on fell under the sequestration of the estates of the said John Finlay, and is vested in the pursuer as trustee for behoof of the creditors in the said sequestration: Therefore finds, declares, and decerns in terms of the declaratory conclusion of the libel, in so far as regards the whole interests, dividends, or other annual profits or proceeds which have accrued upon the sum of £2600 libelled, from and since 15th December 1851, and also in so far as regards the whole interests, dividends, or other annual profits or proceeds which shall accrue or become due upon the said sum of £2600, so long as the said sequestration shall subsist during the life of the said John Finlay, together with any interest which has or shall become due upon the said interest, dividends, or other annual profits and proceeds: And appoints the cause to be put to the roll, in order that it may be proceeded with in accordance with these findings."

The defenders having reclaimed, the Second Division pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall the following words in said interlocutor, 'so long as the said sequestration shall subsist': Quoad ultra adhere to the said interlocutor, reserving to the defenders any claim of retention they may be able to instruct over the fund in question in respect of expense incurred in the administration of the trust: Find the pursuer entitled to expenses since the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and reserve all other question of expenses."

The defenders appealed.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords, the first question argued at the bar related to the character and the effect of the provision contained in the postnuptial contract of marriage of the 28th of February 1852, between Mr and Mrs Finlay, so far as regards the life-interest of Mr Finlay. At the time that the postnuptial settlement was executed, Mr Alexander, the father of Mrs Finlay, had died, and as one of his children she was entitled to a certain sum under the head of legitim, a sum which was afterwards ascertained to be £2600. The legitim to which she was entitled was in law the property, at the time to which I am referring, of her husband. He might have done anything that he pleased with it. It was as much his money, and disposable by him, as any other sum of money of the same amount which might have been in his possession.

No. 8.

May 3, 1875.
Learmonth, &c. v. Miller.

I shall first refer to the trust which was declared in the deed of 1852 concerning this sum, and I shall read the deed as if it related to this sum only, in the first instance. Reading it in that way, the second head of the trust is this—"In trust for the payment of the free yearly proceeds of the sum of £2600 to the said John Finlay during his life for his liferent use allenarly, and after his death, in the event of his being survived by his wife, in trust for the payment to the said Mrs Mary Anne Alexander or Finlay in like manner of the free yearly proceeds of the £2600 during her lifetime, for her liferent use allenarly, and, after the death of the survivors of the said spouses, in trust for the whole children born or to be born of the marriage between the spouses." Then it says further on,—"It is hereby expressly provided and declared that the whole of the foresaid provisions, as well those in favour of the spouses as those in favour of the children of this present marriage, and their interest in the present trust, shall be nowise attachable for debt, but that the same shall be considered alimentary."

A question was raised upon this by the Lord Advocate, which, as I understand it, was of this nature: Whether this condition that the provisions of the trust should be considered alimentary amounted to a stipulation that the liferent use of the husband should be considered alimentary, not merely for his own benefit, but for the benefit of the wife and children. My Lords, I apprehend that no such construction could be put upon the deed. There is a cumulative provision that all the trusts should be considered alimentary, and the meaning of it is that they should be considered alimentary for each of the persons in succession who were to benefit by the trusts. Applying it to the case of the husband, it is a stipulation with regard to his liferent use that that liferent use of his should be in nowise attachable for his debts, but should be considered alimentary for his benefit.

That being the construction of the deed, there arises the question,—Is a stipulation of this kind in a postnuptial contract permissible and valid according to the law of Scotland? According to the law of England it clearly would be invalid, and, as I understand the law of Scotland, it is invalid equally by it. It is an attempt made by an owner of property to place his property in such a position that on the one hand he shall have the benefit of it until he becomes bankrupt, and on the other hand he shall prevent his creditors or his trustee in bankruptcy from taking it for the payment of his debts.

My Lords, I asked whether there was any instance where the owner of property in a contract for valuable consideration was found entitled to make a provision of that kind. I do not desire to express any opinion whether it could or could not be done, but no instance has, as a matter of fact, been adduced at your Lordships' bar where it has been held valid. Even although it may be considered that this postnuptial contract is an onerous contract, and has consideration in it for some of its provisions, yet it appears to me that it cannot be maintained that for this provision made by Mr Finlay with regard to his own property and for his own benefit, there was any consideration whatever moving him or influencing him in making that disposition. It was a disposition in trust made and created by him for his own benefit, and which he was not moved to create by any consideration paid to him for so doing. It was therefore a disposition to be viewed in every respect as one of those dispositions not admitted by the Scotch law, where a man withdraws or attempts to withdraw his own property from the reach of his creditors.

No. 8.

May 3, 1875. Learmonth, &c. v. Miller.

I arrive therefore at the conclusion that this is a case in which the proviso against the right of creditors in the liferent provision of the husband cannot be held to operate.

Then, say the appellants, here is a contract containing various provisions,—There is the provision for the liferent of the husband—there are provisions by the husband by which he is bound to give a bond for £1999, payable, that sum, for the purpose of the settlement at the end of ten years, and to insure his life in the meantime, or give heritable security for the purpose of implementing his obligation,—and the husband not having done any of these things it is not right that he should claim the advantage and benefit of the postnuptial contract, and at the same time be a defaulter in the fulfilment of the obligations which it imposes upon him. Now, my Lords, there is no doubt that there is a principle in the Scotch law, as there is a principle in the law of England as administered in the Courts of Equity, that any person who is a party to a complex contract or obligation cannot be permitted to take the benefits of that contract, carry them away, and enjoy them, and at the same time repudiate the obligations placed upon him by the contract. That is a principle depending not upon any technical rule of law, but upon the first principles of equity and of justice.

But let us see how it is proposed to apply that rule to the present case. I turn to the pleas in law for the defenders, and I find the first plea describes very aptly the process of reasoning by which that proposition is sought to be supported. That plea says,—"The postnuptial contract being a mutual and onerous deed, and neither the husband, nor the pursuer as coming in his place, having fulfilled or being ready to fulfil the obligations thereby undertaken by him as the consideration and counterpart of the liferent alimentary provision, the pursuer is not entitled to recover the sums sued for."

Now, my Lords, is it the fact that the obligations undertaken by the spouse in this case, viz., to provide the £1999, and to insure his life, and to give heritable security, were undertaken by him "as the consideration and counterpart of the liferent alimentary provision,"—that is to say, that in order to bribe and induce him to undertake to provide the £1999 he retained for himself and put in trust the liferent provision of his own money? The statement of the proposition in this compendious form shews at once how absurd it is. If the liferent had been given him by some one else, then it might well have been said that that was valuable consideration for the obligations which he undertook. But when your Lordships consider that the truth and substance of the matter is this, that he merely failed to denude himself to the extent of his liferent of that which was his own absolute property, you see at once that there was no consideration whatever moving him as the counterpart of the obligation which he undertook.

Suppose that in place of its being a case where there was a carving out of a life interest, and a disposition by way of trust of the remainder ultra the life interest, this legitim fund of £2600 had been divided into two halves, and suppose that the deed had provided that the trustees of this postnuptial contract should receive the £2600, and then, having the whole in their hands, should pay over to the husband one-half of the whole, and should hold the other half in settlement for the wife and for the children,—in that state of things, could any person contend for a moment that that £1300 of the husband's own money, simply placed in his own hands, where it ought to be, was a consideration paid to him to induce him to enter into the obligation to pay £1999, and to insure his life? And, my Lords, what difference does it make that the division of the interest of the £2600 is not made by way of placing £1300 upon the one side and £1300 on the other, but is made by way of carving out a life interest and disposing of the remainder?

The general principle upon which this argument is founded—a salutary and well recognised principle—has really no application to the present case, and is only attempted to be applied from the circumstance that this deed may perhaps rightly be called an onerous deed as regards some of its provisions. But it does not by any means follow that the consideration of the deed governs the carving out of the life interest which was reserved to the husband. When the matter is considered in its true bearing the trustee in the sequestration is not claiming this money—the life interest of the husband—under the deed, he is claiming it as that interest which no doubt is mentioned in the deed because it was necessary to mention it to shew the succession in which the property was to be enjoyed, but is mentioned in the deed only for that purpose, and is nothing more than a portion of the original absolute dominium which the truster, the husband, had over the whole of the property.

That brings me to the question whether the appellants are entitled to something under the Conjugal Rights Act. That Act came into operation in 1861. The bankruptcy in this case occurred in the year 1860. If we were to look to those dates alone, it appears to me that the bankruptcy having occurred before the Conjugal Rights Act, it would almost be impossible, if not altogether impossible, having regard to the mode in which that Act is worded, to apply it to a bankruptcy which had occurred previously, because what it provides is this,—"When a married woman succeeds to property, or acquires right to it by donation, bequest, or any other means than by the exercise of her own industry, the husband, or his creditors, or any other person claiming under or through him, shall not be entitled to claim the same as falling within the communio bonorum, or under the jus mariti or husband's right of administration, except on the condition of making therefrom a reasonable provision for the support and maintenance of the wife if a claim therefor be made on her behalf." Then there is a proviso,—"Provided always that no claim for such provision shall be competent to the wife if before it be made by her the husband, or his assignee or disponee, shall have obtained complete and lawful possession of the property; or, in the case of a creditor of the husband, where he has, before such claim is made by the wife, attached the property by decree of adjudication or arrestment." And then we have the Scotch Bankruptcy Act,[1] providing that the title of the trustee in the sequestration was to be judged of on the hypothesis that he had obtained possession of the moveable property. I apprehend that if it were necessary to decide the question it would be found that these considerations would make it altogether impossible to apply the Act of 1861 to a bankruptcy which occurred in the year 1860.

[1] 19 and 20 Vict. c. 79, sec. 102.

No. 8.

May 3, 1875. Learmonth, &c. v. Miller.

But I doubt whether it is necessary to consider that question, because the husband was entitled to the legitim fund during his lifetime jure mariti. He might have possessed and spent the whole of it. In place of that, by an arrangement between him and his wife, covering other property, covering the £1999 which I have referred to, which he covenanted to provide, covering all other property which the wife might become entitled to or was entitled to at the time, it was arranged that the husband, according to the view I have already expressed, should retain upon the £2600 a life interest out of his dominium, that then that trust fund should be limited in liferent to the wife in remainder, and then the fee of it to the children of the marriage. It appears to me that thereby there was effected by the parties themselves, when they were competent to do so, and when the husband was solvent, an arrangement which operated as a settlement of this £2600, and that thereby out of that sum the wife obtained that amount of provision which she was satisfied to take, having regard to all the provisions of the deed of trust.

It appears to me that it would be impossible to maintain that the Conjugal Rights Act was intended to undo an arrangement of that kind, to make a new settlement of property which had thus been settled once for all, and to give to the wife a greater amount of interest in property of that kind than she obtained in virtue of the settlement. Upon that ground alone, I submit to your Lordships that it would be impossible to apply the Conjugal Rights Act to the present case.

Upon the whole, therefore, I advise your Lordships that the interlocutors appealed from ought to be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed, with costs.

Lord Hatherley.—I entirely agree in the opinion that has been expressed by my noble and learned friend the Lord Chancellor. It is certainly greatly to be regretted that this point could not have been determined once for all when the previous appeal was before your Lordships' House. It seems not to have been decided on that occasion what should be done with reference to the income of the trust fund under this settlement, and there being some little variation between the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary and the interlocutor of the Judges of the Inner-House as to the question of the right in this income, there appearing to be at all events a possible conflict as to the wording of the interlocutors in that respect, this House, I think upon the suggestion of my noble and learned friend the present Lord Chancellor, inserted a special saving clause in deciding upon the former appeal, which has now left it open to the parties to raise the present contest, namely, an express reservation of all rights as regards the interest of the legitim fund.

Now, as regards the matter in dispute here, namely, the interest of the husband by way of liferent in the sum of £2600, the moment it is distinctly understood how that sum was affected by the deed it appears to me that there must be an end of all controversy, because there is no question of law really in dispute upon the present occasion. It is admitted on all hands that the law of Scotland allows that to be done which cannot be done modo et forma in the same way in this country; the law of Scotland allows provision aliunde to be made for a man, which shall at the same time vest in him the property, and declare that the provision is alimentary and not attachable by creditors. On the other hand, it is equally clear that by the law of Scotland a man cannot so deal with his own property as to make a provision of that description to the detriment and defeating of his creditors. Is this a provision coming aliunde as a part of the bargain made between the parties to the deed, or is it simply a portion of his own dominium over his own property, which portion he has not alienated, and which therefore remains of the same quality as it was before he proceeded to deal with the property by the deed? My Lords, the House by its former decision has affirmed the validity of the deed as regards the wife and children.[1] But the question as to the husband was left open. However, when you look to what was done by the deed it is impossible, as it appears to me, to contend that the husband has parted with anything more than all the right to the fund which may accrue after his death, for the benefit of the parties who are to take it, subject to his reserving to himself a life interest in it. He parts, in other words, with the reversion; he retains the life interest; and that life interest so retained remains his property, as it appears to me, just in the same manner (as it was put by my noble and learned friend the Lord Chancellor) as if it were half the fund instead of being the life interest in the fund.

No. 8.
May 3, 1875.
Learmonth, &c. v. Miller.

The law that a man cannot make an alimentary provision out of his own property for his own benefit effectual against his creditors does not apply to this case, because this is not a fund which can be taken as having been so disposed of by virtue of the deed; in other words, it is his old interest which remains in it. It is that portion so remaining in it which is not touched or affected by the deed. He retains that life interest, and so retaining that life interest it passes to his trustee in the sequestration. That trustee says, —"I do not want anything whatever under the deed. I claim that which the deed has not disposed of, namely, that which remains in my debtor undisposed of, that is to say, the life interest in the fund the whole of which he had originally, but the reversion to which he has parted with by the operation of the deed."

That being so, my Lords, the second question does not arise—that is, the question as to the retaining the fund on the part of the trustee to answer some other obligations under the deed. The trustee under the sequestration is in a position to say, as the owner would have said previous to his bankruptcy—I do not come here to claim anything by virtue of the deed. I come here to claim all that which, notwithstanding the deed, still remains in me, and to which I have an unquestionable right.

Mr Pearson raised an ingenious argument, which is absolutely untenable He said that by the law of Scotland a man may renounce the jus mariti, and he may renounce it as against creditors; then having renounced the jus mariti, as he does by the anterior part of this deed, any right coming to him through the medium of his wife ceases to be his and becomes the wife's, and becoming the wife's it is settled in such a way as to give him a life interest in it under the deed. That is transparent, and no Court could for a moment be misled by it. It is quite clear that he cannot by that sort of shifting of his cards make that to be not his which is his. If he renounces his jus mariti on the one hand, and takes it back immediately on the other by means of a life interest, I apprehend that is not such a settlement of property on his behalf as could possibly be maintained as a settlement made for him by some third party, upon which he could rely as being a protection in consequence of the particular form of the donation, namely, a donation of an alimentary character.

[1] Miller v. Learmonth, &c., May 17, 1870, 42 Scot. Jur. 418.

No. 8.

May 3, 1875. Learmonth, &c. v. Miller.

As to the third and only remaining point, with reference to the Conjugal Rights Act, it is a sufficient answer to say that that Act was passed in 1861, and that the bankruptcy in this case took place in 1860; because, although the Act may be held to have been retrospective as to a woman married before the Act, yet it would he very difficult to suppose that the Act could have been intended to have such effect as this (no such effect being pointed at by it)—that although a right had actually become vested in the trustee under the sequestration, just as if he had purchased the right for valuable consideration from the liferenter, yet he should be divested of it and a fresh settlement made. But perhaps a still more complete answer is that given by my noble and learned friend the Lord Chancellor, who says that the Act does not contemplate cases where deeds of arrangement have been previously entered into between the husband and wife, but only those cases where, no arrangement having been made, it was thought proper that the wife should not be deprived of all interest in the husband's property without some provision being made for her. But when the parties have themselves made such provision there is no necessity for calling in the Act.

On these grounds, therefore, my Lords, I think the appeal should be dismissed.

Lord O'Hagan.—My Lords, I am of the same opinion. The case appears to me to be tolerably clear in all its branches.

On the first and main question the law is not disputed, and there is no controversy of fact. An eminent Judge (Lord Deas) in Ker's Trustees v. Justice,[1] states the legal principle very lucidly—"No one is entitled to protect his own income against his own onerous obligations and the claims of his lawful creditors." That principle is adopted equally by Scotch and English jurisprudence, and is so based on common sense and justice that it must find acceptance in every rational system of law. But the argument of the Lord Advocate invites us to violate it by holding that the undoubted property of the bankrupt here has been relieved by his own act from the just demands of his creditors. It cannot be so. The words of the deed are unequivocal. The trustees are to hold "in trust for the payment of the free yearly proceeds of the trust estate to the said John Finlay during his life for his liferent use allenarly." It is impossible to deny that the liferent so became his own, his own absolutely; and if so, it could not be enjoyed by him disburthened of the obligation to answer honest demands against him. The subsequent clause on which so much stress has been laid operates so far as it can have legal operation, but no further; and it was erroneously argued that because the deed generally had been sustained, every provision in it must be legally effective.

Applying, therefore, plain principle to plain words, I am of opinion that the Court below was well warranted in refusing to defeat the claims of the creditors, and I think the authorities produced by the Lord Advocate and Mr Pearson sustain the conclusion at which it arrived. In Lewis v. Anstruther[2] the facts bore no resemblance to those with which we have to deal. There, for abundant consideration, a son obtained an annuity charged on his father's property. In

[1] Ker's Trustees v. Justice, Nov. 7, 1866, 5 Macph. 4, 39 Scot. Jur. 11.
[2] Lewis v. Anstruther, June 11, 1852, 14 D. 857, 24 Scot. Jur. 514.

Macdonald v. Macdonald's Trustees,[1] a provision for a wife and children was most properly protected. But in neither of these cases, nor in any other case, has a man been permitted to filch his own income from the hands of his creditors. On the main question, therefore, it seems to me that the decision of the learned Judges was perfectly correct.

No. 8.

May 3, 1875.

Learmonth, &c. v. Miller.

The second question seems to me to be answered by the reply to the first, and on the third I can add nothing of value to the observations already made by my noble and learned friends; and, on the whole, I have no doubt that the appeal should be dismissed.

INTERLOCUTOR appealed from affirmed, and appeal dismissed, with costs.

W. ROBERTSON—WILLIAM OFFICER, S.S.C.—LOCH & MACLAURIN—FERGUSON & JUNNER, W.S.

ROBERT HENDERSON AND OTHERS (Defenders), Appellants.—Milward, Q.C.—E. C. Clarkson.
CHARLES HENRY STEVENSON (Pursuer), Respondent.—Cotton, Q.C.—Thesiger, Q.C.

No. 9.

June 1, 1875.

Henderson and Others v. Stevenson.

Ship—Passengers' Luggage—Carrier—Reparation—Contract.—Held (in aff. judgment of the Second Division) in a case not falling within the provisions of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, that special conditions limiting the common law liability of a carrier were not imported into a contract of carriage by merely printing them on the back of the ticket delivered by the carrier in exchange for the fare, the person receiving the ticket not having actually read the conditions, and not having had his attention directed to them by anything printed on the face of the ticket, or by the carrier himself when issuing it.

Carrier—Ship—Passenger.—A steam packet company plying between England and Ireland printed on the back of its passenger tickets this condition:—"The company incurs no liability whatever in respect of loss, injury, or delay to the passenger or to his or her luggage, whether arising from the act, neglect, or default of the company or their servants, or otherwise."

Question, whether such limitation of the company's common law liability was legal, and whether, if a passenger declined to agree to the condition, they could refuse to carry him.

Opinion (per Lord Chelmsford) that the company could discharge themselves of liability for negligence, or even for the wilful misconduct of their servants, by notice, assented to by the passenger, but that the exclusion of such liability could not be established without very clear evidence of the notice having been brought to the knowledge of the passenger, and of his having expressly assented to it.

(IN the Court of Session, 25th November 1873, ante, vol. i. p. 215.)

Ld. Chancellor (Cairns). Lord Chelmsford. Ld. Hatherley. Ld. O'Hagan.

This action was brought by Charles Henry Stevenson, Lieutenant in the 18th Royal Irish Regiment, against Robert Henderson and others (the North British Silloth Steam Packet Company), owners of the steamer "Countess of Eglington," which in the summer of 1871 was plying between Dublin and Silloth, to recover damages for the loss of his luggage, owing to the steamer having, on 14th July 1871, while he was a passenger on board of her, been wrecked off the Isle of Man through the fault of the defenders' servants.

[1] Macdonald v. Macdonald's Trustees, July 10, 1863, 1 Macph. 1065, 35 Scot. Jur. 628.

No. 9.

June 1, 1875. Henderson and Others v. Stevenson.

The defenders denied that the vessel was wrecked through the fault of their servants, and also pleaded that their contract with the pursuer exempted them from liability.

The pursuer had paid his fare at the defenders' office, North Wall, Dublin, and had received from the booking-clerk a ticket, which bore on its face the initials of the defenders' company, and the words "Dublin to Whitehaven." On the back of the ticket there was printed,—"This ticket is issued on the condition that the company incur no liability whatever in respect of loss, injury, or delay to the passenger, or to his (or her) luggage, whether arising from the act, neglect, or default of the company or their servants, or otherwise. It is also issued subject to all the conditions and arrangements published by the company."

The following notice was also inserted in the time bills issued by the defenders, and hung up in their booking office:—"The North British Silloth Steam Packet Company give notice that they carry passengers, passengers' luggage, live stock, and goods on the following conditions only, namely, . . . that the company . . . are not liable for any loss of or damage to passengers, passengers' luggage, live stock, or goods, arising from . . . any act, neglect, or default whatsoever of the company, or their agents or servants, . . . it being an express condition that the passengers, and owners of the passengers' luggage, live stock, and goods, undertake all risks whatsoever."

The pursuer pleaded;—(2) The defenders are, quoad the pursuer's luggage, subject to the liabilities of common carriers, and are, as such, liable to make good the loss and damage thereby sustained.

The defenders pleaded;—(3) In the event of its being held that the defenders were under contract, or the liabilities resulting from contract, with the pursuer, they are entitled to absolvitor, in respect of the condition which, as above mentioned, formed part of such contract.

In the course of a proof, the pursuer deponed that he had not read the condition printed on the back of the ticket at the time of taking it, and this was not controverted by the defenders. The defenders further failed to prove that any one on their behalf had drawn the pursuer's attention at the time of booking, either to the conditions on the back of the ticket, or those in their time bills and general notices.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that it is sufficiently instructed in point of fact that on or about 14th July 1871 the steamship 'Countess of Eglinton' got upon the rocks off Langness Point, near Castletown, in the Isle of Man, and became a total wreck, and that in consequence thereof certain luggage and articles belonging to the pursuer, who was a passenger on said steamer, were lost and injured: Finds that the loss of the said steamer, and the loss of the pursuer's luggage and property, was occasioned by the fault of the defenders, or of those in charge of the said steamer, and for whom the defenders are responsible: Finds in point of law that the defenders are liable to make good to the pursuer the loss and damage which he has sustained by and through the loss of the said steamer and property thereon: Assesses the said damage at £50 sterling: Therefore decerns and ordains the defenders to make payment to the pursuer of the said sum of £50 sterling in full of the damage concluded for: Finds the pursuer entitled to expenses," &c.

The defenders reclaimed, but the Second Division, on 25th November 1873, adhered,—the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Benholme holding that there was no evidence of assent on the part of the pursuer to the special contract alleged by the defenders limiting their liability,—Lord Cowan and Lord Neaves holding that such assent must be presumed from acceptance of the ticket; but the whole Judges concurring in holding tha the wreck of the vessel was due to the negligence of those in charge of her, and that liability for the loss incurred by the pursuer through the non-completion of the voyage owing to the fault of the defenders was not excluded by the terms of the conditions imported or attempted to be imported into the contract between the parties.

June 1, 1875. Henderson and Others v. Stevenson.

The defenders appealed.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—Two questions have been argued before us on this appeal, the first question being whether the contract between the pursuer and the Steam Packet Company was one incorporating in it certain conditions printed on the back of the ticket which has been referred to, the other being a question which arises only upon the supposition that those conditions were incorporated into the contract, and taking then the form of the question whether those conditions were in themselves legal conditions and what was their proper construction. Upon the second question I do not propose to make any observations, but will confine my attention to the first question, the answer to which appears to me sufficient to dispose of this case.

The pursuer appears to have been an officer of one of Her Majesty's regiments, who desired to travel from Dublin to Whitehaven. The defenders, the present appellants, are the proprietors of a line of steamers carrying passengers and goods between Dublin and Whitehaven. He took a ticket for the voyage from Dublin to Whitehaven, going, as appears from the condescendence and the evidence, into a shed or ticket office on the wharf at the North Wall of Dublin, alongside of which the steamship "Countess of Eglinton" was lying. He paid the fare for the voyage, and obtained the ticket in return. On the face of the ticket which was handed to him there are letters indicating the name of the Steam Packet Company, and the words "Dublin to Whitehaven." If the matter ended there that would clearly be evidence of a contract on the part of the Steam Packet Company to carry the person to whom the ticket was handed, in consideration of the money which he had paid to them, from Dublin to Whitehaven, and to use all reasonable care in the course of their undertaking so to carry him.

On the back of this ticket there were printed these words,—"This ticket is issued on the condition that the company incur no liability whatever in respect of loss, injury, or delay to the passenger, or to his (or her) luggage, whether arising from the act, neglect, or default of the company or their servants, or otherwise. It is also issued subject to all the conditions and arrangements published by the company." There were also hung up in the office a time bill, a list of fares, and a general notice, to which I need not further refer, inasmuch as no evidence whatever was given that Mr Stevenson, the pursuer, saw, read, or indeed had an opportunity of reading them. But the question arises, what was the effect of handing to the pursuer a ticket having the words which I have mentioned upon the face of it, and having those further sentences which I have read upon its back.

With regard to the knowledge of the pursuer of what was printed upon the back of the ticket, we have the pursuer's own evidence, which is not controverted, and upon which he does not appear to have been cross-examined or challenged, that in point of fact he did not read and did not know what was printed upon the back of the ticket. There was nothing upon the face of the ticket referring him to the back, and there was nothing said, as appears by the evidence, by the clerk who issued the ticket, directing his attention to what was printed upon the back of the ticket. Your Lordships may take it, therefore, that as a matter of fact the pursuer was not aware of that which was printed upon the back of the ticket. Consequently, so far as any intelligent knowledge of what was there printed is concerned, he cannot be taken intelligibly to have agreed to the terms printed upon the back of the ticket.

No. 9.

June 1, 1875. Henderson and Others v. Stevenson.

The question, therefore, resolves itself simply into this: Is the mere fact of handing a ticket of this kind to an intending passenger, at the time that he pays his fare, sufficient to hold him so affected by everything which is printed upon the back of the ticket that, even without seeing or knowing what is printed on the back, he is to be held to have contracted in the terms indicated upon the back of the ticket?

I asked with some anxiety what was the authority for the proposition that a member of the public was to be supposed to have contracted under these circumstances in that way, and I have listened with great attention to all the authorities that have been cited. A great number of those authorities are cases where there was no question at all arising as to what the nature of the contract was. They were cases in which it was assumed, either by the admission of both sides, or by the pleadings, that terms similar to those which I read in the present case as printed on the back of the ticket formed part of the contract between the parties. Those cases have, therefore, no relation whatever to the present. There were a considerable number of other cases, in which a ticket or paper for the conveyance of animals or of goods had been issued actually signed by the owner of the animals or by the owner of the goods. With regard, again, to these cases, there might, indeed, be a question what was the construction of the contract, or how far the contract was valid. But there could be no question whatever that the contract, such as it was, was assented to and was entered into by the person who received the ticket.

Of all the cases cited the only one which could be said to approach the present case was a case that was tried in the Passage Court of Liverpool, with regard to a ticket issued upon the occasion of an excursion train. And even with regard to that case the observation is obvious, that when it is examined it is not an authority at all to decide the present case. There a ticket had been issued to an excursionist, which had upon the face of it "Ticket as per Bill." Therefore on that part of the ticket, which the excursionist must have seen, he was referred to some bill or other upon the subject of the ticket. It was in evidence, further, by the admission of the excursionist himself, that he had seen and had read in the office a large bill on the subject of the arrangements with regard to the excursion, and that in that large bill he had seen a reference to some smaller bill or bills, but he had not referred to the smaller bills which were so mentioned. In that state of things, although the jury in the Passage Court found, and probably found rightly, that the excursionist was not aware of the contents of the smaller bills, the Court above, having leave to draw inferences of fact, came to the conclusion that under the circumstances which I have mentioned the excursionist must be taken to have submitted himself to all the terms contained in the smaller bill, and to have been content to do that without reading in detail what those terms were.

I express no opinion upon that decision, beyond saying that it does not in any way govern or cover the present case. The present case is a case in which there was no reference whatever upon the face of the ticket to anything other than that which was written upon the face. Upon that which was given to the passenger, and which he read, and of which he was aware, there was a contract complete and self-contained without reference to anything de hors. Those who were satisfied to hand to the passenger such a contract, complete upon the face of it, and to receive his money upon its being so handed to him, must be taken, as it seems to me, to have made that contract, and that contract only with the passenger, and the passenger on his part, receiving the ticket in that form, and without knowing of anything beyond, must be taken to have made a contract according to that which was expressed and shewn to him in that way.

It seems to me that it would be extremely dangerous, not merely with regard to contracts of this description, but with regard to all contracts, if it were to be held that a document, complete upon the face of it, can be exhibited as between two contracting parties, and without any knowledge of anything besides, from the mere circumstance that upon the back of that document there is something else printed which has not actually been brought to and has not come to the notice of one of the contracting parties, that contracting party is to be held to have assented to that which he has not seen, of which he knows nothing, and which is not in any way ostensibly connected with that which is printed or written upon the face of the contract presented to him. I am glad to find that there is no authority for such a proposition in any of the cases which have been cited, and I agree entirely with the observation of the Lord Ordinary in the present case, where he says in his note—"It has not been shewn that the pursuer's attention was called either to the bills in the office or to the notice on the back of the ticket, or that the pursuer knew either of the one or of the other. There is no reason to doubt the pursuer's word when he says he never read the conditions on the back of the ticket. Now, it seems fixed that, in a case like this, mere notice, not brought home to and not assented to by the pursuer, is not enough." I apprehend that the words "mere notice" there means not notice to the pursuer, for there was no notice to the pursuer, but that a mere printed notice upon the back of a ticket is not sufficient.

The question in this case does not, as it seems to me, depend upon any technicality of law, or upon any careful examination of decided authorities. It appears to me to be a question simply of common sense. Can it be held that any person—unless he is in default, unless something is said to him referring him to some place where he will find terms applicable to the contract he is entering into—has entered into a contract containing terms which, de facto, he does not know, and as to which he has received no notice that he ought to inform himself upon them? It appears to me to be impossible that that can be held. The interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, affirmed as it was in all respects by the Second Division of the Court of Session, appears to me to have been entirely correct, and I therefore move your Lordships that this appeal be dismissed, with costs.

LORD CHELMSFORD.—The sole question upon this appeal is, whether the appellants are exonerated from all liability to the pursuer in this action by reason of the notice on the back of the ticket delivered to him at the time of paying his passage money. The Lord Ordinary held that there was no proof that the respondent assented to this notice, and therefore that the appellants were responsible for the loss of his luggage, the vessel in which he was a passenger having been wrecked by the default of the appellants' servants. The Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Benholme also thought there was no assent to the notice. Lord Cowan and Lord Neaves both thought that the terms and conditions endorsed upon the back of the ticket must be held to have been assented to, and to have formed part of the contract between the parties. But the whole of the Judges of the Second Division of the Court of Session held that the loss sustained by the respondent by the termination of the voyage before the vessel reached her destination, owing to the default of the appellants, was not embraced by the words of the notice.

No. 9.

June 1, 1875. Henderson and Others v. Stevenson.

The Steam Packet Company was established for the carriage and conveyance of passengers, passengers' luggage, live stock, and goods. Their liability by law to a passenger is to carry and convey him with reasonable care and diligence, which implies the absence, on the part of the company, of any carelessness and negligence. Of course, any person may enter into an express contract with them to dispense with this obligation, and to take the whole risk of the voyage on himself. And this contract may be established by a notice excluding liability for the want of care or negligence, or even the wilful misconduct of the company's servants, if assented to by the passenger. But by a mere notice without such assent they can have no right to discharge themselves from performing what is the very essence of their duty, which is to carry safely and securely, unless prevented by unavoidable accidents. I think that such an exclusion of liability for negligence cannot be established without very clear evidence of the notice having been brought to the knowledge of the passenger, and of his having expressly assented to it. The mere delivery of a ticket with the conditions endorsed upon it is very far, in my opinion, from conclusively binding the passenger.

The Lord Chief-Justice, in the case of Young v. the South-Eastern Railway Company (Law Reports, 4 Queen's Bench, 544), which has been referred to, thought himself bound by the authorities to hold that, when a man takes a ticket with conditions printed on it, he must be presumed to know the contents of it, and must be bound by them. I was extremely anxious to be referred to the authorities which influenced the judgment of the Lord Chief-Justice, but although numerous authorities were cited by Mr Milward none of them go the length of establishing that a presumption of assent is sufficient. Assent is a question of evidence, and the assent must be given before the completion of the contract. The company undertake to convey passengers in their vessels for a certain sum. The moment the money for the passage is paid and accepted their obligation to carry and convey arises. It does not require the exchange of a ticket for the passage money, the ticket being only a voucher that the money has been paid. Or, if a ticket is necessary to bind the company, the moment it is delivered the contract is completed, before the passenger has had an opportunity of reading the ticket, much less the endorsement. It may be a question whether, if a passenger were to read the endorsement and decline to agree to the terms, the company could refuse to take him as a passenger. Holding themselves out as undertaking to convey passengers by their vessels, it might be held that they are bound to carry upon the terms of their common law liability alone, unless a special contract be entered into with the passenger. But it is unnecessary to consider this point.

No. 9.

June 1, 1875.

Henderson and Others v. Stevenson.

I have expressed a view of the case which places the right of the respondent to an interlocutor in his favour on a different ground from that which was assumed by the Court of Session; but I agree in the reasons which led them to their conclusion, because I think that a limitation of the legal liability of the Steam Packet Company as carriers ought to be most strictly construed, as well as the assent to it distinctly proved. Therefore I agree with my noble and learned friend that the interlocutors ought to be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed, with costs.

LORD HATHERLEY.—I entirely concur in the opinion of my two noble and learned friends who have preceded me.

There are two questions only in this case. The first is, Has there been in fact any negligence on the part of the defenders? That is a point upon which the Lord Ordinary and the learned Judges of the Second Division of the Court of Session are perfectly clear, and as to which we should have great hesitation in differing from them if there was any doubt upon the subject; but as we can have none upon the evidence before us, it is not necessary for me to pursue the point. I assume, therefore, that the loss sustained by the pursuer was entirely occasioned by the negligence of the defenders.

The other point was as to whether the pursuer had entered into a contract by which he agreed to be his own insurer, so to express it, not only against loss occurring in the course of the passage, but even against any neglect or default on the part of the servants or agents of the defenders with whom he contracted. Now, he entered into a contract as a passenger for the conveyance of himself and his luggage from Dublin to Whitehaven. In the absence of any restriction of his right assented to by him he was entitled to consider himself as assured of that passage in safety from Dublin to Whitehaven, except so far, of course, as an obstacle might have arisen from any absolutely unavoidable accident. The carriers were obliged to use all due precaution and due care and diligence in carrying him and his luggage when once they had completed a contract as common carriers for the purpose of so carrying him. They delivered to him a ticket, he having, in the first place, paid his money for the passage from Dublin to Whitehaven.

I agree with the observation that was made by my noble and learned friend who has just preceded me, that the money having been paid and the ticket having been taken up, a contract was completed upon the ordinary terms of conveyance for himself and his luggage, unless it can be made out that he had entered into any special contract to the contrary. A ticket is in reality in itself nothing more than a receipt for the money which has been paid. Of course, terms may be imposed by the carriers, and parties may agree to such terms in derogation of their rights. Numerous authorities were cited by the counsel for the appellants, but all those authorities, I may say, either shewed (which the majority of them did) an actual signature of the party, binding him somewhat stringently to certain conditions, or they consisted of cases in which the pleading had been that, whether there had been a signature or not, there was an agreement, and that was admitted; and the case turned and was decided upon that admission, which was, of course, as good as if a contract had been signed. Really the only exception among the authorities was that noticed by my noble and learned friend the Lord Chancellor—the case in the Passage Court of Liverpool with regard to an excursion train—and I do not think it necessary to add any further observation upon that case.

No. 9.

June 1, 1875.
Henderson and Others v. Stevenson.

In the present case, the Steam Packet Company having received the pursuer's money, and having given him a receipt for that money in the shape of a ticket which bore upon the face of it simply a heading with the initials of the title of the company, and the words "Dublin to Whitehaven," what was Mr Stevenson's position? He was entitled to consider that he had got a good and valid contract from common carriers to carry him upon the ordinary terms from Dublin to Whitehaven. That was his position, unless it can be shewn that he had in some way varied that position by a special contract. Now, it happens in this case, fortunately, that there can be no doubt as to whether he did or did not read or inquire further into those conditions which were on the back of the ticket. He positively swears in one part of his examination to not having read the notice printed on the back of his ticket; and in his cross-examination he is in nowise shaken on that subject. But not only that, your Lordships have one of the defenders themselves called on the other side—namely, Mr Robert Henderson—and this question is put to him in his cross-examination—"Did you give any instructions as to directing passengers' attention to those conditions?" and he says, "Yes, a large notice, embodying the conditions, appears on the bills we issue each month." Then he is asked, "Did you give any instructions to the clerk who issued the tickets on your behalf to direct the attention of passengers to what was printed on the back?" and his answer is "No." So far as to Mr Robert Henderson. Then we have the clerk himself called, Mr Thomas Carmon, and he says in his cross-examination, "I cannot say who bought the cabin ticket for Whitehaven. I was not in the way of drawing the attention of passengers to the condition on the back of the ticket or to the notice." That is clearly an admission of the fact that it was not this clerk's habit to call the attention of passengers to that which the defenders seek to set up as part of the contract. It is an admission that that condition being printed, not on the face of the ticket, but on the back of it, he did not actually see to the passengers' attention being in any way called to it.

Now, we have here a very clear case, plainly set forth in all its circumstances, and it is a very wholesome rule, and one which, I think, should be understood to have been decided and acted upon by this House, that a contract cannot be made in this fashion,—that a contract cannot be made by simply printing on the back of a ticket delivered to a passenger something by which the company may seek for their own selves a better contract than that by which he with whom they engaged conceives himself to have been bound.

Lord O'Hagan.—Two questions have been raised in this case, and have been the subject of decision in the Court below, but in the view which I take of it the ruling of the first will dispense with any consideration of the second. The respondent's loss through the default of the appellants is plain, and now undisputed.

The appellants rely upon a contract relieving them from liability, but the respondent says that he never entered into such a contract, that the terms of it were never, in fact, made known to him, and that his assent to them was neither asked nor given. The question is one of evidence. Did the respondent enter into such a contract? With the majority of the Judges in the Court below, and

No. 9.

June 1, 1875.
Henderson and Others v. Stevenson.

the learned Lords who have preceded me, I am of opinion that he did not; and I have reached that conclusion substantially for the reasons which have been lucidly stated by them, and which it is not needful to repeat at length.

Proof of the respondent's knowledge and assent might have been given in various ways. In certain circumstances, denial of them might not be permissible; in others, a jury or a Court might be satisfied of their existence from antecedent dealings—notoriety of custom, publication of notices, verbal communication, and so forth; but I agree with the Lord Chancellor that the mere receipt of a ticket under such circumstances, and with such an endorsement as we have before us, is not shewn by the authorities cited at the bar to furnish per se sufficient evidence of such assent or knowledge. We have positive and uncontradicted testimony that they did not exist; and in declining to discard that testimony on the strength of a false presumption, your Lordships will act in the spirit of the legislation which would have pronounced the contract we are asked to enforce void if the case had come within the statute.[1] Of course, as it does not, we must deal with the facts as we find them; but it is satisfactory that we are enabled to decide in harmony with the policy of Parliament, which has relaxed the stringency of judicial decision in the interest of the public, and limited the power of companies to escape the proper consequences of their own misconduct or neglect.

We were asked by Mr Milward, in the course of his able argument, what more could the appellants have done to furnish notice of the terms on which they proposed to contract? One answer, and there might be many more, was supplied by some of the cases which he cited, and in which the signature of the passenger or consignor demonstrated conclusively his conscious and intelligent assent to the bargain by which it was sought to bind him. When a company desires to impose special and most stringent terms upon its customers in exoneration of its own liability there is nothing unreasonable in requiring that those terms shall be distinctly declared and deliberately accepted, and that the acceptance of them shall be unequivocally shewn by the signature of the contractor. So the Legislature have pronounced as to cases of canals and railways, scarcely distinguishable in substance and principle from that before us; and if the effect of your Lordships' affirmation of the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary be to compel some precaution of this kind, it will be manifestly advantageous in promoting the harmonious action of the law and in protecting the ignorant and unwary.

On the second question raised I make no observation. The appeal, in my opinion, should be dismissed, with costs.

INTERLOCUTORS appealed against affirmed, and appeal dismissed, with costs.

GRAHAMES & WARDLAW, Westminster—HOPE & MACKAY, W.S.—THOMAS COOPER, Westminster—MACONOCHIE & HARE, W.S.

[1] Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854.

No. 10.

June 7, 1875.
Steuart v. Robertson.

FRANC NICHOLS STEUART, Appellant (Defender).—Southgate, Q.C.—Balfour.

MARGARET WILSON OR ROBERTSON AND HUSBAND, Respondents, (Pursuers).—Karslake, Q.C.—Scott—Macrae Moir—Brand.

Husband and Wife—Constitution of Marriage—Proof.—A declarator of marriage, with conclusions of count and reckoning, was raised by a woman upwards of three years after the death of her alleged husband against his representatives, founded upon an alleged de præsenti exchange of matrimonial consent, said to have taken place six years before the date of the action.

The following facts appeared from the proof:—The alleged husband, Major S, was of ancient family, and the next heir to large entailed estates. He had served with distinction in the army, but had fallen into dissipated habits. The pursuer was the daughter of a fishing-tackle maker in Edinburgh, with whom he had become acquainted from seeing her in her father's shop. After a few months' acquaintance he was taken into her father's house as a boarder. About six months after the Major had gone to live there a supper took place in the house in honour of his birthday, at which, besides the pursuer's family and the Major, the only person present was a young woman, a friend of the pursuer, who had been sent for to dress her hair. After supper, according to the evidence of the pursuer's brother and the hair-dresser, the only surviving witnesses, the following scene took place:—The pursuer's father said to Major S, "You will have to hook it. I am getting a bad name with your staying in my house among my three daughters." Upon which the Major said, "I will shew you what I can do to shut up people's mouths. I am poor now, and cannot marry, but I will marry her in the Scotch fashion," or words to that effect, and thereupon went down on one knee, took a wedding-ring from his pocket, put it on the pursuer's finger, and said, "Maggie, you are my wife before Heaven, so help me, oh God!" They then kissed one another, and the pursuer said, "Oh, Major!" The health of the couple was then drunk. After some time the proceedings were closed by Major S and the pursuer being "bedded" according to an obsolete Scotch fashion.

After the date of the alleged ceremony they cohabited as man and wife in the house of the pursuer's father for some weeks, and for various short periods at different places. There was no direct proof of any previous familiarities. About fourteen months after the alleged marriage the pursuer had a child, of which Major S was admitted to be the father. There was some evidence that Major S had shortly before the alleged ceremony intimated his intention of marrying the pursuer, and that within a few days after that date he had said that he was married to her. It was proved that during the remaining two years and a half of his life he sometimes stated that the pursuer was his wife and sometimes that she was not. On his death-bed, being asked by an intimate friend whether he was married, he replied in the affirmative, and mentioned that he had a son, but he did not say to whom he was married.

Letters written by Major S to the pursuer (extending from the date of the child's birth to within a few months of the Major's death) were uniformly addressed, both outside and inside, to "Miss W," and in none of them, nor in any other letter by Major S, was there any indication that he regarded the pursuer as his wife. No letters from the pursuer to Major S were recovered. So far as it appeared from letters and other writings by her during the Major's life and thereafter she subscribed herself by her maiden name. Not only did she not during the Major's life, on any occasion on which writing could be appealed to in evidence, claim the status of his wife, but on a variety of occasions her conduct indicated that she did not consider herself to be his wife. She registered her child in her own name as illegitimate, the registrar having refused to register it otherwise without the presence of the father, which she failed to obtain, although registration was delayed at her request for this purpose. After the death of Major S she raised an action against his executor, in her maiden name, for aliment for her child, the summons containing an allegation of paternity but not

No. 10.

June 7, 1875.

Steuart v. Robertson.

Lcl. Chancellor (Cairns).
Ld. Hatherley.
Ld. O'Hagan.
Ld. Selborne.

of marriage; she subsequently granted receipts for aliment as for an illegitimate child; and two years after the death of Major S. she was married under her maiden name.

Held (rev. judgment of Court of Session) that the alleged marriage had not been instructed.

(In the Court of Session Feb. 27, 1874, ante, vol. i. p. 532.)

This was an appeal from a judgment of the First Division of the Court of Session, pronounced in conformity with the opinions of a majority of the whole Court, finding that the pursuer, Mrs Robertson, was the lawful wife of Major W. G. D. Steuart, who died on 19th October 1868.

The facts of the case are fully narrated in the report of the judgment of the Court of Session.

Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, in the litigation in Scotland out of which this appeal arises a majority of the learned Judges have determined that a marriage, valid according to Scotch law, was proved by the female respondent, Margaret Wilson, now Robertson, to have taken place between herself and the late Major Steuart.

The late Major Steuart was the eldest son of Sir William Drummond Steuart of Grandtully and Murthly, Baronet, now deceased, and the heir in tail of landed estates of considerable value. The question of the marriage might and would have involved the title to succeed to those estates had a son of the respondent by Major Steuart lived. That son died an infant, and the present litigation, although deeply important as regards the status of the parties, and the view which it presents of the law of marriage, involves a moderate amount of personal property only. The contest as to this is between the respondents and the appellant as the general disponee and executor of Sir William Steuart. The appellant disputes the fact of marriage.

The marriage sought to be established is what is termed an irregular one. It is not founded on habit and repute, or on a promise subsequente copula. It is said to have been made per verba de præsenti, and the words constituting the marriage are said to have been uttered in a few sentences after a supper on the 13th February 1866, six years before the institution of the present proceedings. There is no written evidence which supports the marriage, but in the parole evidence of what is alleged to have taken place on the 13th February 1866, and in the parole evidence adduced either to corroborate or to throw discredit on what is alleged to have taken place on that night, three hundred pages or more of the print are occupied, and in the hearing of the case in the Courts of Scotland your Lordships were informed that upwards of twenty days of judicial time had been consumed. The argument at your Lordships' bar, which was not longer than the materials required, extended over at least a fourth of that time.

At the time of the alleged marriage the female respondent (whom I will term the pursuer) was about sixteen or seventeen years of age. She was the daughter of George Wilson, a fishing-tackle maker, who had a shop in Waterloo Place, Edinburgh. Major Steuart appears to have been at the same time between thirty and forty. He had served as an officer in the 93d Highlanders throughout the Crimean war and in the Indian mutiny, and had received the Victoria Cross as a reward for his bravery. After returning to Scotland, however, he appears to have led a dissolute and dissipated life. Two women are mentioned in the proof, besides the pursuer, with whom he had cohabited, and by each of whom he had an illegitimate child. His habits of drunkenness were such that several witnesses state they seldom saw him sober; and he gave way to this vice in low company, and in a manner attracting attention and outraging decency in public places. By these habits, which appear to have been confirmed before, and to have continued after the alleged marriage, he undermined his constitution, became subject to fits of delirium tremens, and died on the 18th October 1868, after passing out of an attack of delirium tremens, and apparently in consequence of an injury inflicted on himself during its continuance. I will subsequently examine the relations which appear to have subsisted between Major Steuart and the pursuer prior to the 13th February 1866; but, in the first place, I will direct your Lordships' attention to the evidence of what took place on that night. I will merely premise that it is not averred or proved that before the alleged ceremony of that night any promise or engagement of marriage existed between the parties.

No. 10.

June 7, 1875. Steuart v. Robertson.

The words constituting the marriage are said to have been spoken in the presence of Mr and Mrs Wilson, both of whom are dead, and of George Wilson, their son, and Mrs Kellet. And it is stated that Major Steuart and the pursuer cohabited from that time forward, and had not had any sexual intercourse previously. I will refer first to the evidence of George Wilson. He is an elder brother of the pursuer. He was himself married at the time, and living in a house or lodgings of his own. On the evening in question he was at the residence of old Wilson, his father, which was a flat in Clyde Street, Edinburgh. There were living there at the time the father and mother of the pursuer, two younger sisters, Georgina and Mary, aged respectively fifteen and fourteen, and a brother Alfred, still younger, a servant named Agnes Forbes, and Major Steuart, who was lodging in the house under circumstances which I shall afterwards mention. The supper began about nine o'clock and finished about ten. George Wilson states that there were plenty of eatables and drinkables, and among the latter champagne; that after supper old Wilson sent the three younger children to bed, Mrs Kellet going out of the room with them; that after the children left the room old Wilson told the Major that he would have to leave his house, because he had been too long in it, and it would not do to stay longer, as the people were making complaints, and his daughters were not to have their names ruined by him staying in the house; that the Major sat quiet for a minute or two, and tears came into his eyes; that he then said, "Wilson, I will shew you what I can do; I am poor now and cannot marry, but I will marry her in the Scotch fashion," or words to that effect; that he then went down on one knee, put his hand into his waistcoat pocket, and took out a wedding ring, which he placed on the third finger of her left hand, and said, "Maggie, you are my wife before Heaven, so help me, oh God;" that the two kissed one another; she said, "Oh Major," and put her arms round his neck; that he then said he wished this to be kept private, that when he got his money he would make it public; he would buy a house out at the Grange till his father died; that everybody then shook hands and drank their health; that he left the party still in the dining-room when he left the house. The same witness, on cross-examination, says he supposes his father first thought there was to be a marriage that night when the Major got up and said "Wilson, I will shew you what I can do."

Mrs Hannah Kellet appears to have been a friend of the Wilsons, and a confidential companion of the pursuer. She had been married to her present husband just before the day in question. She had been in the habit of going to balls with Mrs Wilson, and being employed at a hairdresser's shop she came on the evening in question to dress the pursuer's hair, and remained for supper. She had gone out of the room to put the younger children to bed, and after a short time she says she was called in, she thinks by Mr Wilson. When she went in, the Major, she says, "was saying that he could not do what he would wish to do at the present time, but he said, 'I will shew you, Wilson, what I will do,' or 'can do.'" Then he filled up the wine glasses, went in front of the wardrobe beside the pursuer, went down on his knee, and took a ring out of his pocket, put it on the third finger of her left hand, and said, "'Maggie, you are my wife before Heaven, so help me great God,' or words to that effect. They then kissed each other. The Major said he wished what we had seen that night to be kept secret until such time as he would be in a position to make it public. Mrs Wilson gave them a blessing, and said she hoped the Major would be kind to Maggie, and she hoped God would bless them. Perhaps these were not her exact words, but they were her meaning." She continues—"I remember the bedding taking place. I assisted at it. I threw a pillow at them. Mrs Wilson threw one first, and then I threw one. I hit the Major on the head with it. After seeing them bedded we all left." On cross-examination, being asked "How long did the ceremony last?" she replied, "So long as the Major spoke, and he spoke a good bittie. I have stated all he said, as far as I can remember."

This is the whole of the direct testimony to the words by which the marriage is said to have been constituted, and I will assume that there is no doubt that if the words were used in fact, seriously, and with the intention of constituting a marriage, they were sufficient for the purpose. The question is, were the words used at all, and were they used in this way, and with this intention? This is a question of fact involving for its determination the credibility, the accuracy, and the intelligence of witnesses. No direct evidence can be adduced to contradict them, for no other persons now living were present. They are, the one the near relative, the other the friend and intimate companion of the pursuer, and both of them deeply interested for their own character and that of the pursuer in maintaining the pursuer's case. They furnish us with one or two sentences spoken at a sitting which continued for an hour or two, and even as to these sentences they only profess to give their effect, and not the precise words. It is necessary, therefore, to try the evidence of these witnesses rigidly by all the tests to which it can legitimately be subjected. They speak of several other facts and occurrences as to which their evidence can be contrasted with undoubted testimony, and it will be necessary so to contrast it. Your Lordships have spread before you the life of Major Steuart and of the pursuer, their sayings, writings, and doings, from the date of the alleged marriage onward, and the sayings, writings, and doings, of those present at the alleged ceremony of marriage, and it will be for your Lordships to consider whether these sayings, writings, and doings can be reconciled with the hypothesis of a marriage having taken place, or having been supposed to have taken place.

It is unnecessary to consider minutely whether all that appears to have been said by Major Steuart subsequent to the alleged marriage can be admitted in evidence, irrespective of the question whether the pursuer was or was not present. It is evident from what fell from members of this House in the case of

No. 10.
June 7, 1875.
Steuart v. Robertson.

Jolly v. M'Gregor, 3 W. and S. 179, that a very wide range of evidence under this head is open; but in the present case no objection has been taken to any of the evidence to which I have to refer, and your Lordships were told at the bar that it was not desired to exclude any part of that evidence.

I will therefore address myself to the history of the case subsequent to the alleged marriage. Major Steuart continued to live in the Wilsons' house until the 24th of February 1866, when he went to live in St Patrick Square, to conceal himself from his creditors. The pursuer remained at her father's house, although there was no reason on the score of secrecy that she should not have cohabited with Major Steuart if his wife, inasmuch as it is stated she went to see him daily.

It is during this time that the first letter of Major Steuart which we have in evidence, that of the 11th May 1866, was written. It is written to old Wilson, whom the witnesses for the pursuer say the Major was accustomed after the marriage to call "father," or "old boy." It is addressed "My dear sir," and signed "yours truly," and contains no trace of familiarity.

While Major Steuart was in St Patrick Square he had some communications with Mr Rigg, which appear to me to be of considerable importance. Mr Rigg is a priest of the Roman Catholic Church, to which Church Major Steuart belonged. He was an old friend of the Major and of his father, and he was in the habit of seeing Major Steuart frequently in Edinburgh. He says,—"He called upon me pretty frequently, and on many occasions I saw him on the street intoxicated. My house is not far from Clyde Street. He was frequently in an excited state when he came to my house, and I thought more frequently under the influence of liquor than not. I have seen him not under the influence of liquor, but I rather think that was the exception." He continues,—"I remember him going to St Patrick Square to live. I think his object was to be out of the way of creditors. I visited him there several times, and my recollection is that he was not under the influence of drink, at least not in any degree that could be observed. (Q.) Not to the extent you had seen previously? (A.) No, certainly not. (Q.) On that occasion had you somewhat serious conversations with him on the subject of his connection with this woman? (A.) I had. (Q.) What occurred? (A.) I stated that in my former evidence. I told him that there was every probability that a marriage would be proved against him, that he would so commit himself that a Scotch marriage would be proved against him from the way in which he was acting with the girl. He told me that he was quite upon his guard, that the family had made many attempts to get something written from him, but that he was always upon his guard never to give them anything whatever, anything written whatever. He said he had been particularly upon his guard, and that he knew well how easy it was for a man to get entrapped in that way. (Q.) Did you say to him that it was merely by writing that a Scotch marriage might be proved against him? (A.) No. (Q.) Did you understand that he was referring to writing? (A.) Certainly not; he said he would be on his guard, not only in regard of writing, but in regard of anything else that could constitute a Scotch marriage. (Q.) Did he say they would endeavour to entrap him? (A.) He said that they had done so, that they had tried to obtain some writing from him. (Q.) Did he also use the expression that the family had tried to entrap him into a marriage? (A.) I cannot say that he said they had endeavoured to do so by anything else than writing, but he certainly said that they had endeavoured to procure something written from him. (Q.) So far as you recollect, did he use the words 'entrap him into a marriage?' (A.) Yes."

No. 10.

June 7, 1875.
Steuart v. Robertson.

From the 12th May to the 3d July 1866 Major Steuart was a prisoner for debt in the Calton Jail. During that time he was, of course, kept in a state of sobriety. Dr Simson, the physician attending at the jail, gives the following evidence:—"I was in the habit of seeing him frequently, but one day I went and expressed my regret at seeing a person of his position there, and I said that if he would give up drinking, and have nothing to do with Miss Wilson, I was authorised to pay all his debts. He asked me how that was, and I said he had no business to know anything about it, but that I would undertake to have them paid, and that he might take my guarantee for it. I shewed him what a respectable man he might be if he gave up his dissipated habits and his connection with Miss Wilson. After reasoning the matter, he admitted the whole of it. (Q.) What did he say? (A.) He said that certainly drink was a very bad thing, but that I was not aware of the pleasure now and then of getting drunk; and as to his connection with Miss Wilson, I said that a man who drank as he did, and got involved as he did, would be sure to be taken in for a marriage. He said, 'Ah, they have tried that often before, but they have never succeeded.' I said, 'But they may succeed.' He said, 'Ah, I will take care of that.' (Q.) Who did he refer to as having tried? (A.) I said the relations would do it, and he said, 'Oh, they have tried that again and again.' (Q.) Did you use the word 'relations'? (A.) I have no doubt I used the word 'relations.' He did not use the word 'relations,' but he said 'they' have tried. (Q.) Whose relations did you refer to? (A.) Miss Wilson's, of course. After he got out of prison I have frequently seen him going about in the streets. He was very different on the street from what he was in prison. He was very often shabbily dressed, and also under the influence of drink. (Q.) Was it quite obvious that he was under the influence of drink? (A.) He was sometimes very bad. (Q.) Was he so bad as to attract the notice of the public? (A.) I was walking one day with a lady when he came up to me, and after he went away she said, 'What blackguard is that you were speaking to?' He was very bad that day, both in dress and appearance. (Q.) Have you seen him very frequently under the influence of liquor? (A.) I would not say very frequently, but frequently. (Q.) During the day? (A.) Yes."

After leaving Calton Jail on the 3d July 1866 Major Steuart would appear to have returned to the house of the Wilsons in Clyde Street. About the middle of September 1866 Major Steuart and old Wilson went to Birnam, close to the residence of Sir William Steuart, for the purpose of fishing. On the 25th of September Mr Wilson sent a telegram to his wife to send some fishing materials, and the next day the pursuer, uninvited, brought them to Birnam. Major Steuart and old Wilson were lodging in Birnam at the house of Mrs Hutton.

Major Steuart introduced the pursuer to Mrs Hutton as Miss Wilson in the presence of her father. I do not go through the details of the twenty-four hours during which the pursuer remained at Birnam, of their ejection from Mrs Hutton's house, of their irruption in the middle of the night into the residence of Sir William Steuart, and of the pursuer's departure the next day by railway to Edinburgh.—[557, et seq.] *

* The figures within brackets refer to the pages in the report of the case in the Court of Session, ante, vol. i.

No. 10.

June 7, 1875. Steuart v. Robertson.

The evidence as to this part of the case leaves no doubt on my mind that neither the pursuer nor Major Steuart supposed or represented that they were husband and wife.

It is at this point of the narrative that the episode as to the portmanteau, founded on in the condescendence [536], and to which some of the Judges have attached more or less weight, comes in. The true version of what occurred as to this portmanteau might have remained in some doubt on the parole evidence, but, fortunately, the letter of Major Steuart to Mrs Wilson [561], the date of which is fixed by the internal evidence to be about the 1st of October 1866, puts the matter beyond controversy, and shews that the story told in the condescendence, and attempted to be supported by some of the evidence of the pursuer, is absolutely without foundation. But I cannot look upon this episode as if it had never been introduced. It was made a part of the pursuer's case, and it is impossible that she can have believed in its truth. It appears to me to have been a reckless attempt to provide facts which might be fitted on to some silly gossip about missing or abstracted documents, which had prevailed at Birnam, and the attempt having failed cannot but suggest a distrust of the manner in which the pursuer's case has been put forward.

The pursuer returned, as I said, to Edinburgh, and Major Steuart continued to reside at Birnam until the beginning of the year 1867. During this time no letters from him to the pursuer are produced, but there are several letters from him to Mrs Wilson, the mother. In none of them does he address her otherwise than as Mrs Wilson, nor in any of them is there any trace whatever of any connection by marriage with her daughter.

During the residence of Major Steuart at Birnam a remarkable incident in the history of the pursuer occurred. Alexander Laing and his wife, neighbours of the Wilsons, were proceeded against in the Police Court of Edinburgh by the pursuer, styling herself Margaret Wilson, on the ground that they had behaved to her in a disorderly manner and had used opprobrious epithets. The evidence of the pursuer states that the epithets used were words suggesting that the pursuer was the kept mistress of Major Steuart. This complaint was met by a cross complaint from Mrs Laing against Jane Wilson (who is stated to have been a sister of the pursuer) for throwing earth upon her out of one of the windows, and committing a breach of the public peace. These two complaints were heard on the same day. Jane Wilson was fined £1 sterling, and the complaint against Mrs Laing was dismissed. What, however, is important is, that the witness Torry states that while he was defending the case for Mrs Laing, the pursuer on her oath admitted that she cohabited with Major Steuart in the house, and being asked whether she was married to him said she was not.—[561-2] The witness Alexander indeed states that when Torry put this question the pursuer replied she was lawfully or legally married to Major Stewart [563], and Agnes Forbes, the Wilsons' servant, says that she was in Court and heard her say she was legally married to Major Steuart. Agnes Forbes, however, says she was not in Court when the pursuer's case came on, and that it was in Jane's case she heard the pursuer say she was legally married, and that her statement that she was legally married to Major Steuart was not made in answer to any question put to her by any one in the case, but in reply to a remark which was made by a man there.—[563]

Mr and Mrs Laing, on the other hand, state distinctly the details of the examination, and corroborate Torry's evidence, and so does the witness Hunter

No. 10.

June 7, 1875.
Steuart v. Robertson.

[562-3], and it is indeed obvious that that evidence must be correct, for if the pursuer had stated that she was legally married to Major Steuart she would at once have been met by her own complaint, which was taken out in her name as spinster.

I cannot but attach great importance to this incident. It was an occasion on which the pursuer would at once have established her case and cleared her character by shewing that she was Major Steuart's wife. She evidently desired to support her case by denying cohabitation, and it was only when she found that Torry was in possession of evidence as to that cohabitation that she abandoned that ground and did not replace it by the assertion of the marriage.

Major Steuart appears to have been in Edinburgh from the beginning of 1867 until the 22d of March of that year, when he returned to Birnam.

The evidence of Dr Dunsmure is material at this point. Major Steuart consulted him frequently, and always in connection with the effects of drinking. He was summoned to him at Clyde Street on the 17th of February 1867. He told him he had sent for him to examine Miss Wilson to know whether she was in the family way. "He called her Maggie Wilson. I told him she would not allow me to examine her, and that I could not do it without her permission. He said, 'Oh, but I will insist on it.' I made an examination and satisfied myself that she was pregnant. Major Steuart asked me to attend her during her confinement. Before I gave him any answer I asked him whether he was married to her. He said, 'No, certainly not; that he would be very sorry,' or words to that effect. This took place in the house in Clyde Street on 17th February 1867. (Q.) Did he say anything else indicating the nature of his relationship with her? (A.) When he had told me what he had sent for me for he said, laughing, 'A man must have a companion,' or something of that kind. When he told me they were not married I refused to attend at her confinement, and I did not do so. If he had said they were married it is possible I might have attended her, but I did not care about doing so. (Q.) When you went to the house did anything strike you about the appearance of it and its inmates? (A.) I did not like the appearance of it; it was such a house as I was not accustomed to go to, and I did not like it. (Q.) What struck you about its inmates? (A.) I did not like the appearance of the people or of the house. (Q.) What do you mean? (A.) It is difficult to say. I did not like its appearance. (Q.) Did they look respectable, or the opposite? (A.) I did not know where I was going to at first, but when I got there my impression was that I had got into an improper house. (Q.) Was that from the appearance of the house and the inmates? (A.) That was my impression. (Q.) Did you see girls going about? (A.) I did not see them going about; I saw them in another room, and I did not like their appearance. (Q.) Were they loose looking? (A.) Well, I thought so." We are told that Dr Dunsmure was lately President of the College of Physicians in Edinburgh. His evidence, which is beyond criticism, is of importance as shewing that on an occasion of great interest, and apparently in the presence of the pursuer, the idea of marriage was repudiated, even where doing so deprived the parties of the professional service which they desired.

In connection with this part of the case I turn to the evidence of Dr Balfour, who was the physician that did attend the pursuer in her confinement. He had been in the habit of attending the Wilson family professionally, and he visited the pursuer on the 2d of April 1867, when her child was born, and for some days subsequently. The name entered in his book is simply "Wilson, 27 Clyde

No. 10.
June 7, 1875.
Steuart v. Robertson.

Street." He says if he had supposed she was a married woman he would have put her married name. He was engaged to attend her about a month before the birth, and he remembers quite distinctly that Mrs Wilson said to him the Major intended to marry her. He does not remember whether the pursuer was present when she said so or not. She was present during part of the conversation, but he does not know whether she was present at that particular time.—[564]

Major Steuart was at Birnam when the child was born. He had gone there on the 22d of March, and remained there till the 30th of June. On the 3d of April old Wilson wrote him a letter in these words:—"Major Steuart.—Dear Sir,—I drope you those few lines to let know that our Maggie has been very bad, and brought forth a son—a stout healthy child, on Tuesday night, about 12 o'clock p.m. Hoping you are well, I remain, your humble servt., GEORGE WILSON.—In haste, Wednesday, April 3, 67." The letter of Major Steuart, which has the Dunkeld post-mark of the 8th April, appears from its internal evidence to have been written on the 7th, and to be an answer to the letter of old Wilson.—[564] Both these letters appear to me to be absolutely irreconcileable with the idea that either Major Steuart or old Wilson supposed that the pursuer had been married, or that the child was legitimate. Major Steuart continued at Birnam, as I have said, till the 30th of June, and during that interval, on the 28th April, Mrs Wilson, the mother of the pursuer, died. There are two letters written by Major Steuart from Birnam to Mrs Wilson before her death, and three to old Wilson, and all of them open to the remarks which I have already made on the letter before adverted to.

How was this child registered? As the illegitimate child of the pursuer. She attended the registrar herself, and signed the entry stating it to be illegitimate, and giving its surname as Wilson. The registrar states in his evidence that she wanted it to take the father's surname; that he explained to her it could not be so registered unless the father acknowledged the paternity and signed the books in company with the mother. She then wanted to have it delayed to see if she could get the father to accompany her. He delayed for some days, when she came back without the father and signed the books.—[565-6] It is clear, looking at the Act of Parliament[1] on the subject, and at this evidence, that there was no allegation or suggestion of marriage. If there had been the child would have been entered as a legitimate child of the marriage. The question was as to its paternity without reference to marriage, and I cannot look on the evidence of Collett as throwing any serious doubt on the statement of the registrar.

It is to this part of the history that eight of the letters addressed by Major Steuart to the pursuer appear to belong. There is considerable ground for doubting whether all the letters to the pursuer from Major Steuart which were in her possession at his death have been produced. Mr Galletly states that she handed to him to read, and he returned to her, from thirty to fifty such letters [583]; only fourteen are now produced, and in the eight written before the 30th June 1867 there is not a word which would suggest the relationship between the parties. In every one of them he addresses her as "My dear Miss Wilson," and there is not a reference in any one of them to the child. Some suggestion was made that Major Steuart desired to avoid committing himself in writing to anything which would be evidence of a marriage. It is not likely such a course would have been submitted to by the pursuer without remonstrance, and the suggestion is entirely at variance with the character attributed to Major Steuart by the pursuer and her witnesses, nor would it account for the style of old Wilson's letter, which is as inconsistent with marriage as those of Major Steuart.

[1] 17 and 18 Vict. c. 80.

On the 17th of June 1867 the pursuer paid Major Steuart a visit at Birnam. She came at twelve o'clock in the day and left at six in the evening. Mrs Hutton, in whose house he was lodging, says she announced her as Miss Wilson; that she remained in the sitting-room all the time; that the Major went into his bed-room, rang the bell, and desired her to ask Miss Wilson if she would take a cup of tea. She left by the train, and the Major did not go to the train with her.

About the 1st of July 1867 Major Steuart went to Edinburgh and lived with the Wilsons in a flat in Leith Street Terrace, to which they had removed, and he remained there till some time in August of the same year. It was during this period that a circumstance took place to which I attach considerable importance. Mr Rigg tells us that some messages came to his house asking him to go to Leith Street Terrace, and he refers to a letter which he wrote at the time to Mr Condie, giving an account of the circumstance, which is in these words,—"St Mary's Catholic Church, Edinburgh, Thursday evening.—Dear Mr Condie,—I am sorry to say that poor Major Steuart is again making a sad hand of himself here. On Tuesday three several messages were brought requesting me to go to see him at Wilson's, 5 Leith Street Terrace. Of the first two I took no notice, but by the third messenger I sent a note asking what the Major wanted, and telling him that he knew my dislike to visit him in such lodgings. To this he returned no answer. In the evening, however, I met him in Register Street very very drunk, and looking as if he had come down a chimney. His appearance was truly deplorable, and I could not help saying, 'could nothing be done to rescue the miserable man from such a state of degradation.' He made some incoherent remarks about marrying the girl Wilson, which made me suspect that she and her friends had wished me to go to the Terrace regarding some affair of that kind, but he was so bad that I could really make no sense out of anything he said."

Simpson, who was employed in the shop of old Wilson, speaks of the same occurrence; and though he fixes the date in June 1867 that must be a mistake for July, because in June Major Steuart was at Birnam.—[568] He says,—"I remember George Wilson coming to my house in Farquharson Place, Preston Street, just at the back of seven o'clock in a summer morning. I was just out of bed. I had not got breakfast, and I told him so. He said, 'Never mind, come away, you will have a breakfast in our house.' (Q.) Did he tell you what he wanted? (A.) He said, 'The Major is going to marry Maggie.' He told me that in the lobby. He wanted me to come away directly. I went with him. (Q.) Was he in a very excited state? (A.) No, I cannot say that he was. (Q.) Did he seem anxious that you should come at once? (A.) Yes, he wished me to come at once. (Q.) Did he shew great interest in what he wanted? (A.) Apparently he did. (Q.) When you got to the house did he tell you that the Major was going to marry Maggie? (A.) Yes, and he asked me to go to a place at St Mary's Chapel for the Rev. Mr Rigg. He said, 'Go down and tell Mr Rigg to come up, that the Major wished to see him very particularly.' I went for Mr Rigg before I got breakfast. I went at half-past seven o'clock in the morning. I did not see Mr Rigg at that time. I then went back to Wilson's

No. 10.
June 7, 1875.
Steuart v. Robertson.

and got breakfast. He then told me to go down again for Mr Rigg. I saw Mr Rigg that time. I also saw him on a third occasion. I went down three times that day. I gave him the message that Major Steuart wished to see him very particularly. The third time I went was just before dinner, some time before one o'clock, I think. The second time Mr Rigg said he would be up shortly. (Q.) Are you sure of that? (A.) I am almost sure of it. The first time, as far as I recollect, he said he would be up in a short time. (Q.) Did you see him at all the first time? (A.) No; I saw him the second time; and the third time he said he would be up immediately. I had no communication with anybody except George about that. I had none with the Major."

Mrs Hutton tells us of a conversation she had with the pursuer in February 1868, to this effect:—"I said to Miss Wilson, 'Are Major Steuart and you married, Miss Wilson?' She said, 'No.' I then said, 'It is a wonder you never tried to get Major Steuart when he had got whisky.' She said that he would never write when he had got drink, but that the priest had been sent for once to come to the house to get them married, but that it did not take place." Now, my Lords, I ask for what purpose was Mr Rigg on this occasion sent for? It could not have been to celebrate a public marriage, for no preparations had been made or steps taken for a public marriage. It could not be to superadd a religious ceremony to a marriage already validly contracted, for the Wilsons were Presbyterians, and Mr Rigg a priest of the Roman Catholic Church. It must have been in order to make an irregular and clandestine marriage between the pursuer and Major Steuart, which, if her evidence is to be believed, had been already accomplished in a manner satisfactory to all the family.

The baptism of the child occurs next in order of date. It was baptised by Mr Rigg, and the certificate of baptism, dated the 4th August 1867, describes it as the illegitimate son of Margaret Wilson. Neither father nor mother were present at the baptism. There were present Mary Wilson, now Mary Wyke, the sister of the pursuer, who is not produced as a witness; Margaret Clarkson, who was employed in old Wilson's shop; and a young man, a billiard-marker—the two latter being sponsors for the child. What makes this more important is a conversation which Mr Rigg states had previously taken place between him and Major Steuart. Major Steuart, he says, told him the girl Wilson had had a child that he believed was his. "Afterwards he asked me to baptise it. I said to him we had a decided objection to baptising illegitimate children when the improper connection was continued between the parties. I also said we considered baptism as essential, and were most unwilling to allow a child to die without baptism, therefore I would baptise the child; but he must understand it was simply for the child's sake, and not for the sake of the father or mother." —[568] It was after this intimation from Mr Rigg that Major Steuart and the pursuer sent the child to be baptised in the manner I have mentioned.

Major Steuart appears to have continued with the Wilsons till some time in August 1867, when he went again to Birnam, and remained there till about the 1st October. He lodged on this occasion with Mrs Maclagan. Some Highland games took place at Birnam in the last week in August, and during this week the pursuer came to Birnam and remained for four days, lodging at the house of William Harris. The character in which she was received by Harris I prefer to take from the account rendered by him to Major Steuart rather than from his own evidence, to which, after reading his cross-examination, I am unable to give much weight. The account charges for apartments for Miss Wilson for four days and attendance, and Harris states that this account was made out with the name of Miss Wilson by her own desire, as it was to be rendered to Mr Melville Jameson, and the marriage was not to be made public before the Major had a home to take her to.—[569-570] But Mr Melville Jameson was the Major's own confidential adviser, as the pursuer very well knew, and whatever reasons she may have assigned to Mr Harris, it appears much more probable that the account, if rendered in any name but that of Miss Wilson, would not have been received or paid by Mr Jameson.

No. 10.

June 7, 1875.
Steuart v. Robertson.

I may now refer to two witnesses whose evidence in connection with the residence of Major Steuart at Birnam appears to me most deserving of attention. One is Dr Culbard, a doctor of medicine practising at Birnam. Dr Culbard says,—" While he stayed at Birnam I saw him very frequently. I should think he never was in Birnam without my seeing him. I saw him very frequently, both professionally and otherwise. He used to come to my house frequently. His habits gradually got more and more dissipated. I remember his living in the house of James Hutton. I have known the Huttons all the time I have been in Dunkeld. They are respectable people. I visited him in that house frequently. It was the only house in which I visited him as his lodgings. I have frequently seen him very much the worse of drink, and that for a length of time—for days. I have seen him in that state both in the house and going about the streets. I remember seeing Miss Wilson, but I cannot mention the date when I first saw her. (Q.) Was it within a couple of years of his death? (A.) It was not so long previous to his death, but I cannot give the date. I have seen Major Steuart and her going about Birnam, but not frequently. I have frequently heard people in Birnam speak of them. She was spoken of as Miss Wilson by the people in Birnam. I never heard her called anything else. I have seen her going about with him when he was the worse of drink ; but I have not seen that repeatedly. I heard it reported that there was a marriage between them. (Q.) Was it after that that you spoke to him on the subject? (A.) I cannot condescend on whether it was before or after. (Q.) Where was it that you spoke to him first of Miss Wilson? (A.) I spoke to him in his own lodgings, and also in my house. It was a subject of frequent conversation. As stated in my former evidence, Major Steuart introduced me to her in her lodgings. She occupied separate lodgings from Major Steuart, in Harris the coachbuilders. It was late in the evening when I was introduced to her. I received a message to call on the Major, and went to his own rooms, but found that he was out. I remained there for some time, and then Mrs Hutton sent to Harris' lodgings to say that I had called. I then went to Miss Wilson's lodgings, and he introduced me to her as Miss Wilson. I had previously spoken to him about her frequently. (Q.) What had you said to him? (A.) I frequently urged on him the propriety of marrying the girl—that was the substance of our conversation. (Q.) Did you say why? (A.) Because, having had possession of the woman, I thought he ought to do what was right and proper by her. (Q.) What did he say in reply? (A.) He said, ' No, that he was not married to her, and that he never would be married to her.' On the occasion when he introduced me to her by the name of Miss Wilson I said, ' Miss how much?' He turned with a very significant look and shrug of his shoulders, and answered, ' Miss Wilson.' Then the conversation got general, and continued general during the few hours that I remained with him that evening. (Q.) Did he say that quite distinctly? (A.) Quite distinctly—markedly. She must have heard it.

No. 10.

June 7, 1875.
Steuart v. Robertson.

(Q.) Did it strike you that Major Steuart treated her as his wife that evening? (A.) Most certainly not. (Q.) Was his conduct to her at all such as you would have expected from a husband towards his wife? (A.) I would have hardly expected such conversation and conduct before a wife. (Q.) Did that strike you at the time? (A.) Very much so. (Q.) What was the view you took of the relation between them from the way in which he acted towards her? (A.) That she was simply his mistress. When I left that evening the Major and I walked about on the road for a considerable time, and he then asked me to go into his rooms at Hutton's. He did not stay with Miss Wilson that night. (Q.) Was it about the time of the Birnam games, in 1867 or in 1868, that this conversation took place? (A.) I am sorry I cannot condescend upon dates, I saw him so frequently. (Q.) When you went into his lodgings what took place? (A.) Previous to entering the room Major Steuart seemed as if he had quite enough of drink, and immediately on our entering he turned and locked the door, and said to me, 'What did you mean by putting the question so directly?' I understood that he referred to the question I had put, 'Miss how much?' I said that I wished to test him. He got rather angry, and said, 'Did I not believe him; did I not believe the previous conversations we had had; had I ever found him out telling me a falsehood; and was that the reason why I should put the question so pointedly to him? (Q.) Did he say that angrily? (A.) Yes, but apparently perfectly soberly. (Q.) Seriously? (A.) Yes; he seemed to think that I had not trusted him. Nothing further was said about it, and I sat and smoked a little with him. It was early in the morning that this conversation took place. (Q.) In any of the conversations you had with him about Miss Wilson did he ever say in so many words that he was not married to her? (A.) Distinctly, and that he never would be. He appeared perfectly sincere when he said so. I have had such conversations with him both when he was sober and otherwise. (Q.) Have you ever spoken to Sir William Steuart about his son living in the way he was with this woman? (A.) Not with reference to this woman, but it was my endeavour frequently to reconcile father and son. At first this woman was not referred to in our conversation. (Q.) Did Sir William know quite well of the connection with Miss Wilson? (A.) Distinctly. (Q.) Did he ever express to you a wish that his son would marry? (A.) Yes; he said there might be a prospect of his settling down if he got married. (Q.) What did he say as to the person that he should marry? (A.) Latterly he was indifferent. I mentioned to the Major the conversation which I so had with Sir William. I told him that his father would be pleased if he would marry, whoever he might marry. The Major said he would choose for himself, and take his own time to marry. I have spoken to him about this boy; he owned the paternity, and was proud and very fond of him."

John B. Pople is the owner of the principal hotel at Birnam. His evidence is this,—"I knew the late Major Steuart, Sir William Drummond Steuart's son. He called at my hotel occasionally, and I had frequent conversations with him. I have heard him speak of a Miss Wilson. I never heard him speak of her as Mrs Steuart. He always called her Miss Wilson. (Q.) On the last occasion he was at Birnam, about the end of 1867, did he make any remark to you about the Wilsons thinking to get hold of him? (A.) Yes; he stated to me that he had no doubt they were desirous of getting hold of him, but that he was not married to Miss Wilson, neither did he intend ever to get married. I know that they lived in separate lodgings in Birnam. I have seen them walking together.

No. 10.

June 7, 1875.
Steuart v. Robertson.

I never on any occasion heard Major Steuart speak of Miss Wilson as his wife."

I will now pass rapidly over some months of Major Steuart's life. He sold his commission in the army in September 1867, and out of the proceeds paid old Wilson £150 on account of his claims against him for board and lodging, and articles supplied in his trade. He then made an excursion to Paris, accompanied by the pursuer, the child, old Wilson, and the sister Georgina. He returned to Edinburgh in November, and about the 24th of December Major Steuart went alone to Birnam. For some weeks previous he had not been with the Wilsons, and no one appears to have known where he was. He came up from Birnam about the 1st January 1868 to the Wilsons, remained there till the 7th February 1868, and then went back to Birnam, accompanied by the pursuer and the child.

There is the evidence of Dr Middleton, applicable to January 1868, which I ought not to pass over. Dr Middleton was acquainted with the Wilsons for more than twenty years, and had been old Wilson's medical attendant. He was attending old Wilson in January 1868, and was then asked to prescribe for Major Steuart, who was in bed suffering from bronchitis. He says—"It appeared to me there were none but young females about him, and I thought they were not proper persons to attend him. I therefore asked the Major who was to attend him, to make the poultice and put it on. He turned and said, 'Mrs Steuart.' I said, Who is that, Mr Steuart? He said, 'Maggie.' She was standing beside him at the time. That was the first time I knew about a marriage."—[575] Now, what makes this evidence remarkable is, that Dr Middleton states also that he was asked to visit Major Steuart's child, and did so on December 9th, 10th, 12th, and 14th, 1867. He knew the family, and knew the mother of the child. He knew it was called Major Steuart's child, and yet, although intimate with and attending upon the family, he never was told or knew anything about a marriage before January 1868.

When Major Steuart arrived at Birnam, on 7th February 1868, Mrs Hutton says—"When he came he was very much the worse of drink. He brought Miss Wilson into the house. I gave them dinner in the dining-room. They did not stay long in the house after dinner. Miss Wilson went to Mr Harris's for lodgings. I thought she wished to stay at my house, and I went to Major Steuart and asked him if they were married; if they were, I was quite willing to give them a room in my house. He said they were not married; that I might please myself about giving her a room, but that he did not ask me to do it. She then went to the Harris's." On this occasion also the pursuer is described in Harris's account as "Miss Wilson." On the 20th February 1868, Major Steuart left Birnam and Scotland, and never saw the pursuer again. He left without telling the pursuer, or taking leave of her.

I may now refer to the correspondence between the pursuer and Mr Melville Jameson, the agent of Major Steuart. One of the letters is in October 1867, acknowledging £10 sent to her on account of Major Steuart, and signed "Margaret Wilson." Besides this, there are twenty-seven letters passing between Mr Jameson and the pursuer from the 27th February till the 19th October 1868, when Major Steuart died. All these letters address the pursuer, and are written by her, as "Miss Wilson," and "Margaret Wilson." They concern her relations with Major Steuart and her claims upon him, but they nowhere suggest that those relations or claims are in any way founded on or derived from marriage.

No. 10.

June 7, 1875.
Steuart v. Robertson.

Major Steuart died, as I have said, on the 18th October, and I shall have presently to refer to some of the evidence connected with his death, but I proceed to complete the written and undisputed evidence. Among the undisputed facts, I take to be an interview which the pursuer had a week or ten days after Major Steuart's death with Mr Robert Steuart, a cousin of his father's. This interview is spoken to by Mr Robert Steuart and by his housekeeper; but it is also spoken to by Georgina Wilson, the pursuer's sister, after the evidence of Mr Robert Steuart had been taken in the action of declarator.—[582-3] I think it clear from this evidence that the pursuer announced herself as Miss Wilson, a friend of Major Steuart's. She wished Mr Robert Steuart to induce Sir William to make some provision for her child in bringing it up, and I think it clear upon the evidence that she stated she was sorry to say there was no marriage between her and the Major; and even if the exact expression was, as Georgina represents, "she was sorry she had no documents to shew there was a marriage," it was the same idea that these words were meant to convey. Both Mr Steuart and Georgina agree that the pursuer said that if the Major had lived it would have been all right, which again tallies with the evidence of Christina Kay, that in a letter to Mr Steuart from the pursuer, written about the same time, she said she would swear that had Major Steuart lived he intended to make her his wife.

On the 18th December 1868, in reply to a letter written on behalf of the representatives of Major Steuart, inquiring whether he had any property which belonged to Major Steuart, old Wilson stated that he had nothing, Major Steuart having taken all his property with him at various times when going to the North. He added these remarkable words—"He got away several articles which belonged to me, also some books and two pictures, one of his son's and one of my daughter's, the child's mother, which was a New Year's present." Can this letter have been written by a witness at a ceremony which he believed to have constituted the pursuer the wife of Major Steuart? Old Wilson died on the 11th July 1869. His testamentary disposition, dated the 1st March 1869, takes notice of all his children. The daughter, Mary, who was married at the time, he styles—"Mary Wilson or Wyke, wife of Frederick Wyke, presently residing in Liverpool;" but the pursuer he styles throughout "Margaret Wilson," as if she were unmarried.—[584]

We come next to a multiplepoinding raised for distribution of the succession of Major Steuart, in which a claim was lodged by Robert Denholm as testamentary trustee of old Wilson. Denholm claimed for goods sold to Major Steuart, for moneys lent, and for board and lodging. The seventh article of the condescendence lodged by Denholm states as follows:—"While boarding in Mr Wilson's house Major Steuart became very intimate with his said eldest daughter, Margaret Wilson. The claimant believes and avers she had a son to him, who is still alive, and is now about three years of age. Major Steuart and Margaret Wilson were in the habit of sometimes travelling about and living together. During his residence in Mr Wilson's house Major Steuart was extremely irregular and drunken in his habits, so much so that frequent efforts were made to get him to leave the house, but without avail, tillfinally an exposure of his conduct was threatened, when he left." As to this statement, Denholm depones that the claim was made on information given him by Wilson before his death, except perhaps as regards the insertion of the word "extremely." Copies of this record were communicated to pursuer and the other members of the family, and no objection appears to have been taken to them.

No. 10.

June 7, 1875.
Steuart v. Robertson.

In June 1870 the pursuer was imprisoned on a decree obtained against her by Mackay, a jeweller, for articles supplied to her after Major Steuart's death. She was proceeded against by the name of "Miss Maggie Wilson," and in that name she presented a petition for aliment under the Act of Grace, signing it as "Maggie Wilson," and on making oath that she had no means to pay her debts she was released.—[585]

In the same month of June 1870 the pursuer raised a summons of aliment in her unmarried name as Margaret Wilson against Sir William Steuart, as executor of Major Steuart, of inlying expenses and aliment in respect of her child. The claim in the condescendence in that action is made upon the footing, not of marriage, but of illicit connection, and a decree upon that footing was made by the Lord Ordinary, and a receipt signed by the pursuer in her name as Margaret Wilson for the sum awarded to her. The subsequent receipts for aliment are signed by her quarterly in the same name.—[585]

In the same month of June 1870 Sir William Steuart raised an action of declarator and putting to silence against the female pursuer and her child, in which she did not appear. Evidence was adduced in that action, and a declarator against the marriage was made, which in the present action is sought to be reduced.—[534]

I have only further, on this part of the case, to refer to the marriage of the pursuer with her husband, Lieutenant Robertson. This took place on the 12th March 1871. She avers in her condescendence that before her marriage she fully acquainted him with the whole state of matters between herself and the deceased Major Steuart. The certificate of her marriage is in evidence signed by herself. She is married as "Margaret Wilson," aged twenty-two years, spinster.

I have now, my Lords, gone through the evidence in the case founded on written documents, on facts and conduct as to which there is no dispute, and on the evidence of witnesses whose credibility and accuracy cannot be questioned. It is scarcely possible to conceive a stronger body of negative testimony against a marriage. Nothing, in my opinion, could countervail such a body of testimony except the clearest affirmative evidence, consistent with the probabilities of the case, and coming from witnesses impartial and unprejudiced on the score of interest and sympathy, shewing that they spoke with accurate recollection, and consistent in their narrative of the facts to which they depose. I return to the evidence by which the alleged marriage is attempted to be established, in order to see whether it complies with all or any of these conditions.

Before, however, making some observations upon that evidence, I ought to remind your Lordships of what we are told as to the relative position and as to the character of the two persons principally concerned. Of the character of Major Steuart I have already spoken. His conduct in a moral point of view entitled him to nothing beyond a very low place in the social scale; but as the heir of an old family, and the future possessor of large estates, his worldly position was greatly above that of the pursuer. He appears to have been at least double her age, and although he appears to have admired her, there is little if any trace on either side of any romantic attachment between them. Of the character of the pursuer I do not desire to say more than that, looking to the evidence before us, the life which she appears to have led, the atmosphere in which she lived, the scenes which she witnessed, the language which she heard, and in which, unfortunately, she sometimes seems to have joined, cannot be supposed to have been otherwise than unfavourable to the development and cultivation of moral principle and conduct. The acquaintanceship between her and Major Steuart, looking to their relative age and position, their character, and the temptations which were certain to accompany it, was one from which her parents might well have been expected rather to have withdrawn her than to have encouraged her in it; but they appear to have promoted the acquaintanceship by every means in their power. The evidence of the brother and sister of the pursuer, though given with a manifest desire to tone down the facts as to this part of the case, sufficiently shews that Major Steuart was permitted by the parents of the pursuer to take away the pursuer for hours at a time, sometimes on foot, sometimes in carriages, when and where he pleased. The narrative of an excursion to Murthly by Major Steuart, the pursuer, and her father, in December 1865, when they arrived at Perth at midnight, drove on through the night to Murthly, got into the house of Gold, the land steward, at three o'clock in the morning, the men being under the influence of drink, and continuing to drink whisky there, and ending by breaking open the door of Murthly Castle, is a narrative which cannot be read, especially in connection with the conversation which took place, without astonishment and pain.—[543-4] When to this your Lordships add that old Wilson, knowing the character of Major Steuart, and that he was ejected by reason of his conduct from the hotel in Edinburgh where he had been living, received him without remonstrance, and certainly without any reason or arrangement which could justify so unusual a course, into the small floor of rooms where Major Steuart and the pursuer might at any time, and must have been, left together alone, and would always naturally be closely associated, your Lordships will, I think, be of opinion that the utmost which could have been done was done to place danger and temptation in the way of the pursuer, and opportunity in that of Major Steuart.

No. 10.

June 7, 1875. Steuart v. Robertson.

The history of all that occurred from August 1865, when Major Steuart was received as an inmate in Clyde Street, until February 1866, is either not forthcoming, or is spoken of by witnesses who are obviously reticent. Before February 1866 Major Steuart had an illness which confined him to his room. It appears to have been of the usual description. He was, as Georgina Wilson says, "coming off drink." He was nursed by the pursuer, who sat with him in his room. Georgina accompanies this fact with the statement that the door was always open, so that anybody passing could see into the room, and the bed was facing the door. But as to this, inasmuch as she was at school from half-past eight in the morning, her evidence does not do more than exhibit a natural desire to exclude inferences which are sufficiently obvious. The conclusions which the neighbours appear to have drawn are not to be wondered at. One of the pursuer's witnesses, Mortimer, the butcher, living at the corner of the street, says he told Major Steuart on the 14th February 1866 that there was no person he had a better right to marry than the pursuer, seeing that they were already living as man and wife; and Mrs Janet Forman or Wilson, a sister-in-law of the pursuer, lets fall in her cross-examination this singular admission, that when her mother told her on the 14th February, "Maggie Wilson is married," she said, "I could have told you that six months ago." There might, perhaps, be some further inferences of the same kind drawn from other parts of the evidence, but it is enough to say, that although there is no sufficient ground to hold it established that sexual intercourse had taken place between Major Steuart and the pursuer before the 13th February 1868, there was every opportunity for it to have taken place, and it is impossible to hold that the allegation of the pursuer, which is the very foundation of her case, that carnal intercourse between her and Major Steuart took place on the 13th February after the alleged ceremony, and did not take place before, is established.

Then, my Lords, there are some general questions connected with the alleged ceremony of the 13th February 1866 which are upon the surface, and to which no satisfactory answer has been, or, I think, can be, given. Why, even if an irregular marriage were necessary or desirable, was no witness outside the family brought to be present? This appears to have been the first observation of Mortimer, the neighbouring butcher, when he was told of a marriage the next morning; and if he could be told of it the next morning, it is difficult to see why he could not have been made a witness of it the night before; and if a witness was not to be obtained, why could some exchange of writing not have taken place? But further, and above all, what is the theory of the pursuer as to the reason why an irregular marriage was resorted to? The case made on the part of the pursuer in the evidence is, that the intention and arrangement was that the marriage should be kept secret until, either by his father's death or by the recovery of some property then in litigation, Major Steuart should be in a better position to maintain a wife, or that it should be kept secret in order that Sir William Steuart might not know of it; and the irregular character of the marriage is attempted to be accounted for by this necessity for secrecy. The same evidence also asserts that the marriage was brought about at the time it was said to have occurred in order to put an end to the scandal which had arisen ("to stop people's mouths" is the expression of George Wilson) from Major Steuart living with the Wilsons and associating as he did with the pursuer. These suggestions are attended with difficulties which appear to me to be insuperable. If the object was to stop people's mouths, this could not be done by a secret marriage. The cause of the scandal was open and notorious; it was intended to continue, and nothing but a marriage equally open could terminate the scandal. The course, therefore, which is said to have brought the marriage about ought to have brought about a regular and public and not a clandestine marriage. But, on the other hand, can we accept the motive for secrecy which is suggested, so far as Sir William Steuart is concerned? He appears to have placed no impediment in the way of his son marrying any person whomsoever, and although it may appear singular, he is even shewn to have expressed a desire, when he found that his son was going about with the pursuer in 1865, that he should marry her, and this expression of Sir William Steuart had been communicated to old Wilson.—[Gold's evidence, 544.] As regards his means for supporting a wife, Major Steuart does not appear to have been much embarrassed by the consideration of what his social position required from him. Living as he was content to do with the pursuer, he would not have been subjected to a greater expense after a regular than after an irregular marriage. And it even appears that, as regards the provision of a residence by his father, he would have benefited, and not lost, by marrying.

I now come to make a few observations on the witnesses as to the alleged ceremony. The witnesses are two, George Wilson and Kellet. If the bedding is taken as part of the whole ceremony, neither witness was present at the whole. George Wilson left before the bedding. Kellet did not come into the room till after the conversation had commenced. The evidence of George Wilson,

No. 10.

June 7, 1875.
Steuart v. Robertson.

being that of a relation, would not, according to the former state of Scotch law, have been admissible; and both as to this and as to the evidence of Kellet your Lordships will, I think, agree with the force of the remarks made by Lord Neaves in the case of Roxburgh v. Watson, 23d October 1868, 7 Macph. 19.

His Lordship says with reference to the evidence in that case:—"But, although admitted, it is not only competent, but incumbent upon the Court to look upon such evidence with great jealousy, and to weigh it in the most scrupulous manner, to see what is the character and position of the witnesses generally, and whether they are corroborated to such an extent as to secure confidence that they are telling the truth. Nothing would be easier than for a vicious and designing woman to fasten a marriage on a man by the evidence of her own relations and associates, and this more particularly when the man was dead, and his representatives are necessarily at a great disadvantage in disproving the alleged facts, and detecting the imposture. Still more, if the man who is the subject of the fraud has led a libertine life, and is of drunken habits, and if the woman who forms the scheme against him has been his mistress, additional facilities for fraud and falsehood are afforded, which make it specially the duty of a Court to look with suspicion on the case. It is obvious, too, that a false marriage may easily be trumped up in this way, not merely by inventing the whole story, but by taking as a foundation some facts that in reality may have occurred, quite insufficient to make a marriage, but which admit of being so coloured and dressed up by a liberal suppressio veri, and a very slight suggestio falsi, as to assume a relevancy and importance not truly due to them."

I now turn to the evidence of George Wilson. In order to test the credibility and accuracy of this witness in points as to which he cannot be contradicted, it is necessary to consider carefully his evidence where he can be contradicted. His object throughout his testimony is to represent Major Steuart as a moral and well conducted man. He says,—"I never saw him the worse of drink at any time. I have seen him take a glass or so, but I have never seen him the worse of it. He was tidy in his appearance so far as I saw. During the whole time I knew him I never saw him the worse of drink. All the drink I ever saw in my father's house was a glass of ale for supper, and sometimes a glass of toddy before bed. I never saw him the worse of drink. I never saw him drink a great deal. He was a very small drinker to my idea." My Lords, if there is one thing which is established in this proof beyond the possibility of a doubt it is that Major Steuart was a confirmed and notorious drunkard, and that he was generally in his appearance disreputable and untidy, and it is quite impossible but that George Wilson, who had constant opportunities of seeing him, must have known that this was the case.

In his narrative of what occurred after supper on the 13th February he states that Major Steuart was sitting in a chair crying, the tears coming over his eyes. He says he was perfectly sober at the time—as sober as when he himself was giving his evidence. It is scarcely possible that both these statements can be correct. In a strong man in middle life there was nothing in what occurred which could account for tears except a maudlin imbecility arising from drink, and your Lordships have no security that the state of Major Steuart at the time was not that which, recurring constantly at other periods, George Wilson describes to be one of sobriety, but which a host of other witnesses call drunkenness.

But there is another detail of the narrative to which both George Wilson and Mrs Kellet give a conspicuous place. George Wilson says Major Steuart went down on one knee, put his hand into his waistcoat pocket, and took out a wedding ring, which he placed on the third finger of the pursuer's left hand. Mrs Kellet says he went down on his knee, took a ring out of his pocket, "I do not remember which pocket, and put it on the third finger of the pursuer's left hand." So far the narratives agree, even in the detail they mention the third finger, which might well have been overlooked or forgotten. It must, however, be borne in mind that the supper of the 13th February was not in any way connected with a marriage pre-arranged or expected on either side. It was intended to celebrate Major Steuart's birthday, which was really the 11th of February, but that being a Sunday the supper was postponed till the 13th. George Wilson says he did not believe a marriage was thought of till Major Steuart got up and spoke of stopping people's mouths. It is true that George Wilson says that his mother had told him something about what she expected, but this is not corroborated by any other testimony, and Mrs Kellet, the confidant of the pursuer, does not suggest that the pursuer had said or hinted to her anything about a marriage. But if the marriage was not pre-arranged or anticipated, how could it have happened that Major Steuart should have a wedding ring ready in his pocket? No answer has been given to that question. Where did he get it? Did he buy it? He was a man perfectly well known in Edinburgh, and all his movements seem to have attracted attention. Evidence, one would suppose, could have been procured to shew how he had become possessed of the ring, if indeed the ring came out of his possession. But the matter does not rest there. The condescendence of the pursuer in its present form tallies, as to the ring, with the evidence of George Wilson and Mrs Kellet, but the original condescendence, we find from the judgment of Lord Shand, was in this form:—"For some days previous to the marriage after-mentioned Major Steuart went to various shops, at which he ordered sundry articles, and in various other ways made preparations for the said marriage. About this time Mr Wilson was pressing Major Steuart to say finally when he would marry the said pursuer. Accordingly, Major Steuart determined to enter into a private contract of marriage with the said pursuer in her father's house, and this resolution was carried out on the evening of Tuesday, the 13th day of February 1866. On the afternoon of that day he caused the pursuer to put on a black silk dress which she had received from him in a present, to have her hair dressed by a hairdresser, and otherwise he prepared for his wedding. Supper was then served up in the sitting-room, and when it was over, and in the presence of Mr and Mrs Wilson, the pursuer's brother George, and Mrs Kellet, Major Steuart filled the wine glasses all round, he then went down on his knees, and for the purpose of carrying through a marriage between him and the pursuer, he said to the pursuer, 'Maggie, will you be my wife.' The said pursuer replied 'Yes,' and then and there accepted the said Major Steuart as her husband, and they became married persons. He then took a plain gold marriage ring from his vest pocket, and placed it on the third finger of her left hand, after which he held up his right hand, and, while still on his knees, said, 'I swear by the Almighty God that I take you for my wife.'" This was a story into which the narrative of the ring fitted without inconsistency, and this story must have been told, in the first instance, from the instructions of the pursuer. It seems impossible to avoid the conclusion that it was found that this story, as told in the original condescendence, could not be made to square with the story of a marriage brought about unex-

No. 10.
June 7, 1875.
Steuart v. Robertson.

pectedly by the pressure of old Wilson, and that the greater part of the story was changed to meet this altered aspect of the ceremony, but that, unfortunately, the incident of the ring was left unerased.

Of Mrs Kellet's evidence I need not say more than I have done already, beyond remarking that she varies from George Wilson's evidence as to Major Steuart weeping. She says,—"I did not observe him weeping on the night of the ceremony. I did not notice tears in his eyes. I am not very good at seeing unless I have my glasses on." Under these circumstances it might perhaps be asked, how is she able to say the ring was placed on the third finger?

There is some further evidence, not of any one present at the alleged ceremony, but closely connected with it in point of time, to which I should refer. One of the witnesses who gives evidence of this kind is Agnes Forbes. She was a servant of the Wilsons on the 13th February 1866, and at the time of the trial it appears she was living with the pursuer. I attach little importance to her evidence. She is, I think, discredited by the testimony allowed to be adduced after the case passed into the Inner-House.—[595] But, in addition to this, she is contradicted on several important points. She places the visit of Caw, the bailiff, about ten o'clock on the morning of the 19th February, whereas Caw says that it was at four in the afternoon, and from the nature of the visit it is not likely that he could be mistaken.—[555] She says, further, she never in her life saw Major Steuart drunk. She says also she heard the pursuer, in the case in the Police Court to which I have referred, say she was legally married to Major Steuart, the contrary being, as I think, clearly proved. But there is a portion of Agnes Forbes' evidence which suggests a further difficulty. I have already commented on the allegation of the pursuer that the marriage was to be kept secret, and Mrs Kellet says Mrs Wilson was very particular in saying it should be kept quiet lest it might hurt the Major, and the Major used to say to Mrs Kellet he liked her "because she was not a blab." Agnes Forbes, however, states that the pursuer was called Mrs Steuart quite publicly in the house, and to everybody who came out and in, and that in speaking of her outside she always spoke of her as Mrs Steuart. It is in fact extremely difficult to know not only what reason can be suggested for keeping the marriage, if it had taken place, secret, but also whether, wherever and whenever a marriage was talked about, it was talked of as a secret. In my opinion, where a marriage was talked of, it was talked of openly, and in order to serve a purpose which could not be attained except by speaking of it openly.

I must notice the evidence of three other members of the family. Georgina Wilson was about fourteen years of age at the time. She was not present at the alleged ceremony. She states, as Agnes Forbes did, that the day following she saw a wedding ring on her sister's finger, but some part of her evidence is important, as shewing how little reliance can be placed on the evidence of interested relatives in such a case. She is asked—"(Q.) On what footing did you understand that he came to the house? (A.) I understood that he was engaged to my sister. (Q.) From the time he was turned out of the hotel? (A.) Yes. (Q.) And before he came to the house at all? (A.) Yes. (Q.) Have you heard both your father and mother speak of that? (A.) Yes. (Q.) Did they say that there was an engagement before he came to the house at all? (A.) Yes. (Q.) Then you did not understand that he was in the house as a boarder or lodger? (A.) Yes he was, but he did not pay—I understood he was to pay. (Q.) Did your sister and the Major act all along from the time he came to the house as engaged people? (A.) Yes, they used to go out together. They frequently went out alone. I cannot say where they went—perhaps for a drive, and sometimes for a fish dinner at Newhaven." It need hardly be said that this is inconsistent, both with all the other evidence in the case, and with the condescendence. Again, after much fencing, she says it was from her mother, and not from the pursuer at all, she understood that the pursuer was married. She always "took it" she was married. "She did not say anything to me about it. She never made me her confidant." Finally, in order to establish a difference of treatment before and after marriage, she tells us this—"He gave my father presents to give her. The Major never kissed my sister in my presence; he was more of a gentleman than to do that. I don't think lovers do that until after the night of the marriage. Until after the night of marriage he never kissed her in my presence. He gave the presents to my father to give to her. If my father was standing beside her he would perhaps give them to herself. If it was a Steuart tartan dress or a scarf he gave it to her before my father; he came into the shop and gave it to her before my father. After the marriage he always gave the presents direct to herself." Alfred Wilson was still younger than Georgina. He is brought forward to say that he, though not ten years of age at the time, noticed the marriage ring on her finger after she came out of her bedroom the next morning, and that he saw them in bed together the next morning (the fifth person, if we are to believe the evidence, brought into the room for that purpose). There was another sister in the house, who was older than Alfred, Mary Wilson, now Mrs Wyke. She, for some reason, is not examined, although the pursuer obtained a commission under which she might have examined her in England, where she was residing.

Janet Wilson is sister-in-law of the pursuer. She also, as she says, saw the pursuer and Major Steuart in bed on the morning of the 14th February. This was between ten and eleven—a singular circumstance, when we remember that Georgina Wilson states that before she went to school at half-past eight on that morning she had seen the pursuer leave her bedroom. Janet Wilson, however, says that Major Steuart then told her that the pursuer was his wife.—[553] The same, or the next day, Major Steuart went with the pursuer to Leith, to Janet Wilson's house, and said to Janet Wilson of the pursuer, "This was his wife, Lady Steuart,"—again a statement difficult to believe if he had told her that she was his wife a few hours before. The cross-examination of Janet Wilson, however, and the circumstance that neither a Mr nor Mrs Forman, who are said to have been present during the visit to Leith, are produced, make it impossible to rely on the accuracy of the statements of this witness.

I pass over without any detailed observation the evidence of a number of witnesses in the case who speak to statements of conversations with the Major or the pursuer, or both, in hotels, in places of amusement, in casual conversations, in drinking parties, in the course of which the Major called the pursuer his wife, or Mrs Steuart, or spoke of her as such, and spoke of her child as his boy. These would in any case be equivocal acts, and would have to be considered with reference to the circumstances under which the statements were made, and in the present case, in a number of instances, the statements were obviously made in places and under circumstances where for the purposes of the moment it was necessary that the pursuer should appear to be Major Steuart's wife. The statements made upon these occasions are not, taken altogether, nor are any of them, for a moment to be put in comparison with the deliberate statements made on important occasions, when no object was to be gained, to Dr Dunsmure, Mr Rigg, Dr Simson, Dr Culbard, Mr Pople, and others.

No. 10.
June 7, 1875.
Steuart v. Robertson.

But there is in the present case a further peculiarity with regard to the statements relied upon by the pursuer. I have submitted to your Lordships the points on which I think the evidence of the alleged ceremony is not to be taken as trustworthy, but I am far from saying that I think there was no foundation for that evidence. I do not believe that a valid marriage per verba de præsenti took place, or was supposed by any of the parties to have taken place. That something took place which was not a marriage, but which yet might be represented, and was meant to be represented, in a way "to stop people's mouths," to use the expression of George Wilson, is, I think, very probable. The places where this would be used, and the persons to whom it would be used, were places where the Wilsons were known, and the persons with whom they were accustomed to associate. Those were the persons whose "mouths" were "to be stopped," and if it answered the purpose of "stopping their mouths," that was all that was required. It may well be that the Wilsons hoped for and desired something more, but they may have been content to wait for the chance of getting something more at a future time, or of the cohabitation gliding, if they could make it do so, into a marriage by habit and repute. If this is a just view of what occurred on the night of the 13th February it would account for the statements as to the pursuer being married made to Mortimer, the butcher, and to other persons in or about Edinburgh with whom the Wilsons were associating, and for the statements of a very different kind made upon all serious occasions by Major Steuart.

I have now only to refer to the circumstances, so far as they are material, connected with the death of Major Steuart. He was living at Hythe, in the south of Hampshire, in 1868. He had been drinking, his servant Budd tells us, "very heavily," and had a very bad attack of delirium tremens. While labouring under that attack he pushed a stick through his windpipe on Thursday the 15th October, and he died the following Sunday night, the 18th. On the 15th October, that is, on the Thursday, Budd, his servant, telegraphed by his desire to Thornby Hall, near Rugby, for Captain Cooper, who had been a brother officer of Major Steuart in the 93d Regiment, and with whom he had kept up a correspondence, although they had not met since 1859. Budd also telegraphed for Mr Jameson, the law-agent of Major Steuart. Captain Cooper arrived on the evening of Friday the 16th, and the arrival of Mr Jameson took place at mid-day on Saturday the 17th. It is to be observed that it does not appear that Major Steuart desired the pursuer to be sent for, or in any way to be communicated with. Mr Jameson says he informed Major Steuart of his success in the litigation relating to some personal property in the Court of Session, that he appreciated this success, that he was intelligent up to his death, and was not in delirium, but that speaking appeared to occasion difficulty to him, and there was no prolonged conversation. He says he alluded to his son, and referring to the money which would come under the decree of the Court, said, "Well, Cooper and you will take charge of the matter, and pay my debts and see to the boy." Mr Jameson says that, of his own accord, and without any instructions, he prepared the draft of a settlement that might have been executed if approved of by the Major, but it cannot now be found. He says it must have been prepared on the Saturday night, or probably the Sunday forenoon, but that on the Sunday the Major was not in a fit state to sign it. Mr Jameson cannot remember that he spoke to Major Steuart of the pursuer. He cannot remember whether the Major at the time he said "the boy," may have added "and the mother." The impression of the conversation on his mind was that the boy was the individual who was favoured. This is the evidence of Mr Jameson, given by him when called as a witness for the pursuer.

To this, however, must be added a description of the state in which Major Steuart was, which was given by Mr Jameson at the time in a letter which he wrote to Mr Galletly in Edinburgh, and from which description I do not understand that Mr Jameson now desires to recede. It is dated "Bath, Monday, 19th October 1868," and is in these words—"My dear Sir, our poor friend the Major, to whose death-bed I was called by a telegram on Friday, died at Hythe this morning. With the exception of an occasional look and word of intelligence he was not in a state to make any settlement of his affairs, and unless his father, whom I have seen here, is disposed to give effect to his verbally expressed wishes, gathered from occasional moments of isolated responses, the executry must be arranged by law. He intended that his friend Captain Cooper (a very excellent man, who was also at his death-bed) and I should be his executors, that we should get the money now due to him, pay all my advances and expenses and his debts, and then retain the remainder for behoof of the boy. I had prepared such a document, giving effect to his understood wishes, but he was not so long conscious as to be able to execute it."

Captain Cooper describes the interviews which he had with Major Steuart in these words—"I went into the Major's bedroom, which was shewn to me by Budd. I found the Major in bed when I went in. He mistook me for another officer who had been in the regiment, and said, 'Hillo, Goldsmith.' The room was dark—duskyish. There was an officer of that name in the 93d. I was not in the least surprised at the Major so addressing me, for I had often been mistaken for Captain Goldsmith before. I am like him, and have been mistaken for him on several occasions. I said to the Major, 'I am not Goldsmith; I am Dick Cooper.' The Major recognised me then, and said, 'Oh! how are you?' He was very unwell. I sat up with him most of the night. I had very little conversation with him; I did not like to have any that night. On the Saturday morning I again saw the Major. He was considerably better. He had slept and taken some nourishment. When I went in he recognised me at once. I was in his room from time to time throughout the day, twenty minutes or half-an-hour at a time. I spoke to him occasionally. I remember that on that day the Major made a rather pointed observation to me. He said, 'You are married, aren't you?' I said, 'Yes, I am, and so are you, aren't you?' He said, 'Yes, I am.' He also said, 'Have you got a son?' I said, 'No, not yet.' He said he had one, and he said something which led me to believe that he was very proud of his son. That was the whole conversation."

It is remarkable that in this statement it is not suggested that the pursuer was referred to, or her name mentioned, and the only words which can be relied upon are the words "Yes, I am," the weight to be attached to which would depend on the amount of intelligence of the dying man as to the question, and of the accuracy of the listener as to the answer. But the question put by Major Steuart to Captain Cooper, "You are married, aren't you?" is remarkable, because it appears that Major Steuart had received not long before a letter from Captain Cooper, dated the 24th February 1868, speaking to him of his wife, and sending him a message from her. I own that, even if no further light could be thrown upon these three monosyllables spoken to Captain Cooper, I should not, bearing in mind the silence of Major Steuart on the subject of the pursuer to his confidential agent Mr Jameson, have been disposed to attach to them the weight which they seem to have carried in the Court of Session.

No. 10.
June 7, 1875.
Steuart v. Robertson.

But there is some subsequent evidence of Captain Cooper which requires to be taken in connection with that to which I have already referred. He says:—"Mr Jameson came that Saturday afternoon. I did not know him by sight, and asked Budd to point him out to me as soon as the packet arrived, which he did. (Q.) Did you speak to Mr Jameson about the marriage? (A.) I told him, first of all, that I knew everything connected with Major Steuart. (Q.) It was in that way you put it? (A.) Yes; I told him I was his most intimate friend. I learned from Mr Jameson that the Major had recovered a sum of money from Sir William Steuart. I think the amount was £11,000 or £13,000, or something like that. That was the first time I had ever heard of it. I saw the Major after learning that fact, but I did not make any reference to the money to him except in this way, that I said he ought to make provision for his wife and child. I did not like to allude to the money because the Major himself had not told me about it, but I suggested that he should make provision for his wife and child. (Q.) Did you use the word 'wife'? (A.) Yes. (Q.) What did he say? (A.) He said it would be all right. (Q.) What did you understand by that? (A.) I understood that he would do something with Mr Jameson so as to make a provision for his wife and child. I stipulated with Mr Jameson that his just debts should be paid first. I had some conversation with Mr Jameson on the subject afterwards. My conversation about the debts was not with Major Steuart, but with Mr Jameson. (Q.) Did you tell Mr Jameson anything about Scotch marriages? (A.) I said I disliked Scotch marriages. (Q.) Did you say anything about the son of a fishing-tackle maker's daughter not succeeding to Murthly Castle? (A.) Yes; I said I did not care about that. I understood that some papers were drawn out by Mr Jameson on the Saturday night. I saw him with some papers that looked like legal documents. We thought the Major was doing better on the Sunday morning. I went to church that morning, and when I returned I thought he was better. He spat a good deal and passed blood from his throat. A medical man saw him, and we thought him somewhat better on the Sunday morning. I cannot tell why the paper was not signed. I expected from what had taken place that it would be signed. Nobody told me that it was signed, and I did not think it my business to ask, as Major Steuart's agent was there. Eventually I found it was not signed."

There is in this a statement of much that Captain Cooper thought or said, but little that was said by Major Steuart. Captain Cooper suggested that he should make a provision for his wife and child, although Mr Jameson thought him not in a state to execute an instrument for the purpose of making such a provision. Major Steuart said "it would be all right," a phrase which, even if he understood what he was saying, might be interpreted in many different ways. But the best insight into the impression really produced on the minds of both Captain Cooper and Mr Jameson by what occurred at Hythe is to be found in two letters which passed between them a few days subsequently, after they had had the conversation to which Captain Cooper refers as to Scotch marriages. Mr Jameson writes to Captain Cooper from Perth on the 2d November 1868 as follows:—"My dear Sir,—There is no word from Sir William Steuart in reply to mine, and I now expect none. Mr Condie sent to me to-day for the address of the medical attendant, and I gave him Mr Giles' address. It has struck me that it may be to communicate with him to ascertain if the Major during his last illness was ever able to say a word intelligibly as to his affairs, or to indicate with a serious mind his wishes in regard to them, as represented by me. I have written to Mr Giles by this post requesting a certificate as to the state of Major Steuart's mind when I was with him. I told him that I was aware that he frequently wandered when sleeping or dreaming, but that when aroused and spoken to he seemed to recognise the persons addressing, and answered intelligibly on the subject of conversation; that these were of course quite casual and momentary, there being a reluctance on your and my part to fatigue him with any continuous conversation, but that these were quite sufficient to indicate to me the intentions he had, namely, that you and I should take the charge of the money, pay his debts, and see to the boy; the money, the debts, and the boy being all severally the subject of conversation before between him and myself. I presume Mr Giles can have no hesitation to give such a certificate, and if he sends it to me good and well. My letter will at all events caution him, I should think, against saying anything imprudent to Sir William, or his agent Mr Condie. I had your letter, and am glad you approve of mine to Sir William. Unfortunately, in the absence of any written document duly signed by our late friend, the law confers the right of administration on the father, and we cannot legally compel him to recognise any expression or wish on the part of his son. My letter was simply meant, as any other appeal can solely mean, as an appeal to his honourable feelings. The money was the Major's is not denied by the father—the father had no claim to it. He had not even paid him an allowance for a long time, and any one might suppose that under these circumsnances he would at once say 'I won't touch it. Let Captain Cooper and Mr Jameson, my son's only friends, do with it according to my son's wishes. I refuse to avail myself of the advantage given me, namely, by the absence of any legal will.' The debts of course he must pay, and the boy will have a claim for aliment, but it would be covered, so far as the law is concerned, by an annuity of £20 per annum, perhaps less, so that £400 would do for this, instead of £4000, the half of the succession which he ought to give, and this will be pocketing for himself £4000. The girl, Miss Wilson (the mother of the boy), has no legal claim, and we would fail in any attempt at law in her behalf. If we get the £4000 we would be able to do something for her, if we found her deserving, by the allowance of a suitable board for the boy."

No. 10.
June 7, 1875.
Steuart v. Robertson.

Nothing can be clearer than that Mr Jameson, the writer of this letter, knew and expected Captain Cooper to recognise that there was no question of marriage in the case. There appears to have been another letter from Jameson to Captain Cooper, and then, on the 12th November 1868, Captain Cooper replies in these words:—"My dear Sir,—I am in receipt of yours of the 11th, and enclose you a letter I received in reply to one of mine from Dr Bond. I should like to know how far we can legally force Sir William, for I fear that as he has not treated you with common courtesy he might refuse to see me. I would give him one more chance, and if you think fit, might mention that I will be happy to call on him and explain matters, and that if he will see me I will go and wait on him at any hour or day he may think fit. If he won't do this I should be inclined to enter an action against him. Believe me, yours, &c., RICHARD COOPER."—I cannot read this letter as referring to any claim of the pursuer or her boy founded on marriage. The letter appears to me in effect to concur in Mr Jameson's statement that on this head there was no legal claim, and to suggest an action against Sir William Steuart, on the only foundation on which Mr Jameson had said it could be maintained, namely, for aliment.

No. 10.
June 7, 1875.
Steuart v. Robertson.

I do not delay your Lordships by an examination of the conflict of testimony between Budd and Captain Cooper as to whether the former told the latter at Hythe that Major Steuart was "married right enough." Budd denies that he made any such statement, and it is due to him to say that he has been called as a witness on behalf of the pursuer as well as of the appellant, and although he lived for a considerable time in the service of Major Steuart it is not pretended that he ever said to any person else of his master that he was married. It may well be the case that Captain Cooper believed the meaning of Budd to be that which he expressed in his evidence, but a very slight variation of expression, or a qualification of tone or gesture, would have greatly modified the effect of the answer of Budd, and it is remarkable that Captain Cooper himself admits that Budd immediately afterwards spoke to him of the pursuer, and said that "Miss Wilson" had not been telegraphed for.

I have now, my Lords, at much greater length than I could have desired, adverted to such portions of the volumnious evidence in this case as appeared to me to require notice. I could have been well content to have rested my decision upon the grounds expressed by the minority of the learned Judges, and especially Lord Deas and Lord Shand, with nearly the whole of whose very able judgments I concur, but I have deemed it necessary, owing to the respect I entertain for the learned Judges who compose the majority, to indicate the grounds upon which I am compelled to differ from their opinions. The burden which lay upon the pursuer to establish a marriage in this case I think she has not discharged. On the contrary, her opponents have been able, from circumstances, many of them singular, to present a body of evidence of unusual weight, derived from documents written, acts done, and declarations made, all bearing with a strength almost irresistible against the marriage. To countervail this evidence, the biased, inconsistent, improbable, and inaccurate evidence of the alleged ceremony, is, as I think, altogether inadequate, and the interlocutors affirming the marriage ought, in my opinion, to be reversed, and the appellant assoilzied, with expenses in the Court of Session.

Lord Hatherley concurred.

Lord O'Hagan.—My Lords, the lucid and elaborate judgment of my noble and learned friend on the woolsack has made further discussion almost superfluous; but the case is one of importance, and as my view is adverse to that of learned Judges for whom I have very sincere respect, I think it becoming that I should state, with as little detail as possible, the general grounds on which I have felt myself coerced to differ from them.

I was struck by an observation of Mr Scott as to the difficulty affecting comparative strangers to the peculiar circumstances and feelings of the Scottish people when they are required to consider acts performed under the influence of those circumstances and feelings, and according to the customs which have grown out of them, upon a question of fact, and the question here is altogether so. I should defer greatly to the opinion of those possessing local knowledge of which we cannot boast, but in this case it seems to me that undisputed statements and admitted documents give us special means of supplying the want of it. The remark would have extreme force if our attention were called only to the circumstances of the alleged marriage of the 13th February 1866, but it fails to touch in the same manner the accumulated records, letters, and accounts which cast light upon those doubtful circumstances, and appear to me decisive in favour of the appellant. Had we, however, to deal merely with the proof afforded of the events of the 13th February, I should be inclined gravely to doubt, with the minority of the learned Judges who have discussed the case with such elaborate fulness and conscientious care, whether it should be held to establish that "free, deliberate, full, and solemn consent,"—to use the words employed in Jolly v. Macgregor, 3 W. and S., 195—with the intention of constituting a marriage between the pursuer and Major Steuart, such as the law of Scotland requires for that purpose.

No. 10.

June 7, 1875.
Steuart v. Robertson.

The burthen of proof is on the pursuer, and she comes to undertake it after the lapse of years, when some material witnesses have passed away, the memories of others have been weakened, and effectual inquiry as to important facts has become impossible. Assuming that something like the scene described by George Wilson did take place, we must remember that its value for the pursuer's object depends entirely on the precise words that were employed by the Major on that occasion; and for their ascertainment we are left to the evidence of two witnesses, George Wilson and Kellet (I do not rely on Agnes Forbes, for the reasons which have been already given by the Lord Chancellor), who are to be regarded with caution,—the one as the brother of the pursuer, and the other as her friend, speaking of occurrences in the absence of any person unconnected with her. The father and the mother are dead, and at least the father's after conduct seems to me, for reasons I shall suggest, flatly inconsistent with the notion that on that evening he was witness to anything which he then deemed a valid and real marriage.

Then it is plain that the words alleged by Wilson and Kellet are mere fragments of a lengthened conversation, and we are left without any means of judging how far they were modified or affected in their meaning by those which preceded and came after them. And yet, before we pronounce that a binding contract, uniting the parties for all time, we must have sufficient reason to be satisfied that we know, if not the ipsissima verba, at least the precise effect of the communication that passed between them. Is it not very difficult to affirm that we have such knowledge from the report of a few sentences or portions of sentences, especially when the reporters vary from each other, and from the statement of the pursuer herself? In her original condescendence she makes the Major ask, will she be his wife, but neither of the witnesses speak of such a query. Wilson alleges his words to have been—"I am poor now, and I cannot marry, but I will marry you in the Scotch fashion;" whilst Kellet says that on her coming in he said, "He could not do what he would wish to do at the present time; but, he added, I will shew you, Wilson, what I will do, or what I can do." These words are different, as are others, also deponed to by the witnesses, and it is natural that they should not exactly agree, even if they be honest, after such a lapse of time; but their differences are material when the question is whether a marriage was then and there solemnly effected between the pursuer and a man who declared, if we believe them, that he could not marry or do what he wished at "the present time," and when the supply of an omitted sentence might make indisputable the view presented in the Court below, that no present marriage was contemplated, whatever might have been the hope of the future on the one side, or the willingness to encourage it on the other.

The questionable incident of the ring, and the somewhat equivocal declaration

No. 10.
June 7, 1875.
Steuart v. Robertson.

that the pursuer was his wife "before Heaven," involving a possible repudiation for the time of the force of earthly law, which by-and-bye might be invoked to sustain the Heavenly sanction, have been fairly assailed as rather weakening the pursuer's case. And certainly it does appear to me that it would be a serious thing, on evidence of words so meagre, so uncertain, so capable of being shifted to another sense by a misconceived phrase or a forgotten syllable, to establish the most sacred and momentous relation which can unite human beings in this world.

The difficulty of giving such grave effect to such proof, so offered, at such a distance of time, and with such circumstances of impeachment, is much increased when we remember the evidence as to the conduct and demeanour of the pursuer and her sisters, one of whom, Mary, still living, capable of speaking to very material facts, and challenged by personal allusions to appear, has not been produced; the utterly unrestrained intercourse between the Major and the pursuer in their frequent drives together, with her father's sanction—the introduction of a man so abandoned in his habits to such a dwelling, occupied by young girls, and with such domestic arrangements as have been detailed in proof—the condition of the Major on the evening in question, as described in the testimony "coming off drink,"—the absence of all independent witnesses, and the manifest want of any previous preparations for a marriage, of which the Major is said to have spoken only when violently threatened with expulsion from the house;—all these things, I say, and others, for reasons I do not pause to detail, seem to increase the difficulty of reaching any assurance that the words deponed to by Wilson and Kellet were deliberately intended to constitute a present and concluded marriage.

It does seem somewhat startling to give such an effect to such doubtful words, spoken, if at all, at a nocturnal carouse by a habitual drunkard, even then emerging from a fit of intoxication, weak in mind and body, and weeping maudlin tears, and without a friend to counsel or a witness to protect him. But, as I have said, if the case had stopped there I should have had much greater difficulty in acting on any impression of my own as against the judgment of the Court below.

I should have hesitated to differ from eminent Judges fully conversant, not only with the law, but also with the manners of Scotland, and though certainly with doubt and misgiving, I should have possibly declined to concur in a reversal. But the case does not so rest; and, looking to the subsequent conduct and acts of the parties, I find myself obliged to hold the appeal sustained. In all inquiries of this sort I apprehend the true rule is not to regard singly and apart the one transaction on which reliance is placed as constituting the marriage. It is necessary to exercise a "large discourse of reason looking before and after," and, from all the antecedents and all the consequents to ascertain the true mind and purpose of the parties whose intention determines the character of their act. And it seems to me eminently proper to apply this rule to the issue before us. No one, I think, can say that the direct proof of the alleged marriage is very strong or very clear; and this being so, we are bound to gather from all the information within our reach such aid as may enlighten obscurity and clear away doubt. Having striven to do this as carefully as possible, I am forced to conclude that the testimony furnished by the mass of letters, records, and proceedings which have been so laboriously presented before us is decisive against the pursuer. The parole proof is often conflicting and unsatisfactory.

The documentary evidence points only to one result, and, taken altogether, seems to me demonstrative. I do not, as I have said, dream of again detailing it, but I touch on some salient points which have most affected my own judgment.

Old Mr Wilson is dead, but his acts make him a persuasive witness from the grave. He, if any one, knew all about the asserted marriage; and what did he think of it? I pass for the present his letter to the Major as to the birth of the child, which is, in my view, a powerful piece of evidence, inasmuch as it is affected by the suggestion of a compact for secrecy, to which I shall allude in a few minutes. But when the Major was dead, and no reason existed for further falsehood or concealment by reason of such a compact, or anything else, when, on the contrary, there was every motive of duty and interest alike for speaking the truth, Mr Wilson ignores the marriage in his accounts to the Major's executors, and when Mr Jameson writes to inform him of the Major's death, he replies simply by inquiring about his borrowed money. His description of the pursuer as Margaret Wilson in his deed of settlement, in which the name of another daughter was altered by reason of her marriage, is inexplicable if he then believed her to be the wife of Major Steuart.—[584] The document was framed for family purposes, and not to be blazoned to the world, and it is hard to imagine that he should have consciously put on record a false description dishonouring his daughter if he knew her to be married, and putting on record permanent evidence against the rightful claims of her and of his grandson.

Then, as to the pursuer herself, her whole correspondence with her alleged husband, so far as we have it—fifteen letters out of fifty written by him having been produced—in its address and its diction, and in its spirit, is inconsistent with the supposition that they wrote to each other as man and wife. "It is not too much to say," observes the Lord Ordinary, "that no such letters ever passed between a husband, said to be an attached husband, and his wife." After the supposed marriage her dealing with tradesmen were all in her own maiden name. So was her complaint in the Police Court eight months after it, on the hearing of which we have the evidence of four witnesses, including the agent by whom she was cross-examined, to prove that she swore she was not a married woman.—[561-4] Then we have the statutory registration of her child's birth, vouched by her own signature, and describing it as illegitimate. We find her sued and decreed, without objection, by Sir W. Steuart, in her maiden name. In her maiden name she corresponded with her supposed husband's agent during his lifetime, giving receipts for payments for her boy, which were manifestly made as for an illegitimate child. After her husband's death she distinctly stated to Mr Steuart, a cousin of the Major, that she was not married to him. She wrote as Margaret Wilson to Sir William Steuart, Mr Jameson, and others. She petitioned the magistrates of Edinburgh in that name. She sued Sir W. Steuart in that name successfully for the aliment of her son as an illegitimate child. In that name she accepted payment, and gave receipts on account of it; and finally, in that name she married her present husband.

Your Lordships have heard very ingenious explanations of these striking circumstances. The imagined compact of secrecy, to which I shall immediately advert, could only have had operation during the Major's life; and on the theory of the respondent that she was a pure woman, bound to her husband by an honourable marriage, and having the rights of her legitimate son to protect, it is difficult to credit that she could have been induced to compromise these rights, deny that marriage, and voluntarily submit to the degradation of virtually describing herself as a concubine, for any motive, even whilst the Major lived. I have heard no reason for the continuance of such a course of conduct after his death. She had nothing to hope from Sir W. Steuart. He put her at arm's length, and was utterly hostile to her. It has been said that she was poor, and could not assert herself. But her poverty did not require the voluntary sacrifice of her own good name and the fortunes of her child; and it is inconceivable, if she had a real consciousness of her position as a married woman, that without necessity or advantage she should, by gratuitous and aimless falsehood, have persisted in compromising it. I do not discuss in detail the various suggestions which were made at the bar to account for her conduct. They were ingenious, but notwithstanding them the undoubted facts that I have summarised press on my mind with overwhelming force.

No. 10.

June 7, 1875.
Steuart v. Robertson.

Then as to Major Steuart, we have admittedly strong prima facie evidence in his letters to prove that he did not regard as his wife the woman to whom he addressed them. They are clearly not such letters as any husband ever addressed to any wife, acting upon the ordinary feelings of her nature, or in the ordinary course of things. They are false on the face of them if Margaret Wilson was a wife, for they are all addressed to her in her maiden name, and they are utterly without any single indication of the confidence and affection which characterise the relationship of marriage, especially when the hope of offspring makes it doubly close and dear. The force of the argument from these letters has pressed hard on the pursuer, and it is encountered only by the theories, first, that the parties had an interest and an understanding binding them to keep the marriage secret; and next, that the letters were deliberately framed by the Major so as to avoid the furnishing of any proof of it.

The answer seems to be, as to the first, that between the husband and the wife there was no necessity for pretending to keep a secret, whatever might be their view as to the outer world—that the suggestion seems at right angles with a great portion of the pursuer's case, which rests on the further proclamation of her marriage by the Major on the morning after its occurrence to Mortimer, a butcher, who did not believe his statement, and afterwards at Birnam, and elsewhere to a multitude of other people; and, finally, that the publicity so given is incompatible with the notion that he was anxious to conceal it from his father, for whom he cared nothing, from whom he feared nothing, who authorised and encouraged him to marry the pursuer, and to whom he took the most direct means of communicating the fact that he had married her—if she be right in alleging that she was openly acknowledged as his wife amongst his father's servants and at his father's gate. No doubt the Major's statements on this point were various and contradictory. To the butcher and others he announced his marriage, whilst to the Rev. Mr Rigg and to the doctors, Dunsmure, Simson, and Culbard—persons for whom he had more respect, and to whom he seems to have spoken more seriously—he persistently denied it. His vacillating conduct and contradictory allegations give no safe ground to rest upon either way, but his letters, written deliberately in private, without any need of concealment or dissimulation, appear to me to be persuasive in the last degree.

Then as to the suggestion made by some of the Judges, and repeated here,

No. 10.

June 7, 1875.
Steuart v. Robertson.

that those letters were coolly and deliberately framed, so as to give no colour to any claim which might be made by the pursuer, I can only say that it appears to me to be inconsistent with her own case and her own evidence in material particulars. He is represented as having interchanged a mutual affection with her, and entered with full deliberation into a solemn contract to make her his wife; and if this was really so, why should the affection have been concealed and the contract carefully ignored in letters the most intimate and confidential? And, again, he is said to have been, notwithstanding his loose habits, a truth-speaking and honourable man until the close of his life. Is such a character consistent with a foul design, if persistently carried out, to deprive his wife of any acknowledgment of their real relation, and with a contemplation in cold blood of the chance of having her declared a concubine, and her son a bastard, by reason of writings cunningly devised to assure every reader of them that no such relation had existence?

Surely such theories seem as unreasonable as they are degrading to the memory of the man to whom they attribute base motives and unworthy acts for the purpose of justifying a forced and unnatural construction of letters which in their plain and ordinary meaning so powerfully negative the notion of a marriage.

I do not go into arguments which have been fairly urged as to the mode of living of the parties,—when the Major was in prison—at St Patrick Square and at Birnam, after the alleged marriage, the coarse words employed with reference to the pursuer to the Rev. Mr Rigg and to Mr Gold, and as to other matters,—in order to shew that he did not act towards her as a man might be expected to speak of and act towards his wife.

But I must add one word as to the evidence of Captain Cooper, which has been so much relied on in the very able and lucid judgment of the Lord Justice-Clerk, and which, we were told, mainly determined the majority of the Judges in favour of the marriage. With great deference to their Lordships I am unable to attach such high value to it. No doubt such statements as that which is attributed to the dying Major by Captain Cooper are worthy of great consideration, and under certain circumstances would be of capital importance. The English law rightly regards as equivalent to an oath a declaration of a man who, retaining clear memory and full intelligence, feels his spirit solemnized under the shadow of death, and stands consciously on the brink of eternity, in the expectation of a speedy accounting with his God. Such declarations are admitted on the most momentous issues, and have founded many verdicts affecting the lives of men. But this was not the case of the unhappy Major Steuart. When Captain Cooper came to Hythe on the evening of the 16th of October Major Steuart was fast approaching his end, and on the night of that day he had a fit of delirium tremens—that fearful avenger of intemperance, which shatters equally the body and the mind. He could not talk like a rational being. His memory had failed. He asked Captain Cooper if he had a wife, although he had before known fully of her existence, and had recently received a letter about her. He mistook his old comrade for another person. On the night of the 18th he died, and on the 19th his friend and agent Mr Jameson, who had arrived on the day after Captain Cooper, thus described his condition—"With the exception of an occasional look or word of intelligence he was not in a state to make any settlement of his affairs."

It seems to me impossible to rely on the broken words of a person in such a condition as giving any faithworthy assurance of any fact, and especially of a fact so often solemnly denied by himself—implicitly in his letters, and expressly by his conversation on many serious occasions when he was perfectly collected and in full possession of his mental faculties.

No. 10.
June 7, 1875.
Steuart v. Robertson.

And this view is sustained by the letters of Mr Jameson of the 29th October and the 2d November 1868, in which he treats the statement of Major Steuart as of no account, dealing with the child as illegitimate, and expressly saying that "the girl, Miss Wilson, the mother of the boy, has no legal claim." Mr Jameson's close relations with the Major, and thorough knowledge of him, gave peculiar significance to the expression of such an opinion at such a time, and he appears to have had no unfriendly feeling towards the pursuer, which might have led him, consciously or unconsciously, to misrepresent the truth.

Consider it as we may, this very singular and painful case is not free from many difficulties, which have not unnaturally produced diversity of judgment upon it, and which can never in this world be satisfactorily removed. But your Lordships must decide as best you can, on the balance of testimony and argument; and on the whole I am of opinion that that balance strongly inclines in favour of the appellant, and that, accordingly, the appeal should be allowed.

LORD SELBORNE.—My Lords, when the evidence of the only two witnesses (the pursuer's brother George and Mrs Kellet) who speak directly to the constitution of a marriage per verba de præsenti is examined, its effect is found to depend upon (1) certain words spoken, of which they profess to give the substance or effect, and which, as reported by them, are in themselves far from unequivocal; (2) certain accompaniments of fact, principally the wedding ring and the bedding, of which the former is difficult to reconcile with the rest of the story, and the latter rests upon the testimony of one witness (Mrs Kellet) only; and (3) the interpretation put by these witnesses on what they saw and heard, as that it was "solemn and serious," and so forth. A third witness, Agnes Forbes, adds what is material by way of corroboration, though she does not profess to have been present at the critical moment, but upon her testimony serious doubt is thrown, unless several other witnesses are to be entirely disbelieved. The rest of the pursuer's evidence relates to what happened either before or after the time when the actual marriage is said to have taken place, namely, the evening of the 13th February 1866—as does also the whole evidence of the appellant.

In a case of this kind, the Scotch law being what it is, a certain amount of colour and exaggeration, and the addition, subtraction, or alteration of a few particulars in a narrative not wholly without foundation in fact, may bridge over the whole difference between what is, in law, marriage, and what is not. Before your Lordships can draw the conclusion in support of which this evidence is adduced you must be satisfied that what took place on the 13th February 1866 was intended and understood by Major Steuart and the pursuer as then and henceforth constituting between them the relation of husband and wife. If, on the other hand, you have the evidence of these witnesses, with such confirmation (be it more or less) as they receive from the subsequent talk about a marriage, which is deponed to by members of the Wilson family and others, and, on the other hand, convincing proof, documentary as well as oral, that Major Steuart and the pursuer did not really suppose or understand themselves to have been married to each other on the 13th February 1866 (a point on which, since it depended on the true meaning and intention of their own words and acts, they at all events could not be mistaken), and further, that George Wilson, the father (who must have understood what then passed, at least as well as his son George, or Mrs Kellet, or Agnes Forbes) did not after the 13th February really regard his daughter as the lawful wife of Major Steuart—I for one cannot hesitate for a moment which to believe. I believe the evidence of the subsequent lives, writings, acts, and declarations on serious occasions of Major Steuart, the pursuer, and George Wilson, the father, rather than the statements, for the purposes of this suit, of George Wilson the son, Mrs Kellet, and Agnes Forbes, made in 1872.

No. 10.

June 7, 1875.
Steuart v. Robertson.

Your Lordships have already gone so fully into the particulars and the effect of the evidence that I think it sufficient, without further repetition, to say that I concur generally in the remarks on the details of that evidence which have been already made. The weight of the acts and declarations, inconsistent with belief in the alleged marriage, of the pursuer herself and her father, is so much the stronger because it is clear that the Wilsons desired, if they could, to bring about a marriage between Major Steuart and the pursuer, and did whatever they could (in the way of conversation with relatives and others) to give a colour of marriage to the connection between them. The theory that Major Steuart was willing to marry the pursuer on the condition that the marriage was to be clandestine and kept secret, in order to withhold the knowledge of it from his father, is conclusively disproved in a variety of ways,—first, by its absolute inconsistency with the large mass of evidence which is produced (whether entirely credible or not) to shew that Major Steuart himself, and all the Wilsons, habitually, unreservedly, and to all sorts of people, talked from the 13th of February 1866 downwards about this alleged marriage; secondly, by the behaviour of Major Steuart to his father, and by his not merely parading this connection with the pursuer very publicly at Dunkeld and elsewhere in the immediate neighbourhood of his father's residence, but even intruding with her on two occasions into his father's house; and lastly, by the evidence of Joseph Gold [544] (confirmed by George Wilson, the brother), of Sir William Steuart's conversation with him in December 1865, and by that of Dr Culbard [580], Mr Rigg [577], and Mr Jameson, as to Sir William Steuart's wishes and offers at a later date, and the communication of those wishes and offers to the Major—the result of which is that Sir William was then prepared not only to acquiesce in, but even to encourage, the marriage of his son with the pursuer, and to make a suitable provision for him in that event. I cannot, with the knowledge of all these facts, attribute any real importance to what was said by the Major to his friend Captain Cooper on his death-bed, whatever may have been the degree of the Major's capacity to speak rationally and collectedly on important matters of business. Even if he were supposed to have been willing at that moment to make the pursuer his widow by acknowledging her as his wife, he was of course unable to do so unless she already stood to him in that relation; and whether she did or not is a question which must be determined, not by this conversation, but by other evidence in the case.

It was strongly urged by the counsel for the pursuer that the difficulty of believing that the pursuer's father and mother (persons apparently in a respectable condition of life in Edinburgh) could have been capable of assenting to the cohabitation of their daughter with Major Steuart in their own house, and surrounded by their other children, on any other footing than that of marriage, was so great as to preponderate over all the difficulties on the other side. I cannot agree with that. It is indisputable, if the evidence of the pursuer's witnesses is at all to be believed, that Mr and Mrs Wilson were ambitious of having Major Steuart, the heir of Murthly, for their son-in-law; and that long before February 1866 they permitted and encouraged between him and their daughter a kind and degree of familiarity and intimacy (with opportunities of being together alone and unobserved for hours at a time) which could not have been reconciled with the most ordinary prudence or delicacy, considering more particularly the difference of birth and station, even if Major Steuart had been a man of exemplary reputation for moral propriety. He was, however, by no means a man of that reputation. He was an officer in the army, fond (in some respects at all events) of low life, of irregular habits, coarse and indelicate in his language. No parent could have a right to suppose that if such opportunities were permitted to such a person advantage would not be taken of them. The infection of his coarseness and indelicacy had extended to the conduct of both the pursuer and her father when that extraordinary nocturnal excursion to Birnam took place in December 1865, and there is also sufficient evidence that she herself learnt to imitate, apparently without restraint or rebuke, in the house of her parents, his peculiar manners and language.

No. 10.

June 7, 1875. Steuart v. Robertson.

It is part of the pursuer's case that scandal had arisen before the 13th February 1866, and was felt by the Wilsons to be certain to continue from the circumstances under which the Major then was and had been for some time living in their house; and that it had become necessary for them to choose whether he should go elsewhere or remain in that house on the avowed footing of conjugal or quasi-conjugal cohabitation. Whatever actually took place on the 13th February 1866, this previous state of things was confessedly the cause of it. If the Major had then left the house, the expectation of a future marriage must in all probability have been abandoned, and all the evils of the past scandal, with the consequences, whatever they might be, of the intimacy which had already existed, must have been endured without any hope of remedy. On the other hand, the connection, if permitted to continue, and justified as far as possible to the family and their friends and acquaintances by such reputation of marriage as they might be able to create, might grow into an actual marriage afterwards, either by habit and repute, or by regular or irregular solemnization, under the operation of those influences which that state of things would naturally produce or strengthen.

Under the law of irregular marriage in Scotland it is not, I am sorry to say, by any means incredible that persons, generally reputed to be respectable, but not fastidious in morals or manners, may sometimes reconcile their moral sense to the notion of an inchoate marriage, to be matured and perfected by the progress of future events, of which they hope and expect a favourable issue. Such a notion is indeed foreign to our law, which recognises no middle state between marriage and concubinage; but it is, nevertheless, both possible and probable that in the peculiar circumstances in which the Wilsons were placed, and considering what were the alternatives open to them if the Major was not then willing to bind himself by an actual marriage, they might offer this excuse to their own consciences, and justify by it the language which they held to their family and their friends.

If even Mr Melville Jameson, a gentleman and a man of business, could be in so ambiguous a mental attitude as that described in a remarkable passage of his evidence, it is not difficult to imagine a still greater indistinctness of ideas

No. 10.

June 7, 1875.
Steuart v. Robertson.

on this subject on the part of such people as the Wilsons. The passage to which I refer is this :—"(Q.) Did you think when he introduced her to you that he was introducing his mistress to you? (A.) I cannot say; I don't think it is likely that he would. (Q.) I suppose you would not have cared that he should? (A.) No, I should not, certainly. (Q.) Did you take offence at the introduction? (A.) I did not. (Q.) Therefore you could not have thought her to be his mistress? (A.) No, I did not think her to be so. (Q.) Then, I suppose, you thought her to be his wife? (A.) It was a very peculiar alliance, I thought. I don't know that it was a recognised alliance of husband and wife, but I did not think he would introduce me to a woman who was his kept mistress. I cannot go the length of saying that I understood her to be his wife. (Q.) But you certainly did not take her to be his kept mistress? (A.) Certainly not. (Q.) Then, I suppose, there are just two relations? (A.) There are just two relations. (Q.) If you negative the one, don't you affirm the other? (A.) I cannot say that I actually thought at the time that she was his wife."

The whole circumstances of this case (including the facts that after Major Steuart's death the advice of counsel was obtained by Mr George Wilson, the father, on the question whether there was sufficient evidence of a marriage, and the assertion that documentary evidence of a marriage did exist, contained in the pursuer's letter to Sir W. Steuart, of the 1st November 1869) appear to me to illustrate in a very striking manner what is said at pages 20 and 21 of the Report of the Royal Commission on the Laws of Marriage in 1868, namely,—"We are led to conclude that there may be and that there is a considerable difference between this strictly logical view of the value of evidence of matrimonial reputation in the Scottish law and the popular view of the same subject, and that the popular view may perhaps indicate more truly than the theoretical doctrine the practical working of the law of habit and repute in Scotland. Evidently there is a wide practical difference between the effect of cohabitation with reputation of marriage in a country the law of which requires some definite and solemn acts or act for the constitution of the contract and its effect (though still considered merely as evidence) where no such solemnity is required, but where the relation may be constituted at any time by the private consent of the parties. In the former case the inquiry is, whether a certain external fact, independent of intention, did or did not happen; in the latter it is really an inquiry into the intention with which a series of acts were done. The most express declarations, oral or in writing, by both parties, that they are husband and wife, will not make them so unless the Judge is satisfied that the inward intention of their minds was in accordance with those outward words or acts. This has been held, not only as to declarations concerning the past, which are mere elements in the proof of cohabitation with repute of marriage, but even as to verba de præsenti, which, if sincerely spoken, would have themselves constituted marriage. In the case of Jolly v. M'Gregor (3 W. and S. 85), a marriage irregularly celebrated before a clergyman of the Established Church was set aside as a nullity because the Court was satisfied that the parties had no real matrimonial intention, and never regarded the ceremony as binding. Lord Glenlee (in the Balbougie case) said, and the House of Lords in the same case affirmed his doctrine :—'The cohabitation under the married character must be uniform and consistent, for a few instances in which a man behaves to a woman as his mistress will do away a thousand in which he addresses her as his wife. A man without the least thought of marriage may behave to his mistress as if she was his wife, may not choose to contradict her before strangers who call her such, nor to expose at all times the nature of the connection.'"

No. 10.

June 7, 1875.
Steuart v. Robertson.

Then the Commissioners proceed—"It is impossible not to perceive the copious elements of doubt and uncertainty which the application of the doctrine of habit and repute may introduce in a variety of circumstances under such a state of the law. An opinion, however, is entertained by some, whose views are entitled to much consideration, that instead of producing upon the whole any evil effect, the practical tendency of this state of the law is to discourage concubinage, and to promote regular marriage. It appears to be thought that the law would sometimes imply marriage in such doubtful cases although the parties themselves may not really have made up their minds to be married, and would, if they were required to say positively and conclusively whether they were married or not, decline to give an affimative answer to that question, and that the risk of such a construction of an equivocal course of life may tend to diminish the frequency of illicit connections. It was suggested to a witness of great authority, during his examination before us, that nobody could be the husband of a wife by habit and repute except by his own will; that it was his own conduct which induced the reputation; that if he wished not to be married he would not so act as by habit and repute to be a husband; that as it depended on his own will whether he would be married or not, there seemed to be no reason to suppose that having the will to marry he would not do whatever the law might require for that purpose. The reply of the witness, Lord Moncreiff, was—'I understand that in the metaphysical view; but as applied here it is reasoning in a circle. You may say that if the presumption raised by habit and repute be a true one, the parties will prove the fact by avowing it. But it seems to me clear that if that reasoning be logically carried out the presumption of law is useless. It is only useful where the fact is doubtful;' adding that, as according to his view of the practical effect of the presumption, connections continued in concubinage (that is, under the pretence or reputation of marriage) necessarily would become marriage unless there were a clear intention to the contrary; the parties would have no interest to continue in that state and not to be married in the face of the Church."

Whether the continuance of such a state of the law as this is, on the whole, for the benefit of society or not, it is for the Legislature, and not for this House, in its judicial capacity, to consider. But that under such a state of the law some things may be thought by some persons reconcileable with morality and respectability which otherwise would not be so, I do not doubt; and this appears to me to be the true and adequate solution of whatever moral difficulty there is in the present case.

I concur in the judgment proposed by the rest of your Lordships.

INTERLOCUTORS appealed from reversed, and the appellant (defender) assoilzied from the conclusions of the summons, with expenses of the Court below.

CONNELL & HOPE—TODS, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—PADDISON & SON—M'CAUL & ARMSTRONG, S.S.C.

No. 11.

THE MAGISTRATES AND TOWN-COUNCIL OF PEEBLES, Appellants (Respondents).—Cotton, Q.C.—C. J. Pearson.

THE REV. JOHN BELL LORRAINE AND OTHERS (the Minister and Kirk-Session of Peebles), Respondents (Suspenders).—Pearson, Q.C.—W. E. Gloag.

June 7, 1875. Magistrates of Peebles v. Kirk-Session of Peebles.

Church—Burgh—Parish Bells—Interdict.—On the rebuilding, in 1779, of the parish church of a parish partly burghal partly landward, it was agreed between the heritors of the parish and the magistrates of the burgh that a steeple should "be carried up on the east end of the church," at the sole cost of the burgh, "which steeple, when finished, with the bells, &c., therein, is to be the sole property of the burgh for ever, the bells, however, to be employed for and parish as well as the town." The steeple was completed in 1784, and the burgh bells were thereafter hung in it.

Held (in aff. judgment of the First Division) (1) that having regard to the circumstances of the contracting parties at the date of the agreement, and specially to the fact that the heritors were bound to provide a bell for the parish church, the agreement was to be construed as conferring on the parish the exclusive right to use the bells for ecclesiastical purposes; and therefore (2) that the town-council were not entitled to order the bells to be rung on Sundays or national and parochial Fast-days for the purpose of intimating worship elsewhere than in the parish church at such hours as might be fixed by the kirk-session.

(IN the Court of Session, July 10, 1874, ante, vol. i. p. 1139.)

Ld. Chancellor (Cairns). Ld. Chelmsford. Ld. Selborne.

This was an action of suspension and interdict at the instance of the minister and kirk-session of the parish of Peebles against the magistrates and town-council of Peebles. The complainers sought to interdict the respondents "from causing the bells in the steeple of the parish church of Peebles, or any of them, to be rung, and from granting any warrant or order to ring the same on Sundays, or national or parochial Fast-days, except for the purpose of calling the public to worship in the parish church, or in the case of funerals or of fires, unless with the consent of the complainers, or at least from causing the said bells to be rung, or granting any warrant or order to ring the same for the purpose of summoning meetings of Voluntary church associations, or similar associations, without the complainers' consent."

About the year 1777 the parish church of the parish of Peebles, which was a parish partly landward and partly burghal, having fallen into a ruinous state, the question of rebuilding it was brought under the consideration of the heritors, amongst whom were the magistrates as representing the burgh. At the same time, the magistrates being desirous to erect a tower or steeple for the accommodation of the town clock and bells, and also thinking it for the benefit of the town's people that any new church to be built should be situate within the burgh, negotiations were opened between them and the heritors which resulted in an agreement which was set forth in an act of the town-council of 28th December 1778 and a minute of the heritors of 16th February 1779.

The terms of the agreement were, that the burgh undertook to build the new church after an agreed on plan, on receiving a contribution of £300 sterling from the heritors, and at its own expense to carry up a steeple on the east end of the church, and therein to hang the burgh bells, "which steeple, when finished, with the bells, &c., therein, is to be the sole property of the burgh for ever, the bells, however, to be employed for the parish as well as the town."

In terms of this agreement the church was built and opened for public worship in 1784, and has since been maintained as the parish church of the burgh and parish of Peebles. The steeple was also erected at the same time, and the town clock and two bells belonging to the town were placed in it. One of these bells was never used, except when rung by order of the magistrates at certain funerals, and on the occurrence of fires. The other was always rung on Sundays and national and parochial Fast-days, at the times fixed for public worship in the parish church. It, as well as the other bells in the steeple, was under the charge of the burgh officer, but was rung at whatever times were appointed by the minister and kirk-session, for the purposes above mentioned. In 1843 or 1844 a third bell was placed in the steeple, which was afterwards in use to be rung at stated times on week-days, for the convenience of the inhabitants of the burgh.

No. 11.

June 7, 1875. Magistrates of Peebles v. Kirk-Session of Peebles.

The present action arose out of a resolution of the magistrates and town-council of Peebles of 12th October 1873, whereby it was resolved that the bells in the steeple of the parish church should be rung at certain hours on Sundays, at which the various Dissenting congregations in the burgh, and especially the Free Church, were in use to meet, whether there was to be service in the parish church at these particular times or not.

The minister and kirk-session accordingly brought this note of suspension and interdict, and pleaded;—(1) The use of the bells in the steeple of the church on Sundays and national and parochial Fast-days, except in connection with the parish church and public worship therein, being illegal and unwarrantable, the complainers are entitled to interdict as craved. (2) The use of the bells complained of being contrary to law, and to immemorial custom, ought to be prohibited.

Pleaded for the respondents;—(1) The bells in question being, along with the steeple, the property of the respondents, they are entitled to regulate their use, and the complainers have no title to insist in the present proceedings.

The Lord Ordinary (Shand) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds, inter alia, that the respondents, while maintaining their right to use the said bells on Sundays and Fast-days, on occasions or at times when there is no service in the parish church, do not dispute their obligation to continue to ring the bell which has hitherto been rung for the parish church at all times when the same is required for the services of the church: Therefore refuses the note of suspension and interdict, and decerns: Finds the complainers liable in expenses," &c.

The minister and kirk-session reclaimed.

The First Division, on 10th July 1874, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the said interlocutor: Sustain the reasons of suspension: Suspend the proceedings complained of, and interdict, prohibit, and discharge the respondents, the magistrates and council of the burgh of Peebles, from causing or ordering the bells in the steeple of the parish church of Peebles to be rung on Sundays or national and parochial Fast-days, except for the purpose of calling the public to worship in the said parish church at such hours as may be fixed by the minister and kirk-session, and except on occasion of funerals or fires, and decern: Find the complainers entitled to expenses," &c.

The magistrates and town-council appealed.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—In disposing of this case your Lordships will not, as it seems to me, be called upon to decide some questions of common law of some nicety which are referred to in the cases and proceedings; much less will your Lordships be called upon to entertain the question of any peculiar right which the Established Kirk of Scotland may be supposed to have as to the possession

No. 11.

June 7, 1875.
Magistrates of Peebles v. Kirk-Session of Peebles.

or use of bells in their kirks in contradistinction to those who are termed Dissenters. The case appears to me to rest upon grounds altogether apart from considerations of that description, and upon grounds which are extremely simple in themselves. What, as it seems to me, your Lordships will really have to consider is the proper construction to be placed upon a contract, contained in a very few sentences, entered into in the year 1779, between the parish of Peebles, and those who represented it, on the one hand, and, on the other hand, the town, represented by the municipal authorities. That contract appears to constitute what in this country would be termed a trust for public or charitable uses. And in this country possibly the case might have assumed the form of a proceeding for the administration of that trust. But in the form in which the case comes before your Lordships the same end will have to be arrived at through the construction of the contract to which I have referred.

Now, in order to place that construction upon the contract, your Lordships, as it seems to me, will have to look, in the first instance, at the position in which the parties to the contract stood at the time when it was entered into.

Let us take, upon the one hand, the town of Peebles. The town, at the time in question, had an old building or belfry in which were two bells, which clearly belonged to the town, and were used for the purposes of the town. That belfry had fallen into disrepair, and apparently the time had arrived at which the belfry must either be reconstructed or some other provision made for the housing and use of the bells. On the other hand, the parish and the heritors of the parish (and among the heritors the town itself was included) were in this position:—The church was in a ruinous condition—it was an old church, and had to be rebuilt. It does not appear very clearly whether there were any bells or what bells there were in the old church, or whether they were in a condition which would have made them available for the use of the new church. It was desired to erect a new church. The obligation to erect a new church would fall by the law of Scotland upon the heritors, including the burgh, so far as it was itself a heritor. The same law would have thrown upon the heritors the obligation of providing or furnishing the new church with a proper bell; but the law would cast no obligation upon the heritors to provide a steeple for the reception of the bell, or to ornament the church in any way with a steeple as part of its architecture. Under these circumstances it appears to have been considered desirable by the town to secure a habitation for their bells, which, obviously, would be a not unnatural one, and which, architecturally, might probably be made the best habitation which could be procured for them; and, in order to do this, it appears they were not unwilling to provide for the expense of constructing the steeple to the new church, which could not have been thrown upon the heritors against their will.

The arrangement which was proposed by the town for this purpose is evidenced in the first instance by a minute of the 12th May 1778—"Then the council appointed the provost and bailies of the burgh to meet with the heritors of the parish on Thursday first, in name of the council and community of the burgh of Peebles, and to agree with said heritors either to repair the old or to build a new church, and to pay their proportion of the building thereof or reparation, as shall be agreed on, according to what part of the same they shall possess, and in case of a new church to be built on the Castlehill, they allow the said provost and bailies, or any of them that shall attend the meeting, in their name to become bound to pay their said proportion of the building, providing that the steeple for their clock and bells shall be carried up with the building of the church, and the town shall be obliged in that case to pay any additional expenses that said steeple shall occasion." This minute, which obviously is in the nature of an offer, is perfectly clear in its construction. It amounts to this—there is a site, which is, from its nature, the most desirable site for the erection of a church and for the housing of these bells. If you, the heritors, will abandon the scheme of repairing your own church, and will build a new church, and not only build a new church, but build it on the Castlehill, we, the town, will contribute our share of the expense; and, more than that, if that is made a place where our bells shall be received, we will provide the steeple and carry up the steeple to the proper height as a part, architecturally, of the church, providing the funds to meet the expense of doing that. It is therefore an offer in which the town asked, as it were, as the consideration which was to move them, a right to erect upon this situation, as part of the church, a steeple to receive the bells. That is a little more fully elaborated in the minute of the 29th of December 1778. That minute was made on the eve of the meeting which was to be held with the heritors. It will not be necessary for me to read the whole of it, but about the middle of the minute it runs to this effect—That the heritors are to have their third set off on either end of the kirk they please, to be divided among them as they shall judge proper; that, besides the said £300 to be paid by the heritors, the town are to have the benefit of the old kirk and seats thereof, and to have power to take down the same to within six feet of the bottom, to enable them to rear up the new one; that the town shall be obliged to keep up in sufficient repair the said new kirk after it is finished for a certain number of years at their own expense, and from that period the repairs of the kirk shall fall upon the heritors and the town in proportion to their several possessions as above. That the steeple is to be carried up on the east end of the kirk, and make part of the gable thereof so far as the kirk wall goes,—that is to say, the gable kirk wall was to be the foundation of the steeple—the steeple was to rest upon that—and when the whole is finished the steeple, bells, and everything therein, are to be the sole property of the town for ever; that the council agrees to give as much of their ground betwixt the bowling green and the street as will be necessary for building said kirk and steeple upon.

No. 11.

June 7, 1875. Magistrates of Peebles v. Kirk-Session of Peebles.

On 16th February 1779 the meeting, in view of which this last minute had been made, took place between the heritors and those who represented the town. "Provost Reid laid before the meeting an act of the town-council of date the 28th (that is obviously a mistake for the 29th) December 1778, mentioning their opinion that a new church ought to be built, and the burgh should contract with the heritors for building it, in case the heritors should give £300 sterling as their proportion for building and finishing said church, and flooring and breasting the galleries" and so on, and that a steeple was "to be carried up on the east end of the church, which steeple, when finished, with the bells, &c., therein, is to be the sole property of the burgh for ever;" and then comes this next stipulation, which appears to have been inserted in the proposal of the town on the part of the parish—"the bells, however, to be employed for the parish as well as the town."

Now, it is the construction of those last words which I have read that is in question; and upon that construction the controversy in this case appears to me really to turn. What was the meaning, under the circumstances I have detailed, of this stipulation—"the bells to be employed for the parish as well as the town?" I apprehend that the meaning clearly was this,—We, the town, have bells, which are now in our own separate belfry, and we use them for town purposes—they are there for that end and object. We have no desire to use them for any other purposes, but we consider that a most desirable site to obtain possession of for these bells would be in a steeple which architecturally will become part of the parish church. We offer to the parish church to build that steeple, to incorporate it with the parish church, and to do this at our own expense, provided they will receive the steeple and allow it so to be incorporated. In that steeple we shall have our own bells, we tell the parish that we shall use them, as we have done hitherto, for town purposes, and we make a right on our part so to use the bells part of the bargain. Says the parish, on the other hand,—We are about to erect a new kirk. We are willing that the steeple which the town requires shall be incorporated in the new kirk. We should be entitled to assess the parish for the purpose of providing a bell for parish purposes, and providing for its suitable accommodation in some way in the kirk, but we are willing to take this offer of the town-council, provided the town-council will put us in as good a position as we should have been in if we had had a bell provided by ourselves and at our own expense,—that is to say, we shall have the use of these bells put by the town into the steeple for parish purposes, as we should have had the use of our own bell if we had provided it, and put it up in the kirk.

No. 11.

June 7, 1875.

Magistrates of Peebles v. Kirk-Session of Peebles.

My Lords, that appears to me to be both the natural meaning of the words which I have read, and also exactly the natural arrangement which would have been made under those circumstances between two such bodies as the town and the parish. The agreement was acted upon accordingly. The kirk was built, and the steeple was built, and in the steeple were placed the bells of the town. Everything appears to have gone on harmoniously until a very recent date; and what is claimed now by the town, and what was sought to be controlled by the action upon which this appeal arises, was this—the parish kirk had divine service on Sundays at a quarter past eleven (as I understand it), and at two. The bell was rung for these services at eleven and a quarter before two. On that there is no dispute. In the parish kirk there is no service in the evening, but there is service in the evening in some other places of worship in the town, and notably, as I understand, in the Free Kirk, at six o'clock. And the town-council have come to a resolution that the bells in the steeple of the Established Kirk shall be rung at a quarter before six, with reference to the worship which is to take place in the Free Kirk at six o'clock. It was this claim on the part of the town-council which led to the institution of the action in this case, for the purpose of restraining that ringing of the bells.

My Lords, it appears to me that there are two points of view in which that claim of the town-council of the right to ring the bells is to be looked at. In the first place, if I am right in saying that the contract was that the town should have the right of ringing these bells for town purposes, and only for town purposes, is this purpose to be called a town purpose? Is it to be called a town purpose that the town-council should say—We will look to the interests of one denomination or of more denominations than one. We will observe the time at which they have public worship on Sundays, and we will insist upon our right of ringing the bells in the steeple of the Established Kirk for the purpose of summoning those members of the public who wish to attend the worship of those denominations to that worship. I asked the learned counsel who appeared for the burgh, whether they contended that that was a town purpose. I think the learned counsel felt some embarrassment in answering the question, and I rather think I am right in saying that the counsel for the appellants preferred to rest their claim upon the absolute right of the town-council to control the ringing of these bells, provided they rang them for the worship of the Established Kirk, rather than upon the argument that ringing them for the worship of another denomination was to be called a town purpose. But, if I am right as to the construction of the contract, the question to be solved is—Is the ringing for the worship of a particular denomination other than that of the kirk of the parish a purpose of the town? It appears to me that it cannot be considered to be a municipal purpose. It appears to me that it is impossible to say that it is part of the duty of the municipality to provide a bell for the purpose of summoning to the worship of a particular denomination those who are anxious to attend that worship.

No. 11.

June 7, 1875.
Magistrates of Peebles v. Kirk-Session of Peebles.

Another consideration arises—Is it consistent with the stipulation made on behalf of the parish that the parish should have the bells for parish purposes, that they should be rung on Sunday with reference to the worship of other denominations? Now, as I said before, it appears to me that the result of the agreement with regard to the parish was this,—that the parish should be in as good a position quoad these bells for the parish purposes as if they had a bell or bells of their own, and provided at their own expense, in the kirk. Now, what is the purpose, with regard to public worship, of parish bells? The purpose obviously is this—that they are to sound forth upon the day or days appropriated to public worship, in a way which shall indicate to those who hear them that as soon as the bell or bells cease ringing the worship in the church over which the bells are ringing is to commence. And if in the church over which the bells are placed the bells are rung at a time which has no reference to the worship in that church, but has reference to something which is taking place elsewhere, you not merely are not satisfying the purpose of the parish, but you are defeating the object of the parish, and the object with which the bell is placed above the parish church. So far as the ringing of the bells at eleven and a quarter to two is concerned no question arises. Those hours happen to synchronise with the hours of worship of other denominations in the town, and the bell which rings for the parish church at those hours may well answer the purpose of informing the public that the hour is approaching when there will be service in the other places of worship. But observe the consequence with regard to the ringing of a bell at a quarter to six o'clock. Any person who hears that bell ought to be under the impression, and probably would be under the impression, that that is an announcement made from the parish church that, at the end of the tolling of the bell, worship will commence there. He goes to the parish church, he finds it shut up. If he can procure any information of what the state of things really is, he is told there that the bell is ringing, not for the worship at the parish church, but for the worship to take place in some different building in some other part of the town. Therefore, not only is the ringing of the bell not serving a parish purpose, but it is defeating a parish purpose, for it is misleading the parishioners into the belief that there is going to be worship at the parish church, where there is not going to be any such worship.

Therefore, both upon the ground that the town is claiming to use the bells for a purpose which is not a town purpose, and also upon the ground that it is using the bells for a purpose which defeats the object of the bells as parish bells —upon both of these grounds it appears to me that the use claimed to be made of these bells by the town-council is not a use warranted by the contract of 1779. That really exhausts all that I will trouble your Lordships with upon the merits of the case. The interlocutor of the Court of Session appears to me in substance to be correct. I am inclined, however, to submit to your Lordships, that the interlocutor has not assumed the most happy form, and that it has unnecessarily concerned itself with the question of funerals and of fires, upon which really no evidence has been adduced which is material, and by the introduction of which words it appears to me that some confusion and difficulty might hereafter arise. If your Lordships concur with me upon the main question in the case, I shall submit to your Lordships that the interlocutor of the 10th of July 1874 should be varied thus,—That it shall restrain the town-council from ordering the bells to be rung on Sundays or national and parochial Fast-days for the purpose of intimating worship or calling the public to worship elsewhere than in the said parish church, at such hours as may be fixed by the minister and kirk-session, and decern, &c., following the words of the interlocutor thenceforward.

No. 11.

June 7, 1875.
Magistrates of Peebles v. Kirk-Session of Peebles.

My Lords, I have only one other observation to make, which is this—Some distinction was attempted to be drawn between the two bells which were placed in the steeple at the time it was built, and a third bell, which has since then, and in more modern times, been added to the original two bells. As to this third bell, it was contended that it clearly belonged to the burgh, and that it did not come within the contract or trust which was created by the minutes of the year 1779. My Lords, as to that, it appears to me that the appellants must choose between one of two things. Either this third bell must be taken to be an accretion to the cumulus of bells which are spoken of in the contract of 1779, and to have become subject to the trusts and obligations of that contract; or, if it is to be held free from that contract, the only result will be that the town-council must remove the bell from the steeple. I give no opinion as to their right to do that. But whether they have the right to remove it, or whether it is allowed to remain there, it appears to me clear that it cannot be used except as one of the bells which are to be rung in the steeple, and subject to the same rules which must govern the original two bells.

My Lords, I shall move your Lordships that the interlocutors complained of be not reversed, but that the interlocutor of the 10th of July 1874 be varied in the way I have mentioned. And inasmuch as the alteration deals with that which was not the real subject of the appeal, and as the appellants appear to me to have been in the wrong in their appeal, I shall submit to your Lordships, and move your Lordships, that the interlocutors be affirmed in other respects, with costs.

Lord Chelmsford.—The question of the town-council's claim of right to control and regulate the ringing of the bells in the steeple attached to the parish church depends entirely upon the terms of the agreement between the heritors and the town-council of the 16th February 1779. The church was built at the joint expense of the burgh and of the heritors, the heritors agreeing to contribute £300, and they were to possess one-third part of the church, and the burgh the other two-thirds, and the parties stipulated that a steeple should be carried up on the east end of the church, which steeple when finished with the bells, &c. therein, was to be the sole property of the burgh for ever, the bells however, to be employed for the parish as well as the town. The steeple in which the bells are placed is structurally part of the parish church. If the burgh had not placed any bell in the steeple the heritors would have been bound by law to have provided a bell for the purpose of summoning the congregation to public worship in the parish church. The burgh having placed their own bells in the steeple, and stipulated that they were to be their sole property, the heritors would not have been discharged from their legal obligation unless the town-council had appropriated the bells to the same purpose as a bell placed in the church by the heritors must have been applied to. They therefore agreed that the bells should be employed for the parish as well as for the town, which can have no other meaning than this, that the bells were to be used for the same purpose as if they had been put up by the heritors, which of course, would be for the use of the parish church only. The parochial use of the bells is distinct, and is distinguished from the town use. To say that the ringing of the bells on Sunday at hours to suit the different congregations of various denominations is for the benefit of the town generally, and therefore a town purpose, is to confound the two uses for which the bells may be employed, the parish use, which is necessarily ecclesiastical, and the town use, which is necessarily secular. Although the exclusive use of the bells in connection with the worship in the parish church for nearly one hundred years cannot control the words of the agreement, nor perhaps interpret its meaning, yet it is impossible not to feel fortified in the construction which I have put upon the agreement by the fact that it has been adopted and acted upon for so long a period by both the contending parties without doubt or question. I agree with my noble and learned friend that the interlocutors ought to be affirmed, with the variation in one of them which he has proposed.

No. 11.

June 7, 1875. Magistrates of Peebles v. Kirk-Session of Peebles.

Lord Selborne.—The only material facts (beyond the agreement of 1779 itself) appear to me to be these—first, that the bells in question have been lawfully placed in a steeple, which, though vested in point of property in the magistrates, is still an inseparable part of the structure of the church, and is accessible only through other parts of that structure; and secondly, that by the arrangement for providing in this steeple bells to be "employed for the parish," the heritors were in a lawful manner fulfilling an obligation incumbent upon them by law to provide at least one bell for the purposes of the parish church. Under these circumstances it appears to me impossible to doubt that when the agreement says the bells are "to be employed for the parish as well as the town," it means that they are to be used for such purposes as are properly and truly parish purposes and properly and truly town purposes, and for no other purpose whatsoever; and that the regulation of the use of the bells for those purposes respectively was to belong, as to each kind of purpose, to the proper legal authority, i.e., as to the parish purposes, to the kirk-session; and as to the town purposes, to the magistrates; and that, as (on the one hand) the powers of the magistrates as to town purposes ought not to be usurped or encroached upon by the kirk-session, so (on the other hand) the powers of the kirk-session ought not to be usurped or encroached upon by the magistrates. This being so, I think it is reasonably plain that by assuming to regulate the hours of ringing these bells on Sundays for purposes of public worship the magistrates have in two respects trespassed upon the proper province of the kirk-session, and have violated the substance of the contract as to the employment of the bells "for the parish,"—first, by fixing the particular hours at which the bells shall be rung for such purposes, whereas the right to fix those hours belongs properly to the kirk-session; and secondly, by doing this with a view to other worship than that of the parish church, for which it would be wrong and unlawful both on principle and according to the decision in the Paisley case[1] to ring any bell or bells which had been lawfully provided by the heritors in discharge of their legal obligation for the purposes of the parish. It further appears to me that there is no legal ground on the construction of this agreement for making any distinction for these purposes between one bell and another, so long as it is lawfully placed and remains in this steeple, and that there is no usage in this case by which the rights of parties, according to the legal construction and effect of the original agreement of 1779 have been in any way restricted or altered. While, however, I agree with the majority of the Judges in the Inner-House on the merits of this case, I think it will be proper that the interlocutor should be varied, without prejudice to the costs of the appeal, in the manner proposed by the Lord Chancellor.

No. 11.

June 7, 1875.

Magistrates of Peebles v. Kirk-Session of Peebles.

THIS judgment was pronounced:—"It is ordered and adjudged by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, in Parliament assembled, that the said interlocutor of the Lords of Session in Scotland of the First Division, of the 10th of July 1874, complained of in the said appeal, be varied, by leaving out after the words 'parochial Fast-days' the word 'except,' and by inserting after the words 'purpose of' the following words, 'intimating worship or,' and by inserting after the word 'worship' the words 'elsewhere than,' and by leaving out after the words 'kirk-session' the following words, 'and except on occasion of funerals or fires:' And it is further ordered and adjudged, that, with this variation of the said interlocutor of the 10th of July 1874, that interlocutor" (and the interlocutor approving of the Auditor's report) . . . . . "be, and the same are hereby affirmed, with costs:" . . . "And it is further ordered, that the cause be, and the same is hereby remitted back to the Court of Session in Scotland to do therein as shall be just and consistent with this variation and this judgment."

GRAHAMES & WARDLAW, Westminster—GIBSON-CRAIG, DALZIEL, & BRODIES, W.S.—CONNELL & HOPE, Westminster—GILLESPIE & PATERSON, W.S.

No. 12.

June 17, 1875.

M'Donald v. M'Donald's Trustees.

COLONEL ALASTAIR M'IAIN M'DONALD, Appellant (Defender and Claimant).—Cotton, Q.C.—Marten, Q.C.—J. M. Collyer.

WILLIAM M'INROY AND OTHERS (Sir John and Lady M'Donald's Trustees), Respondents (Pursuers and Real Raisers).

ALEXANDER WEIR ROBERTSON (John Allan M'Donald's Trustee) AND OTHERS, Respondents (Claimants).

JOHN ALLAN M'DONALD, Respondent (Defender).—J. Pearson, Q.C.—Kay, Q.C.

ELIZABETH MOORE MENZIES M'DONALD, Respondent (Defender and Claimant).—J. Pearson, Q.C.—Kay, Q.C.

Marriage-Contract—Provision to Children—Power of Apportionment, Exercise of—Condition adjected.—By an antenuptial contract of marriage the wife's fortune was conveyed to trustees, with directions, on the death of the survivor of the spouses, to "pay over or assign" the whole trust-funds to the child or children of the marriage, "in such proportions, and at such time, and under such conditions as" the spouses should by joint deed appoint, and failing such apportionment, then in certain specified proportions. A portion of the wife's funds, amounting to £25,000, was advanced by the marriage-contract trustees on heritable bond over two estates purchased by the husband for £28,000 during the subsistence of the marriage. The parents, on the narrative that it was their wish to entail these estates, as well as the patrimonial estate of the husband, on the children of the marriage, and their heirs before the children of any subsequent marriage of the husband or other substitutes, and that the husband had for that purpose agreed to alter the destination of his patrimonial estate, and to execute an entail of the whole estates, and had executed the same, proceeded, in the exercise of their power of division, to provide that the above mentioned sum of £25,000 secured over the husband's estates should be "settled on and belong to our eldest son and other members of our family in succession, being heirs in possession of the entailed estate," the said sum being the share of the trust-fund, "which we do hereby allot and apportion as the share of our eldest son, or, failing him, of the heir of entail succeeding to the said entailed estate, it being our desire and appointment, that the said trustees under our marriage-contract before narrated, or the survivors of them, should immediately on the death of the survivor of us renounce and discharge the said heritable bond, and disburden the said lands and estates" of the same.

[1] M'Naughtan v. Magistrates of Paisley, Feb. 7, 1835, 13 S. 432, 7 Scot. Jur. 214.

No. 12.

June 17, 1875. M'Donald v. M'Donald's Trustees.

Held (rev. judgment of the Court of Session) that this was a valid exercise by the parents of the power of appointment contained in the marriage-contract in favour of the eldest son to the extent of £25,000 in fee, the addition of the words "and other members of our family in succession, being heirs in possession of the entailed estate," importing no effectual limitation of his right, and the direction to the trustees to discharge the bond for £25,000 over the entailed estate being one which could only be carried out with his consent.

Ld. Chancellor (Cairns). Ld. Hatherley. Ld. Selborne.

(IN the Court of Session, March 10, 1874, ante, vol. i. p. 794.)

By antenuptial contract of marriage, dated 8th September 1826, John M'Donald of Dalchosnie (afterwards Sir John M'Donald), settled his estate of Dalchosnie upon himself and his wife, Miss Adriana M'Inroy (afterwards Lady M'Donald), in conjunct fee and liferent, but for her liferent use allenarly, and upon the heirs-male of the marriage, and certain other heirs in fee, with power to himself to execute an entail, which he subsequently did, calling first to the succession these heirs in the order of the destination contained in the marriage-contract.

On the other hand, Miss M'Inroy conveyed her whole interest under her father's will, amounting to more than £50,000, to trustees, for the following purposes:—That they should pay the whole annual produce to herself and John M'Donald during the subsistence of the marriage, and to herself, should she survive him, during the remainder of her life; that they should pay to John M'Donald, should he survive her, an annuity of £750 a-year from her death during the remainder of his life; and that after the death of the survivor of herself and John M'Donald they should "pay over or assign the whole of the sums and property to be liferented in manner aforesaid to the child or children to be procreated of the said intended marriage, and that in such proportions and at such time and under such conditions as the said John M'Donald and Adriana M'Inroy shall by any joint deed, or as the said Adriana M'Inroy, in case she shall be the survivor, shall, by any deed or writing signed by her, direct and appoint, and, failing any such direction or appointment," then in certain specified proportions.

Soon after his marriage Sir John M'Donald purchased the two estates of Lochgarry and Kinloch-Rannoch, adjoining to Dalchosnie, for the price of £28,000. There was paid towards the purchase of these estates, out of the funds in the hands of Lady M'Donald's trustees, the sum of £25,000, for which a heritable bond over the estates was granted to them by Sir John. This bond remained a burden on the estates during the life of Sir John and Lady M'Donald.

On 18th July 1837 Sir John and Lady M'Donald executed a joint deed of settlement and provision.

This deed proceeded on the narrative of their contract of marriage, and of the subsequent purchase of the estates of Lochgarry and Kinloch-Rannoch, and of the advance on the security of the estates of the sum of £25,000 of Lady M'Donald's funds, and on the further narrative of it being "our desire to settle definitively, onerously, irrevocably, and mutually the whole of the said estates of Dalchosnie, Lochgarry, and Kinloch-Rannoch belonging to me, the said John M'Donald, and also to divide, apportion, and settle the whole property, heritable and moveable, including the said sum of £25,000 secured over the said lands of Lochgarry and Kinloch-Rannoch belonging to me, the said Adriana M'Donald, on ourselves and our family, and failing our heirs-male, so far to alter the destination in the marriage-contract with regard to Dalchosnie as to settle it with the other lands on heirs-female of the present marriage, giving them a preference and priority to heirs-male of any subsequent marriage: And (considering) that in order to effect that object I, the said John M'Donald, have of this date executed a deed of entail of the said lands of Dalchosnie and Lochgarry and Kinloch-Rannoch in favour of my said wife and myself, and the survivor of us in liferent, and to the heirs therein mentioned in fee,* and which deed of entail was granted by me in consideration of the declarations and apportionment hereinafter made in regard to the property of the said Adriana M'Donald, my wife:" and then provided as follows:—"Therefore we, the said John M'Donald and Adriana M'Donald, in consideration of the said deed of entail and of the powers possessed by us under the said contract of marriage, do by these presents, with joint consent and assent, declare and appoint as follows:—First, It is our will that in the event of the said John M'Donald surviving me, the said Adriana M'Donald, he shall have and enjoy the liferent use of my whole property during all the days of his life, just as I myself would have enjoyed it if I had survived him; second, that it is our will that the said sum of £25,000, secured over the said estates of Lochgarry and Kinloch-Rannoch, shall be settled on and belong to our eldest son and other members of our family in succession, being heirs in possession of the entailed estate, the sum of £25,000 being the share of my (the said Adriana M'Donald's) property, which we, the said John M'Donald and Adriana M'Inroy or M'Donald, have allotted and apportioned, and do hereby allot and apportion, as the share of our eldest son, or failing him, of the heir of entail succeeding to the said entailed estate, it being our desire and appointment that the said trustees under our marriage-contract before narrated, or the survivors of them, should immediately on the death of the survivor of us, renounce and discharge the said heritable bond, and disburden the said lands and estates of Lochgarry and Kinloch-Rannoch of the same; and, third, as to the remainder of the property belonging

* The destination in this entail was to the eldest son of the marriage and the heirs-male of his body; whom failing, to each son of the marriage successively, and the heirs-male of his body; whom failing, to each daughter of the marriage successively, and the heirs-male of her body; whom failing, to the heirs-female of the body of each son seriatim; whom failing, to the heirs-female of the body of each daughter seriatim; whom failing, to the sons and daughters of any subsequent marriage of the entailer and the heirs-male of their bodies; whom failing, to the entailer's two brothers and the heirs-male of the body of each successively; whom failing, to the entailer's heirs whomsoever. The entailer's two brothers predeceased Lady M'Donald without issue.

No. 12.

June 17, 1875. M'Donald v. M'Donald's Trustees.

to me, the said Adriana M'Donald, it is our will that after the death of the said John M'Donald, in case he survives me, the whole funds beyond the said sum of £25,000 settled as above shall be equally divided among our younger children, exclusive of the heir; it being provided that in case such funds shall exceed £10,000 to each younger child, the whole excess above £10,000 shall all fall to the eldest son or heir of entail as above mentioned, with the view of its being laid out in the purchase of lands and entailed with the other estates upon him and the heirs called in the foresaid deed of entail through the whole course of succession." . . . .

Sir John M'Donald died on 24th June 1866 survived by his widow and by three sons and three daughters.

Lady M'Donald died on 7th November 1872.

On Lady M'Donald's death, the trustees under her contract of marriage brought a multiplepoinding of the funds in their hands. In that action a question was raised as to the validity of the exercise by the mutual deed of 18th July 1837 of the powers of apportionment reserved in the marriage-contract of 8th September 1826.

It was pleaded for Colonel Alastair M'Iain M'Donald, the eldest son of Sir John and Lady M'Donald, and as such heir of entail in possession of the lands of Dalchosnie;—Under the settlement and deed of division executed by Sir John and Lady M'Donald the claimant is entitled to payment of the sum of £25,000, without the limitations and conditions attached to the appointment thereof, in respect that the said limitations and conditions are ineffectual, not being authorised by the power of appointment in the marriage-contract.

It was pleaded for the younger children;—(2) The deed of Sir John and Lady M'Donald of 18th July 1837 is ineffectual as an apportionment, in respect that it gives a large portion of the fund to persons not objects of the power. (3) No valid deed of division or apportionment having been executed either by Sir John and Lady M'Donald jointly, or by Lady M'Donald as the survivor, the marriage-contract funds fall to be divided among the children of the marriage who survived Lady M'Donald in the proportions specified in the marriage-contract.

The Lord Ordinary (Gifford) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that there was no valid or effectual exercise of the power of direction and appointment reserved to the late Sir John M'Donald and Lady Adriana M'Inroy or M'Donald, his spouse, or to the said Lady M'Donald, if survivor, in the contract of marriage between them, dated 8th September 1826; and finds that the estate of the said Lady M'Donald, settled by the said marriage-contract, being all and whole Lady M'Donald's whole share and interest of every kind in the estate of or under the will of the deceased James M'Inroy, her father, falls now to be paid, divided, and assigned to and among the surviving children of the marriage, in the same manner as if no division or appointment had been made or attempted under the said power," &c.

Against this interlocutor Colonel Alastair M'Iain M'Donald reclaimed.

The Second Division, after an argument before themselves and three Judges of the First Division, in conformity with the opinion of the majority of the seven Judges (dissenting Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Ardmillan), adhered to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

Colonel M'Donald appealed.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—The only question of difficulty in this appeal is as to the proper construction of a joint deed of division executed by Sir John and Lady M'Donald in the year 1837.

At the outset I may say that I certainly do not give any weight to an argument which, somewhat late in the progress of the case, was addressed to your Lordships in favour or the respondents—that because the joint deed of division purported to give to Sir John M'Donald, in the event of his surviving his wife, a life interest in the whole of the trust-property, therefore all that was done by way of appointment subsequently to the giving of that life interest was invalid. There was an attempt to give the whole of the income to Sir John during his life, in the event of his surviving Lady M'Donald. In point of fact he did not survive Lady M'Donald. Under these circumstances it appears to me it would be entirely contrary to reason, and, as far as I know, quite without authority, to hold that an attempted disposition, not in any way interfering with that which was legitimately within the object of the power of distribution of the property, and only to take effect in an event which never has happened, should in any way militate against the validity of the subsequent appointment.

No. 12.

June 17, 1875.
M'Donald v. M'Donald's Trustees.

Passing by that, I come to what was done with regard to the children of the marriage. Lady M'Donald had a very considerable property of her own, amounting to over £50,000. Shortly after the marriage Sir John and Lady M'Donald thought it would be desirable to purchase two properties neighbouring to that which belonged to Sir John M'Donald at Dalchosnie—namely, the properties of Lochgarry and Kinloch-Rannoch, and Sir John purchased these properties for a sum of £28,000. He borrowed, in order to pay for these properties, £25,000 of the trust-money, which represented the property of Lady M'Donald, and he gave to her trustees a heritable bond over the properties which he had purchased—namely, Lochgarry and Kinloch-Rannoch. When the spouses came to consider the appointment they should jointly make of Lady M'Donald's property they took notice of the state of the landed property. A new entail was made of the Dalchosnie family property, and at the same time an entail was made of the Lochgarry and Kinloch-Rannoch properties. They entailed the whole three upon their eldest son, and their other sons in course of entail, and then upon other persons.

Now, there is not the least doubt upon the view which must be taken, on the whole, of the joint deed of division, coupled with the deed entailing these properties, that the spouses intended and desired that the estates of Lochgarry and Kinloch-Rannoch, which had been mainly acquired by the £25,000 of trust-property, should go in the course of the entail under which they were limited, and should go without the encumbrance on them of the heritable bond securing the £25,000, to the trustees of the trust-funds. And there is not the slightest doubt, at least not in my mind, that if Sir John and Lady M'Donald had been asked, is that what you desire? do you desire to execute an instrument which shall say that Lochgarry and Kinloch-Rannoch shall go in the course of the entail under which they have been settled, discharged of the £25,000?—they would have said, By all means, that is exactly what we want; let that be done in whatever way it can be done. But, my Lords, although there is no doubt that that was the general intention of Sir John and Lady M'Donald, the question for your Lordships to consider is this—How have they given effect to that general intention, and have they given effect to that general intention in a way which is open to objection upon the ground of its complete invalidity? My Lords, it was perfectly well known—any one reading the deed of 1837 would see it—that those who were advising Sir John and Lady M'Donald saw that this general intention of the spouses could not be given effect to, except through the medium of an appointment of the trust-fund representing Lady M'Donald's property, and the question again comes to be, have they, in making that appointment of the trust-funds, exceeded the conditions of the power of appointment.

No. 12.

June 17, 1875.
M'Donald v. M'Donald's Trustees.

Now, what they did, in order to accomplish the intention which they had in view was this—Under the second head of the deed they provided in these words, "That it is our will that the said sum of £25,000 secured over the said estates of Lochgarry and Kinloch-Rannoch shall be settled on and belong to our eldest son and other members of our family in succession, being heirs in possession of the entailed estate." That was the first part of the clause. The second is this—"The sum of £25,000, being the share of my (the said Adriana M'Donald's) property which we, the said John M'Donald and Adriana M'Inroy or M'Donald, have allotted and apportioned, and do hereby allot and apportion as the share of our eldest son, or, failing him, of the heir of entail succeeding to the said entailed estate." That is the second. The third is this—"It being our desire and appointment that the said trustees under our marriage-contract before narrated, or the survivors of them, should immediately, on the death of the survivor of us, renounce and discharge the said heritable bond, and disburden the said lands and estates of Lochgarry and Kinloch-Rannoch of the same."

Now, as regards the first clause of this second head of the deed, "it is our will that the said sum of £25,000 secured over the said estates of Lochgarry and Kinloch-Rannoch shall be settled on and belong to our eldest son and other members of our family in succession, being heirs in possession of the entailed estate," if that stood alone, if the deed contained nothing more than that, it would, as it seems to me, be open to this observation,—There is a direction to take £25,000 of the trust-funds, and to settle it on the eldest son—to make it belong to the eldest son,—a person then in existence, a person spoken of, a persona designata by the title which he then filled. And if you add the words, "and other members of our family in succession, being heirs in possession of the entailed estate," the most favourable view for the respondents that could be taken of that clause would be this—that while the eldest son was to take, in the first place, the other persons who were heirs in the course of the entail were to take afterwards in the same way in which they were to take the estates themselves afterwards—that is to say, the eldest son was to take that which was money in the way in which he was to take the land as heir of entail, or what we should term the tenant in tail, and that he should take it therefore as the fiar, with a simple destination to those who afterwards might become fiars in succession. Your Lordships will readily see that if that were to be the construction it would make the eldest son the absolute owner of the money, because, of course, the money could not be subject to fetters which would keep it from his absolute dominium.

But, my Lords, we have further information in the second clause, which is this—"The sum of £25,000, being the share of my (the said Adriana M'Donald's) property, which we, the said John M'Donald and Adriana M'Inroy or M'Donald, have allotted and apportioned, and do hereby allot and apportion as the share of our eldest son, or, failing him, of the heir of entail succeeding to the said entailed estate." I again say, if this clause stood alone, it would appear to me to be the clearest possible apportionment and appointment of the £25,000 as the share of the eldest son, and under the words "or failing him" if he were not there at the time when the succession opened at the death of the survivor of the spouses, there would be an indication that the heir of entail succeeding to the entailed estate was to come in his place as substitute for him. Then, again, if that were to be the construction of the second clause, the eldest son, being there, would be entitled, as the object of the appointment, to take the money, and the circumstance that there was an alternative limitation, which never came into existence, to a person who might not have been an object of the power, could not in any way defeat or invalidate the appointment to the eldest son, who was an object of the power.

I have pointed out what appears to me to be the only two constructions which these two clauses admit of. There is either an appointment to the eldest son with an appointment by way of succession to the next owners in tail, making both of them fiars,—the one a fiar in the first instance, with a simple destination to the others afterwards, or there is an appointment to the eldest son if he is alive at the death of the survivor of the spouses, with a conditional institution of the next heir of entail if the eldest son should not then be alive. In either case the eldest son would be entitled to the dominium, the possession of the money.

Then the third clause is this :—" It being our desire and appointment that the said trustees under our marriage-contract before narrated, or the survivors of them, should immediately, on the death of the survivor of us, renounce and discharge the said heritable bond, and disburden the said lands and estates of Lochgarry and Kinloch-Rannoch of the same." That is the expression of what I began by saying was without doubt the general intention of the spouses, that by means of the land being disburdened of the heritable bond it should be left to go in succession to the heirs of entail without the obligation of paying the sum of £25,000. It is simply an expression of a desire which could only be carried into effect with the consent of the person who by the previous clauses was made, according to my opinion, the absolute owner of the £25,000. If he consented the trustees might disburden the estate. If he did not consent the estate had to remain burdened with this bond, and this expression of desire would not be held in any way of itself to take away from that ownership which was created by the former clause. My Lords, it appears to me that the clause with regard to the £10,000 for portions for the younger children entirely corroborates this view of the construction. That clause runs thus :—" It being provided that in case such funds shall exceed £10,000 to each younger child the whole excess above £10,000 shall all fall to the eldest son or heir of entail as above mentioned (that is to say, to the eldest son if he is there, and to the heir of entail if he is not there), " with a view to its being laid out " (it says not by whom) "in the purchase of lands, and entailed with the other estates upon him and the heirs called in the foresaid deed of entail through the whole course of succession,"—that is, it shall fall to the eldest son, and it shall fall to him with a view to its being laid out in the manner described. Whether it would be so laid out or not would depend upon whether the heir or the eldest son taking it held himself to be bound by or was willing to comply with this expression of a wish as to the way in which the money should be used.

That is the construction which, as it appears to me, ought to be put upon the deed, and, if so, the rule of law which is applicable to the subject is beyond all doubt. It was not in any way disputed at your Lordships' bar. It is a rule to be be derived from the authority of Carver v. Bowles, Jan. 19, 1831, 2 R. and M., 301, and the numerous class of cases of the same kind, and also from those cases (of which Lassence v. Tierney, Dec. 11, 1849, 1 Mac. and Gor., 551, may be taken as an example) which, though not relating to powers, but to gifts and legacies, raise questions almost identical with those which are raised in the cases of which Carver v. Bowles is an example. From all those cases the plain rule is to be derived, that if you cannot disconnect that which is imposed by way of condition or mode of enjoyment from a gift, the gift itself may be found to be involved in conditions so much beyond the power that it becomes void. But where that is not so, where you have a gift to an object of the power, and where you have nothing alleged to invalidate that gift but conditions which are attempted to be imposed as to the mode in which that object of the power is to enjoy what is given to him, then the gift may be valid and take effect without reference to those conditions.

No. 12.

June 17, 1875. M'Donald v. M'Donald's Trustees.

Here it appears to me that there is a clear gift, in the events which have happened, to the eldest son. There is nothing whatever attempted to be added by way of checking his enjoyment of the property but the injunction to the trustees (that is, to other parties) to destroy the security by means of which the money appointed to the eldest son was secured.

The trustees, of course, could not do that without the consent of the person to whom the money was given. It appears to me that there was no authority whatever which would warrant your Lordships in holding that a direction of that kind could invalidate an absolute gift.

That being so, the deed of division appears to me to be entirely efficacious for the purpose of vesting in the eldest son the right to receive the £25,000, and I shall therefore take leave to submit to your Lordships the motion that the interlocutors which are appealed from should be reversed, and that a declaration should be made that the appellant under the settlement and deed of division executed by Sir John and Lady M'Donald is entitled as from the death of Lady M'Donald to the gift of £25,000, secured by heritable bond over the estates of Lochgarry and Kinloch-Rannoch, and that with this declaration the case should be remitted to the Court of Session.

Lord Hatherley.—I am of the same opinion. When the case comes to be analysed it is clearly within the authorities that have been cited — so clearly within them, that it appears to me that the counsel for the respondents have wholly failed in establishing a distinction in principle between it and the authorities which have long guided the Courts in cases of this description. In the present case there is a power to the spouses to dispose amongst their children of a very large property of the wife, Lady M'Donald, and by the instrument which is now in question they undoubtedly intended to dispose of the wife's property, over which this power existed. The mode in which they attempted to dispose of it, and the collateral views and intentions which may have existed in their minds, have not prevented, I think, the operation of the clauses by which the actual disposition is clearly made.

I cannot doubt, my Lords, that there was a desire on the part of the husband and the wife that those estates, which had been bought mainly with the property of the wife, and which were to be the subject of disposition, should be added on to the original family estates, and that inasmuch as £25,000, part of the wife's fortune, had been employed in buying those estates, both the eldest son should be entitled, in the first instance, under the deed by which those estates had been settled to the enjoyment of the property, and, if it could be lawfully done, his successors in the entailed estates should have the advantage of enjoying the estates so purchased with the £25,000 discharged from that sum. That appears clearly and undoubtedly from one provision in this deed.

But they had, paramount to that, and as their primary intention in the execution of the deed, the desire to settle definitely, onerously, irrevocably, and mutually, the whole of the said estates of Dalchosnie, Lochgarry, and Kinloch-Rannoch, belonging to the husband, and it was also their clear intent "to divide, apportion, and settle the whole property, heritable and moveable, including the said sum of £25,000 secured over the said lands of Lochgarry and Kinloch-Rannoch," belonging to the wife, "on ourselves and our family, and, failing our heirs-male, so far to alter the destination in the marriage-contract with regard to Dalchosnie as to settle it with the other lands on heirs-female of the present marriage, giving them a preference and priority to heirs-male of any subsequent marriage." They appear to have thought in making the apportionment some arrangement might be made with reference to the disposition of the property passing on to the heir in the same manner as the original property of the husband was settled, yet the intent to dispose of the whole property over which they had power was undoubtedly and clearly the leading intent of these two persons.

And when they come to dispose of it they do so in this way:—First, they begin, as was noticed by one of the learned Judges in the Court below, by attempting to exceed their power by giving a life interest in the whole property to the husband, who by the original deed had only a life interest in £750 a-year. But it appears to me that, in the events which have happened, that can make no difference whatever in the result of this case. This is simply, as a learned Judge in the Court below says, an indication that they had not the full limits of their power steadily before their eyes.

The real difficulty of the case has been this,—What is to be done with reference to the disposition that is made of the £25,000? The spouses say that it is their will that the £25,000 that is secured over these estates "shall be settled on and belong to our eldest son and other members of our family in succession, being heirs in possession of the entailed estate." That would have been their desire if they could have effected it as regards the sum of personalty—at least what we should call personalty—the sum of £25,000. But in doing that, if they had settled it upon the eldest son, and settled it with the same limitations as were expressed with reference to the landed property, the result would have been that it would have gone to him absolutely. And if they had stopped there, he, being alive at the death of the survivor of the two spouses, would have taken the sum absolutely, and would have had it free from any possible claim on the part of those who might come after him, inasmuch as it was not subject to the fetters and limitations imposed by the Act of 1685. But they do not stop there. The words of the deed make it still more plain as they proceed,—"The sum of £25,000, being the share of my" (the wife's) "property which we" (the spouses) "have allotted and apportioned, and do hereby allot and apportion as the share of our eldest son." I cannot conceive any words of appointment more clear than these. I cannot conceive any words (to follow Lord Cottenham's dictum in Lassence v. Tierney) that would more completely and clearly and neatly sever one share from the rest of the fund, whether that fund be a testator's general residue, as in the case of a will, or, as in this case, a fund of which an appointment is made existing in the hands of trustees in one large mass. The fund amounts in the present case to £50,000, and out of it the sum of £25,000 is plainly severed.

No. 12.

June 17, 1875. M'Donald v. M'Donald's Trustees.

That distinguishes this case and the case of Lassence v. Tierney from a case like Rucker v. Scholefield, Nov. 14, 1862, 1 Hem. and Mil. 36, and from all the cases in which you find the gift only in a continuance of limitations expressed in the instrument without any complete severance of the share at once, for here we have a share taken out of the general-trust fund, and it is allotted to the eldest son, or, failing him, to the heir in possession of the entailed estate. He did not fail. At the death of the survivor of the spouses there he was found, and there was his share found for him,—it was allotted and apportioned for him,—it was taken out of the estate. The case therefore appears to fall as clearly within the case of Carver v. Bowles as any case that can be conceived.

No doubt, my Lords, the spouses proceed to say after that that they wish the trustees to "renounce and discharge the said heritable bond, and disburden the said lands and estate of Lochgarry and Kinloch-Rannoch of the same." That is a condition superadded to the clear and plain allotment of the share which had been made to the eldest son, and, being a condition by which he is not fettered or bound, the condition itself becomes simply a void condition as against him, and he takes the property as he would have taken it under the former limitation, if it had been a limitation to him by way of settlement, in the same manner as the estates were settled, it not being subject to fetters, for the reasons I have already assigned.

Then comes a passage which has been much commented upon. It expresses the same view as the passage preceding with regard to the desire of the spouses that the estates should go in the manner they described. In the subsequent passage, with regard to a surplus after giving £10,000 to each of the younger children, nothing is said that could, I think, afford a ground for the respondents' construction of the previous gift of the eldest son's share. Indeed it was only pressed into the argument in order to shew the general intent upon the whole deed (which I do not dispute) that if it could be so the estates of Lochgarry and Kinloch-Rannoch should pass on with Dalchosnie to the eldest son and his successors in possession of the entailed estate without the encumbrance of the £25,000.

Concurrently with that there was undoubtedly also a desire that a full and complete disposition should be made of the funds over which they had the power of appointing. In the exercise of that power I think they have made a sufficient disposition, in the events which have happened, to the eldest son, and I think the subsequent direction in which they attempt to impose a condition upon the trustees, a condition which the trustees could not with any propriety have fulfilled, to release the estates from the bond, fails to take effect. This is in accordance with the authority of cases which have been decided over and over again in the English Courts, the principle of which is co-incident with that which is supported by the learned Judges in the Court below, although they have differed in their view as to the conditions. I think, therefore, my Lords, that the conclusion which ought to be come to is that the appointment took effect simpliciter.

Lord Selborne.—I read this deed exactly as if the words had stood thus—"We do hereby allot and apportion the sum of £25,000 secured over the estates of Lochgarry and Kinloch-Rannoch as the share of and in my, Adriana M'Donald's, property, of our eldest son, or, failing him, of the heir of entail

No. 12.

June 17, 1875.
M'Donald v. M'Donald's Trustees.

succeeding to the said entailed estate, and it is our will and desire that the said sum of £25,000 shall be settled on and belong to our eldest son and other members of our family in succession, being heirs in possession of the said entailed estates; and also that the trustees under our marriage-contract, or the survivors of them, shall, immediately on the death of the survivor of us, renounce and discharge the heritable bond for the same sum of £25,000, and disburden the said lands and estates of Lochgarry and Kinloch-Rannoch of the same."

So reading the deed, there is, first, an appointment (in the events which have happened) to the eldest son, as fiar, of the whole £25,000. All that follows is but a superadded wish, desire, or condition, having in view the settlement or the release to the owners of the entailed estates of the sum so appointed, which ulterior purpose might be accomplished, and could only be accomplished, through the medium of the estate and interest vested in the eldest son by virtue of this appointment. That wish, desire, or condition, not being authorised by the power, must necessarily fail unless the appointee (whether bound to elect or not, by reason of other benefits given to him independently of the power), should elect to give effect thereto; but the appointment itself is not therefore vitiated. The authorities, of which Carver v. Bowles is an example, have determined (on principles which if sound in England must be equally so in Scotland), that an ulterior purpose of this kind, which is ultra vires only, and not also a fraud on the power, though it may have operated as a motive to the appointment in the mind of the appointor will, nevertheless, not prevent an object of the power from taking for his own benefit the estate appointed to him, if the words used according to their proper construction, which must itself be independent of any peculiar doctrines of law applicable to powers, are sufficient to execute the power, and to vest the property in the appointee.

The context of this deed satisfies me not only that, on sound principles of construction this was its real effect, but that the appointors intended to do the very thing which in law they did, and that they well understood that it was necessary that the deed should so operate in order to make it possible that their ulterior wishes should be capable of accomplishment. The declaration and appointment which they made was expressed to be "in consideration of the said deed of entail," (i.e. the entail of the Lochgarry and Kinloch-Rannoch estates), as well as "of the powers possessed by us under the said contract of marriage;" and after disposing of the £25,000 in the way which has raised this controversy they proceeded to appoint the rest of Lady M'Donald's settled property equally among their "younger children exclusive of the heir" to the extent of £10,000 each, directing that if there were any excess above that amount such excess should all fall to the "eldest son or heir of entail as above mentioned." Here also they superadded the expression of an ulterior wish, to be effectuated through that appointment by the words which followed, "with a view to its being laid out in the purchase of lands and entailed with the other estates upon him and the heirs called in the aforesaid deed of entail through the whole course of succession." And afterwards in two places they referred to the £25,000 as being by this deed "settled on the heir of entail," words which are nearly in those places applicable to the eldest son, as well as to any other heir of entail who (in different events from those which happened) might have succeeded on the deaths of the appointors to the entailed estates. A comparison of all the passages in which the appointee of the £25,000 is thus spoken of in the singular number seems to me to make it quite clear that one individual person

No. 12.
June 17, 1875.
M'Donald v. M'Donald's Trustees.

(to be ascertained with reference to the state of the title to and possession of the entailed estate immediately after the death of the survivor of the appointors), and one person only, was intended to take the £25,000 by way of appointment.

That being so, I agree with your Lordships that the opinion of the minority of the learned Judges in the Court of Session was correct, and that this appeal ought to be allowed.

THIS judgment was pronounced:—"That the said interlocutors complained of in the appeal be, and the same are hereby reversed; and it is declared that the appellant under the settlement and deed of division executed by Sir John and Lady M'Donald (in the proceedings mentioned) is entitled as from the death of Lady M'Donald to the £25,000 secured by heritable bond over the estates of Lochgarry and Kinloch-Rannoch: And it is further ordered that the cause be, and the same is hereby remitted back to the Court of Session in Scotland, to do therein as shall be just and consistent with this declaration and judgment."

LOCH & MACLAURIN, Westminster—A. P. PURVES, W.S.—GRAHAMES & WARDLAW, Westminster—DEWAR & DEAS, W.S.—WEBSTER & WILL, S.S.C.

No. 13.
June 24, 1875.
Bremner v. Elder.

ALEXANDER BREMNER, Inspector of Poor of Rathven (Defender), Appellant.—Cotton, Q.C.—W. A. Brown.
JAMES ELDER, Inspector of Poor of Elgin (Defender), Respondent.—Pearson, Q.C.—Lancaster.
DISTRICT BOARD OF LUNACY FOR ELGIN (Pursuers).

Arbitration.—A dispute between two parishes as to the settlement of a pauper was referred by them to the decision of a society of inspectors of poor, which was in the practice of deciding such questions by vote at their general meetings, at which it was uncertain what members would be present. Held that the reference and the award following thereon were valid.

Ld. O'Hagan.
Ld. Selborne.

(IN the Court of Session, July 10, 1875, ante, vol. i. p. 1155.)
This was an appeal from a judgment of the Second Division. The circumstances of the case and the nature of the action are fully given in the opinion of the Lord Chancellor.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords, subject to an observation in regard to the form of the interlocutor of the Second Division of the Court of Session, I cannot entertain any doubt as to the matter that is presented by this appeal to your Lordships.

It has not been suggested that when, between two parochial boards in Scotland, a dispute arises as to the chargeability of a pauper, that dispute may not be referred to arbitration.

In this case a dispute arose in regard to the chargeability of a pauper named Charlotte Grant, and the dispute, in the first instance, was of a tri-lateral character. The parishes concerned were Rathven, Elgin, and Urquhart. In order to avoid the expense of litigation it was suggested between the parochial authorities that this dispute should be referred to arbitration. The Parochial Board of Rathven had a committee of management, consisting of eight persons; and, in the first instance, on the 1st February 1859, at the general quarterly meeting of the Parochial Board of Rathven, the meeting remitted the case of Charlotte Grant "to the committee, to dispose thereof as may seem best for the interest of this parish." The general power thus committed to the committee of management appears never to have been in any way recalled by the parochial board. Further, on the 3d of May 1859, the Parochial Board of Rathven "directed the inspector to intimate to the parishes of Elgin and Urquhart that the board is willing to submit this case" (that is, the case of Charlotte Grant) "to arbitration, the arbiter to be mutually chosen by all parties;" and eight months having elapsed, on the 3d of January the following year, at an adjourned meeting of the parochial board, there is a minute headed "Charlotte Grant, Elgin.—The inspector laid this case again before the meeting, when the inspector" (that is, the present appellant, Mr Bremner), "was directed to refer the case to any competent arbiter that may be agreed upon between all the parties, but they object to the arbitration of the Secretary to the Board of Supervision, in respect that the case has been prejudged by him in the opinion sent to the inspector of poor of Elgin, in which the inspector of Rathven was not heard as a party."

Therefore, your Lordships have got this at the commencement—the clearest possible intention on the part of the Parochial Board of Rathven to refer the case to arbitration, a direction to the inspector to refer the case to any competent arbiter that the parties might agree upon (by which I understand that he, in conjunction with the two other parties, Elgin and Urquhart, might agree upon), and then overriding the whole, the continuing authority of the managing committee to deal with the case of Charlotte Grant as might seem best for the interest of the parish.

That being the state in which the case was left on the 3d of January 1860, some steps were taken by Mr Bremner, on behalf of the Parochial Board of Rathven, and by Mr Stiven, the inspector of Elgin, to agree upon an arbiter; and on the 13th of April 1860 Mr Stiven, the inspector of Elgin, writes to Mr Bremner, the inspector of Rathven—"I should like to be able to say whether, in the event of Urquhart and Elgin being willing to refer the case to the Society of Inspectors at Glasgow, your board agree to that proposal, as I much fear they will not agree to the parties named by Rathven." Then, passing over the intervening letters, on the 22d of February 1861 Mr Stiven again writes to Mr Bremner with regard to the choice of arbiters:—"What do you think of the Society of Inspectors for Scotland?" And to that, on the 23d of February 1861, Mr Bremner replies:—"On the 1st of July 1859 I see I offered to refer to the society you now propose to refer to." Therefore, your Lordships have it that, at all events, as regards Mr Stiven, the inspector of Elgin, and as regards Mr Bremner, acting on behalf of Rathven, there was a proposal and an agreement to take as arbiter the Society of Inspectors at Glasgow. I will afterwards consider the constitution of that society.

Up to this point there was no agreement on the part of Urquhart, and as the case went on, and as proceedings were taken to settle a statement to be laid before the Society of Inspectors, we find that, on the 4th of April 1861, Mr Stiven writes thus to Mr Bremner:—"I have now got the decision of the board of Urquhart in the above case, which is, 'they decline any reference, and are to defend it.' I laid their letter before our board yesterday, and am directed to see whether your board would be willing to go into the reference along with Elgin alone." Now, of course, the arbitration originally contemplated, having been intended to be between all the parties, it was a matter of importance to find whether it would go on between Elgin and Rathven if Urquhart did not agree. Then, on the 1st of May 1861, three weeks afterwards, the inspector of Elgin "laid before the board a letter from the inspector of Rathven, agreeing to join in a reference of this case to the Society of Inspectors of Poor for Scotland without the parish of Urquhart, and the inspector was instructed to prepare a joint minute along with the inspector of Rathven."

No. 13.

June 24, 1875.
Bremner v. Elder.

Now, stopping here, I proceed to ask, what was known by the committee of management as to what was being done? Your Lordships have this statement in the evidence of Mr Bremner on his examination by the Court. He is asked —"Were these eight members of the board" (that is, the committee of management) "aware individually that you were about to refer this case to the Society of Inspectors? (A.) I think that, individually, they were aware of it? (Q.) Every one of them? (A.) I think so, but I am not positive as to that; but it was not brought before them officially. (Q.) But your opinion is that every one of them knew of it individually? (A.) I suppose they did." My Lords, I apprehend that it would be impossible in this state of things to arrive at any other conclusion than that, before the reference to the Society of Inspectors took place, the board of management, who had complete power to give authority in the case, were aware that the arbiter selected by the inspector, in pursuance of the direction given to him, was the Society of Inspectors of Scotland. With regard to the non-concurrence of Urquhart, no question having been asked of Mr Bremner as to whether the committee of management were aware or were not aware of that non-concurrence, and Mr Bremner having taken upon himself to state to Mr Stiven, the inspector for Elgin, that his board were willing to go on with the arbitration without the concurrence of Urquhart, I think that no conclusion can be drawn but that the committee of management were perfectly well aware that the arbitration which they were directing, and in which they had approved, of the arbiters, was to be persevered in, even although Urquhart was not willing to concur in it.

I now turn to the arbiters who were thus chosen. Who were they, and was there any incapacity on their part to undertake an arbitration of this kind? They are described in the evidence of Mr Lemon as a society consisting of inspectors of poor and assistants in Scotland. He says that—"Questions connected with the poor-law administration frequently came before the society, and the society give their consideration to them and pronounce their opinions upon them. The society keep minute-books of their proceedings and also a letter-book." They therefore were a body as to whom it is not too much to say that there was no objection in point of law to choosing them as arbiters. They were eminently qualified to undertake the task, and, as a consultative and deliberative body, to pronounce an opinion upon the subject referred to them, as to which they, of all persons in Scotland, were competent to speak.

Now, was there any objection in point of law to a body of that kind as arbiters when the parties agreed to select such a body? Your Lordships have heard an elaborate argument to shew that in Scotland there must, as regards the choice of arbiters, be a delectus personæ; and you were referred to authorities which shew that, where there is a contract beforehand to refer to the arbitration of individuals not named, or of individuals filling an official position, or of individuals composing a fluctuating body, and where, therefore, at the time the contract is made to refer to arbitration future disputes which may not arise for years, there can be no delectus personæ, there a contract of that kind cannot be urged and founded on to oust the regular jurisdiction of the Courts of law.

I should be sorry to express any opinion adverse to those decisions, or tending to throw any doubt upon the propriety of those decisions, but they appear to me to have no application whatever to the present case. The question is this—Is it the law of Scotland that where there are two persons competent to refer to arbitration where a dispute has arisen, and where those persons may select the arbiter at their option, there is some invalidity in point of law in the selection as arbiter of a society consisting of a number of members? I have anxiously attended to the argument in order to find out whether there was any authority in the Scotch books upon that subject, and certainly none has been produced to shew that a reference of that kind would be invalid. I apprehend that in this country there is nothing whatever which would prevent persons who are minded to refer to arbitration from referring to the arbitration of an unincorporated society consisting of a number of members, or to the members of an incorporated society. How the arbitration so made should be worked out—by what numbers it should be decided—whether at a public meeting or in what way, is a different question which may be kept distinct from the question of whether such persons can be selected as arbiters. I therefore arrive at this stage of the case, that I find those who were competent to bind the parish of Rathven willing to refer to the Society of Inspectors as arbiters, and that there is nothing in law that I have discovered which prevents a valid reference being made to a society of that description.

No. 13.

June 24, 1875.

Bremner v. Elder.

Then arises the question, how was the reference conducted, and was there any irregularity in the proceedings under that reference; and if there was any irregularity, has it been condoned or waived by those who might have objected to it.

What was done was this: The inspector for Rathven and the inspector for Elgin could not agree upon a joint statement of facts. Of course if they could have agreed upon a joint statement that would have been much the most satisfactory mode of taking the opinion of the Society of Inspectors. Elgin and Rathven were at a distance from the situs of this society, for the society met at Glasgow. The inspectors appear to have agreed to adopt the course of sending each his own statement of the case. Accordingly they sent separate statements—statements which have been read to your Lordships, and which are of a very argumentative description, and contain some not very precise references to facts.

I apprehend that when persons refer to arbitration, if, in place of appearing before the arbiter, or of asking the arbiter to examine witnesses, they agree amongst themselves either upon a joint statement of the case, or that they will each send their own statement to the arbiter for him to form his opinion upon, that is a competent course; and if that course is taken, and the award made upon that basis, neither party can resile from that award. And when I say "neither party," I do not lose sight of this, that the persons who managed the mode and form in which the proceedings were conducted were the inspectors and not the parochial boards. A parochial board, in a matter of this kind, must of necessity act by their officer or agent, and that their inspectors were. The parochial boards could not in person have attended to the detail of an arbitration of this kind. Where they had agreed upon an arbitration, and agreed upon the arbiters, and placed in the hands of their officers the authority to take all the steps of procedure which might be thought necessary, they cannot object to an irregularity assented to by their own officers.

These two statements having gone before the arbiters, the arbiters appear to have considered that they, being a consultative body, it would be convenient to request two of their members to make a single statement collected from the statements which were before the Society of Inspectors, together, apparently, with such further information as they might think it necessary to ask for. They thought it necessary to ask on one point for further information, and a letter in duplicate was sent to the two contending parties, the inspector for Rathven and the inspector for Elgin, asking for that further information. On these materials, not in any way withdrawing the two statements which had been made by the inspectors of the parishes and laid before the Society of Inspectors, but adding this further single statement collected from the two, made by the two members of their body, on those materials the society pronounced its decision. And no other materials having been afforded or tendered to the society, and the parochial officers being satisfied that the decision should proceed upon those materials, it appears to me that it would be the grossest injustice to hold that either of those parochial authorities, or either of the parishes which they represented, should afterwards be allowed to turn round, when the award was given against them, and object to it upon the ground that other materials might have been presented to the Society of Inspectors, and that the facts might have been put before them in a different way, and in a more elaborate or an altered form.

No. 13.

June 24, 1875.
Bremner v. Elder.

The Society of Inspectors having come to their determination, a determination unfavourable to Rathven, it is quite clear that that determination was announced immediately to both parishes. In point of form your Lordships have not got the submission to arbitration of the inspectors on behalf of the parishes. It has, however, been most justly conceded at your Lordships' bar, that it must be taken that there was in some form a submission of the kind, although it is lost. In point of form also your Lordships have not got the mode in which the decision of the Society of Inspectors was communicated, but their decision or their award was entered upon their own minutes, and it appears from the letters of the inspectors that it was made known to them immediately afterwards. In point of fact, Mr Bremner, the present appellant, having got the decision, wrote to the Society of Inspectors (and this certainly was an irregularity on his part) demurring to the decision at which the society had arrived, and suggesting to them that they had overlooked some important fact, and he received from them an answer saying that his letter had been brought before them, and that they considered, notwithstanding his letter, that the decision they had arrived at was the proper decision.

My Lords, I am bound to say that up to this point I find that which appears to me to be a valid reference to arbitration. I find arbiters selected who could not be objected to. I find proceedings before those arbiters, which, if not of the most usual and ordinary kind, and perhaps, I might add, not of the most convenient kind for the purpose of deciding the question referred, were yet proceedings which were adopted without being in any way objected to by those who had alone the right to object to the way in which the proceedings were conducted,—I mean the parochial officers acting on behalf of the parishes.

When that decision was thus made known there were payments which required to be made under and in consequence of the decision. Accordingly the parish of Rathven repaid to the parish of Elgin the sums which the Elgin parish had paid to the Lunacy Board in respect of this pauper, and the parish of Rathven paid to the Lunacy Board for a period during the year 1863, and up to December 1864 the payments which required to be made for her maintenance in a lunatic asylum. It was not until November 1864 that any attempt was made to resile from what had been done, when Mr Bremner wrote this letter to

No. 13.
June 24, 1875.
Bremner v. Elder.

Mr Stiven on behalf of the parish of Rathven,—"I hereby intimate that we do hereby withdraw our admission of liability for the support of Charlotte Grant, and repudiate the finding of the Association of Inspectors for Scotland in so far as the same is against the parish of Rathven, which finding is contrary to the decision of the Supreme Courts in the case of Margaret Whyte (Huntly v. Bellie and Urquhart)." [1]

It is always important in these cases to find upon what ground, when first the controversy arises, the right to repudiate is placed. Now, I find here no allegation of want of authority or of invalidity in respect of the arbiters chosen, or of irregularity in the proceedings, but I find Mr Bremner professing to write on behalf of his parochial board (although it is suggested now that the letter was written without the authority of the parochial board), and intimating that they "repudiate the finding of the association of inspectors," not in consequence of its invalidity or its irregularity, but because there had been a recent decision of the Supreme Court in opposition to the law as found by that award. And on the 8th of December 1864, after the matter had been brought before the board, and when a minute had been passed in these terms:—"Charlotte Grant, Elgin Asylum.—The meeting withdrew the admission of liability made by the inspector in this case, and directed the inspector to intimate such to Elgin." Mr Bremner again wrote to Mr Stiven thus:—"In terms of minute above written, I have to intimate to you, as inspector of poor for Rathven, that this board have withdrawn their admission of liability in this case from and after the date of my last letter to you on the subject."

It appears to me that while, of course, the parish of Rathven are entitled to any legal right which may be theirs, and if the award is invalid, they are entitled to say they are not bound by it, yet, as regards the morality of this proceeding, I am bound also to say that I have never seen a clearer case in which there is an attempt made by way of afterthought to discover irregularities and to find objections to an award which no person ever thought was irregular, or should be impeached for irregularity at the time it was made, which the parish of Rathven did not desire to examine into at the time it was made, as to which they were perfectly satisfied to leave the whole of the conduct of the arbitration to their officer, and as to which they never thought of devising any mode of escape from it until that very officer himself suggested that course to his board in consequence of a decision which occurred in the Court of Session.

In my opinion, I can find nothing which would entitle your Lordships to say that there was here otherwise than a valid submission to arbitration, and an award by the arbiters, with regard to which, if the proceedings had been in any respect irregular, the irregularity was joined in and condoned by the person who had the conduct of the proceedings on behalf of the parish of Rathven. And I find that the parish when the award was made known to them (for it is not pretended that they made the payments without knowing that the award had been made), were content to take the award as it stood, and not to examine into the mode in which the authority given by them to their inspector had been acted upon.

This would decide the case upon its merits, and would be fatal to the contention of the appellants. Expressions appear to have fallen from the learned

[1] Taylor v. Strachan and Brown, Nov. 8, 1864, 3 Macph. 34, 37 Scot. Jur. 16.

No. 13.

June 24, 1875. Bremner v. Elder.

Judges who composed the majority of the Court of Session, which seem to shew a desire on their part to place the case, not upon the footing of a reference to arbitration and an award, but upon the footing of some species of agreement which does not amount to a reference to arbitration, but is yet, in their opinion, binding upon the parties. And I find that the form which the interlocutor appealed from has taken, is this,—The Lords recall the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and "find that the Parochial Board of Rathven agreed with the Parochial Board of Elgin to abide by the opinion of the Society of Inspectors referred to in the record as to the settlement and support of the pauper lunatic in question: Find that an opinion of the said society on that matter having been expressed and intimated to the parties, the board of Rathven acquiesced in that opinion, and proceeded to implement their agreement by admitting their liability to pay and by paying to the board of Elgin the amount of bygone board which had been paid by the said Parochial Board of Elgin to the pursuers, amounting to £85, 16s. 2d., and further paid to the pursuers the board of the said pauper from March 1863 to December 1864: Find that implement and payment were thus made by the Parochial Board of Rathven in the full knowledge of the material facts of the case, and find that in this way the board of Rathven took fully and finally upon themselves the support of the said pauper, and that they cannot now, in a question with the parish of Elgin, withdraw from the liability thus admitted and acted upon."

In the conclusions thus expressed I entirely agree, but the wording of the interlocutor appears to me rather to avoid adopting the pleas in law of the parish of Elgin, and to suggest that there may, as I have said, be something in the nature of an agreement between these parties which is not an arbitration and an award. Now, the 4th and 5th pleas of the parish of Elgin are these:—"4. The parish of Rathven having referred to arbitration the question of liability for the support of the pauper as between it and the parish of Elgin, is bound by the decision in the arbitration, and is not entitled to defend this action to the effect of throwing the said liability on the parish of Elgin:" "5. The parish of Rathven having acquiesced in the decision in the said arbitration, and acknowledged their liability under it by making payments to the pursuers in respect of the pauper, are not now entitled to repudiate the same to the effect of attaching liability to the parish of Elgin."

I think it would have been more consistent with the form of the case, and with the facts proved before the Court, and with those considerations of law to which I have adverted, that the Court should at once have accepted the 4th and 5th pleas in law of the parish of Elgin, and have based their decision upon those pleas. I shall therefore move your Lordships that in this respect the interlocutor of the 10th July 1874 should be altered, namely, by omitting the special findings which I have read, and by simply, after recalling the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary complained of, allowing the 4th and 5th pleas in law of the parish of Elgin, and then remitting to the Lord Ordinary to proceed with the cause.

My Lords, this, which is an alteration in form and not in substance, ought not, I think, to make any difference as regards the costs of the appeal. Therefore, my Lords, I move that the appellant pay the cost of the appeal.

Lord Hatherley.—My Lords, concurring, as I do, entirely in the conclusions which have been arrived at by my noble and learned friend who has preceded

No. 13.

June 24, 1875.
Bremner v. Elder.

me, I shall very briefly state the grounds on which I arrive at these conclusions, more especially with reference to the objections taken by one at least of the learned Judges in the Court below to the constitution of the tribunal which the parishes selected to determine the point in dispute between them.

The parties to the dispute being the parishes of Rathven, Elgin, and Urquhart, we find that, in the first instance, the parish of Rathven called a meeting of its parochial board, and by that parochial board entrusted the management of the dispute, if I may so term it, to a committee formed of that board, and consisting of eight members. We then find that committee agreeing that Mr Bremner, their inspector and agent, shall have authority to submit the dispute to any competent arbiter, so far as all the parties should agree—that is to say, Rathven, Elgin, and Urquhart. We afterwards find Urquhart withdrawing from this mode of settling the dispute. There is plain evidence on the face of the proceeding of the concurrence of the board of Rathven in the proceedings taken by Mr Bremner in continuing the arbitration, notwithstanding that Urquhart had not consented to take any part in it.

We were told that, by the law of Scotland no reference could be made without a clear and distinct delectus personæ, and that a reference to a fluctuating body of the character of the Society of Inspectors was a reference in itself so utterly valueless, and any decision come to by that body so utterly void, that it was impossible, as one learned Judge held in the Court below, for any sort of homologation to take place which would give validity to an award or decision of such arbiters. I should be extremely sorry if it were necessary for your Lordships to come to any such conclusion in this or in any other similar case with respect to an award decided by a body like this Society of Inspectors. This society seems to have been composed of men eminently qualified to express a judgment upon a point of the character which had arisen in the dispute between these parishes. It seems to have been one of the principal duties of their lives to attend to matters of this description, both individually and as associated. And according to the evidence before us, upon which alone, of course, I can speak, they had apparently so far acquired the confidence of persons who might be brought into litigation for very small amounts of money, for which economical and expeditious justice would naturally be desired by all parties, that such disputes were frequently referred to them. I say I should be extremely sorry that a body so competent as this in respect of knowledge and acquirements should not be held to be in law competent to undertake the duty of arbiters. It appears from the evidence that they are applied to from time to time for their opinions, which, I suppose, means that, when a parish is in doubt, it desires to be guided by their advice, and that they are applied to also for their decisions, which, I apprehend, must mean when a dispute has arisen which the parties are content to terminate by their intervention.

Had it not been for an observation which was made by Lord Benholme in the Court of Session I should not have thought it necessary to say a word more upon the constitution of this tribunal. But that learned Judge seems to have thought that there was an inherent incapacity in a tribunal of this sort, by reason of its consisting of members fluctuating from time to time, by the addition of new members and the recession of some of those who might previously have constituted the body, and by reason of the fact that all the members might or might not be present at a meeting when any particular matter was brought before them for discussion and decision. Now, an example has occurred to me, which I may mention as a patent one, and one that will be well understood by everybody, and that is the case of the Benchers of the Inns of Court, who decide matters of the gravest importance to individuals, affecting their character, status, and their fortunes as involved in that status. And so satisfactorily do they decide those questions that it is very rarely that their decisions are interfered with or reversed by the Court of Appeal which exists, namely, the Judges of the land, who may review their decisions. And yet they are not a corporation, they are a fluctuating body, and it is not always, indeed but seldom, that you can know who are or who are not to be the particular persons who will sit in judgment upon a particular matter. But why that should disqualify or incapacitate them from being selected as arbiters to determine a case in dispute, on the strength of an abstract or an a priori reasoning, it appears to me very difficult to comprehend.

No. 13.

June 24, 1875.
Bremner v. Elder.

That the Society of Inspectors of Scotland take great pains in arriving at their decisions is, I think, manifest from the evidence before us. On the particular occasion on which this controversy was decided there appear to have been present about twenty-one members. But, before meeting to arrive at a final conclusion, they appear to have done all that ordinary persons forming a Court, and seeking to be informed as a Court of what was taking place, would do. They applied, in the first place, for a statement from the parties, and each party sent their statement. The inspector of Elgin and the inspector of Rathven, who managed the controversy for their respective parishes, seem evidently from the tone of their letters to have had communication with each other upon the subject, and not being able to agree upon the exact form of a common case to be stated jointly, they afterwards sent in separate cases, which, when carefully examined in detail, appear to present no very material variations in fact.

Then, my Lords, the society do what has been greatly complained of in the course of the argument,—they refer to two of their body to draw up a statement from these different documents which had been submitted to the society. Most Courts have some machinery or other by which the different facts put in evidence by the parties, when it is not viva voce evidence, can be collected together and laid before the Court, whether it is, as in the Court of Chancery, in the shape of a report by a Master of Chancery, or, as in the case of some foreign Courts, by a reporter selected by the Judges.

Accordingly, that having been done, the Society of Inspectors met together, and having before them not only the statement compiled by two of their body, but all the facts from which that statement was collected—having that statement to assist them by its brevity and by directing their attention to those facts, they came to this conclusion. And I do not see the slightest ground for supposing that this society has shewn itself in the slightest degree incompetent for this work, by taking as their basis on which to enter upon the discussion the abstract or abridgement of the facts of the case which had been prepared by two of their body. I thought it due, in justice to those gentlemen who founded this body, and who seem to have acquired the confidence of the public, to say that I can see no reason whatever (except for the great respect I have for the learned Judge who made some observations on the subject in the Court below) for holding them to be incompetent to perform those functions.

It seems to be made out that by the law of Scotland an agreement ab ante to refer contingent and possible disputes to a person not named but to be named by some one afterwards is not such an agreement which the parties can be held

No. 13.

June 24, 1875.
Bremner v. Elder.

to, when a dispute has actually arisen and the one party wishes to avail himself of it against the will of the other. Either party is at liberty to resile from such an engagement. Perhaps some of the cases seem to point to something further, namely, the question whether, when the dispute which was contemplated as possible has arisen, you can enforce an engagement to refer it to a person who is to be named by a third person who is not expressly and accurately ascertained. There seems to have been the same or a similar observation (I think the authority only goes to the case of future disputes in that case), as to the force of a contract to refer disputes to a body like a Chamber of Commerce, which in some respects might be said to bear a resemblance to this body, the Society of Inspectors. But I listened in vain to find the authority of any decision of the Courts in Scotland cited which would authorise this House in saying that when a dispute has arisen, and when a reference has been made to an ascertained body of men, and when the body to whom the reference was made has arrived at its decision or made its award, that award is not binding upon the parties who had so submitted their case to the tribunal they had chosen, merely because it is composed of a number of individuals instead of being composed of a single individual, and because some of the persons composing that body may from time to time be changed.

No authority of that kind has been produced, and I apprehend, my Lords, that in this respect the decision of the body to whom the reference was made in this case was the decision of a body perfectly competent to decide the question between the parties. I think they have decided the question between the parties, and I think that decision not being quarrelled with for any irregularity other than the simple fact of its being given by such a body as I have described, must now be held to be a binding decision upon all the parties. The only objection that was raised to the mode of conducting the proceedings was with regard to the reference to these two gentlemen, instead of the whole matter being taken in hand by the body who were to deliberate and act upon it. I have already dealt with that part of the case.

With reference to what the parish did after the decision was arrived at, I think there can be no doubt whatever that they were fully informed of the award having been made. Being informed of it, they made a series of payments, commencing with what is a considerable sum to be levied upon a parish—a payment of £85—and they knowingly made those payments as in discharge of the debt which had been found due from them by the arbiters.

Therefore, my Lords, I think that your Lordships cannot have the slightest doubt about deciding this case against the appellants.

LORD O'HAGAN.—My Lords, I am of the same opinion with my noble friends. The first question is this, had the appellant, the inspector of the poor of Rathven, power to make the reference the result of which has been the subject of this tardy litigation? I think it plain that he had, not only from the terms of the resolutions of the 3d of May 1859 and the 3d of January 1860, but from the proceedings of the board of Rathven which affirmed and carried into effect the award of the Society of Inspectors. I think that equally by antecedent authority and subsequent ratification, the Rathven board are precluded from denying that Bremner acted for them at their instance, and so as to bind them effectually.

With regard to the reference itself, but for those subsequent proceedings, I should, perhaps, under other circumstances, have desired some opportunity of considering the peculiar views of the law of Scotland which have been presented at the bar as to the distinction between a reference and a "contract to abide," and which appeared somewhat to conflict with those ordinarily adopted and habitually acted on in England and Ireland. But believing, from the letter addressed by the superintendent of the Elgin asylum to the chairman of the Rathven board on the 23d of January 1874, the accounts with which the members of the board of Rathven must have been familiar, their payment of the arrears and their continuous maintenance of the lunatic for such a period of time and from the clear, although, I think, a little reluctant evidence of the appellant himself, that they perfectly understood their position, were fully informed as to the nature and result of the reference, and sanctioned it by a long course of deliberate action, I think that their conduct in any aspect of the law removes all difficulty in the case, and makes the decision of the Society of Inspectors which they so invoked, and to which they so submitted, conclusive upon them.

No. 13.

June 24, 1875.
Bremner v. Elder.

LORD SELBORNE.—My Lords, I do not think it necessary to add anything to what your Lordships have said as to the merits of this case, agreeing, as I do, with what has been said.

But with respect to the form of the order, I will just say a few words as to the terms of it, as it is very important that the judgments in these cases should be consistent with the manner in which the cases are pleaded by the parties on the record. I find that the pleading of the respondents—the parish of Elgin, is this: They adopt in substance the earlier articles of the condescendence of the Lunacy Board, including particularly the 5th article, in which it is expressly stated that the "parishes agreed to refer the question of liability to the decision of the Society of Inspectors of Poor for Scotland as arbiters in the matter," and that they decided it accordingly; and in their pleas in law they expressly say in No. 4, "The parish of Rathven having referred to arbitration the question of liability" "is bound by the decision in the arbitration;" and the 5th plea in law is to the same effect. Now, my Lords, if I were obliged to say that the facts as they appear, having regard to the pleadings, do not support these averments and pleas in law, I confess I should feel some considerable difficulty in falling back upon any tertium quid such as seems to be suggested by the peculiar phraseology of the interlocutor; but I do not feel any difficulty, having regard to the actual proceedings in the case, and the issues which the parties came into Court to try, in holding that we are in a position to found ourselves upon those pleas in law, and to treat them as well established.

I have referred to the manner in which the facts are pleaded on behalf of Elgin; on the other hand I find that in the condescendence on the part of Rathven, these points only are taken by way of defence:—Firstly, that they never agreed to refer to any arbiter at all; secondly, that there never was any joint submission or formal minute of reference ever entered into; and thirdly that the society is not a competent arbiter either in the terms of the authority which was given by the Rathven board, or in point of law. Beyond that there is no objection that I can discover, nor is there any statement that there was not a proper award or deliverance or finding, and that if these objections fail they have others. And their pleas in law are entirely to the same effect. They do take the objection, inter alia, that there was no proper submission to the Society of Inspectors, but they do not anywhere suggest that there was any objection on the ground of informality in the deliverance or award, if the other objections fail. With regard to the submission, there was a signed minute, and it appears to me a very reasonable inference to draw, that that signed minute, if produced, would be found to be a proper minute of reference. With regard to the authority of Bremner to refer, the point appears to be taken notice of by the Lord Justice-Clerk. Perhaps that may have been partly the ground for the peculiar phraseology of the interlocutor. But, my Lords, having regard to the facts to which my noble and learned friends have referred, seeing that the decision of the arbiters was accepted and acted upon and is not challenged on the record, I think your Lordships can have no difficulty in sustaining the pleas in law in the manner which has been proposed.

"IT is ordered and adjudged, by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, that the said interlocutor of the Lords of Session in Scotland, of the Second Division, of the 10th of July 1874, complained of in the said appeal, be, and the same is hereby varied, by omitting the special findings following, namely:—'Find that the Parochial Board of Rathven agreed with the Parochial Board of Elgin to abide by the opinion of the Society of Inspectors referred to in the record, as to the settlement and support of the pauper lunatic in question: Find, that an opinion of the said society on that matter having been expressed and intimated to the parties, the board of Rathven acquiesced in that opinion, and proceeded to implement their agreement by admitting their liability to pay, and by paying to the board of Elgin the amount of bygone board, which had been paid by the said Parochial Board of Elgin to the pursuers, amounting to £85, 16s. 2d., and further paid to the pursuers the board of the said pauper from March 1863 to December 1864: Find that implement and payment were thus made by the Parochial Board of Rathven in the full knowledge of the material facts of the cause, and find that in this way the board of Rathven took fully and finally upon themselves the support of the said pauper, and that they cannot now, in a question with the parish of Elgin, withdraw from the liability thus admitted and acted upon:' And it is further ordered, that the 4th and 5th pleas in law of the parish of Elgin be, and the same are, hereby allowed: And it is further ordered and adjudged, that, with this variation of the said interlocutor of the 10th of July 1874, that interlocutor, and the other interlocutors complained of in the said appeal, be, and the same are hereby affirmed: And it is further ordered, that the appellant do pay, or cause to be paid to the said respondents, the costs incurred in respect of the said appeal, the amount thereof to be certified by the Clerk of the Parliaments: And it is further ordered, that the cause be, and the same is hereby remitted back to the Court of Session in Scotland to do therein as shall be just and consistent with this variation and this judgment: And it is also further ordered, that unless the costs, certified as aforesaid, shall be paid to the parties entitled to the same within one calendar month from the date of the certificate thereof, the Court of Session in Scotland, or the Lord Ordinary officiating on the Bills during the vacation, shall issue such summary process or diligence for the recovery of such costs as shall be lawful and necessary."

HOLMES, ANTON, GREIG, & WHITE—A. MORISON, S.S.C.—MARTIN & LESLIE—H. & A. INGLIS, W.S.

No. 14.

May 4, 1875.
Muir v. Crawford.

GEORGE WALKER MUIR, Appellant (Defender).—Meadows White—E. Silvester.
ROBERT CRAWFORD, Respondent (Pursuer).—Nevay.

Bill—Discharge—Indorser—Cautioner—Pactum de non petendo.—The holder of a bill, after it had been dishonoured and duly protested, while he retained possession of the bill, granted a discharge to the acceptors "of all claims and demands competent" to him against them, "reserving entire my claims against any obligants, other than" the acceptors "presently bound to me along with" the acceptors. He thereafter sued the latest of three indorsers of the bill for the amount in the bill. Held (aff. judgment of Second Division) that the discharge did not extinguish the debt, but was merely an agreement not to sue the acceptors, and that the indorser must pay, his recourse against the acceptors not being prejudiced.

Ld. Chancellor (Cairns).
Ld. Chelmsford.
Ld. Hatherley.

(IN the Court of Session, Oct. 29, 1873, ante, vol. i. p. 91.)

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Second Division of the Court of Session.

The facts of the case are sufficiently narrated in the opinion of the Lord Chancellor.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords, when this case came before the Inner-House of the Court of Session, the record, which had been closed before the Lord Ordinary, was, on the application of the present appellant, opened for the purpose of allowing a new defence to be alleged, and the nature of that defence was this: The pursuer in the Court of Session sued upon a bill of exchange, of which he was the holder, and which he had discounted. He sued the defender in the Court of Session as one of the indorsers of that bill, and the new defence that he set up in the Inner-House was that after the bill of exchange had become due, and while it still remained unpaid in the hands of the pursuer, the pursuer (according to the words of the statement) "without communication with the defender, freed and released the acceptors of the bill of his whole claims against the acceptors on the bill, by discharge dated 28th May 1872, of which No. 21 of process is a copy, whereby he renounced and discharged any claim which might otherwise have been competent to him against the defender." The plea added with regard to that statement was this,—"The pursuer having discharged the acceptors of the said bill, and thereby renounced any claim which might otherwise have been competent to him against the defender, the defender is entitled to absolvitor."

The document which is there called the discharge of the acceptors was in this form. It is dated the 28th of May 1872, and it is signed "R. Crawford," the pursuer in the action,—"Received from Mrs Janet Chirnside Hood or M'Cubbin, executrix of the deceased David M'Cubbin, accountant in Glasgow, who was one of the liquidators of the Scottish Granite Co., Limited" (the acceptors of the bill) "the sum of £20 sterling in full of all claims and demands competent to me against the said Scottish Granite Co. Limited, or liquidators thereof, or the said David M'Cubbin, or Mrs Janet Chirnside Hood or M'Cubbin, as his executrix, all which are hereby for ever renounced and discharged, reserving entire my claims against any obligants other than the said Granite Co. presently bound to me along with said Granite Co."

That defence having been admitted to be pleaded by the Court of Session the main point, and, as it appears to me, the only point, which was urged before the Court of Session was the validity of that defence. The Court of Session decided that the defence was not a sufficient one to absolve the defender, and there is no doubt that one of the main points, if not the main point of the appeal before your Lordships, was whether the Court of Session were right in coming to that conclusion.

No. 14.

May 4, 1875.
Muir v. Crawford.

Upon that part of the case I have never entertained any doubt. The law upon the subject is perfectly clear. There is no doubt that by proper and apt instrument it is competent for the holder of a security of this kind to agree with the principal debtor not to enforce his remedies against the principal debtor; and, if he does that in an instrument, which at the same time reserves his rights against those who are liable in the second degree, there will be no discharge of those persons so liable. The test which has been applied to all these cases is this: Has that which has been done towards the principal debtor been a transaction of this character, that it will entitle the principal debtor, if he should be sued for contribution or indemnity by the surety, to come to the creditor and say,—"You have discharged me completely and entirely from the debt, but I am now sued by a person who was surety, and that is inconsistent with the discharge which I have received from you?" If, on looking at the discharge, you find that there is nothing inconsistent in it with a proceeding by the surety afterwards against the principal debtor, then the surety is not in any way discharged.

Now, my Lords, admitting fully that in the present case the acceptors of this bill of exchange were liable in the first degree, and that the indorser was liable only in the second degree and as surety, it appears to me quite clear that that which was done towards the acceptors was nothing more than this: it was a taking of £20 from the acceptors, not merely on account of the bill (in point of fact there is no notice whatever taken of the bill in the discharge), but on account of all claims and demands whatsoever against the Scottish Granite Company, the acceptors, or the liquidators of that company, or David M'Cubbin, or Mrs M'Cubbin, his executrix, and at the same time a reservation entirely of all claims against obligants other than the Granite Company bound to the pursuer along with the Granite Company. Therefore, if those persons who were co-obligants with the Granite Company should afterwards sue for indemnity, the production of this instrument would at once shew that there was nothing inconsistent in such proceedings with that which was done in this instrument, because the claims of the pursuer, Crawford, were reserved entire against the persons who were sureties. These principles have been decided not merely in the case of Owen v. Homan[1] in your Lordships' House, but in many cases which have followed subsequently, and it appears to me that the Court of Session were entirely right in the conclusion which they arrived at on this part of the case.

LORD CHELMSFORD concurred.

LORD HATHERLEY.—My Lords, I entirely agree with the opinion that has been delivered by my noble and learned friend on the woolsack.

I will make one single observation only upon the case which was cited at the bar as having been decided by myself formerly in the Court of Chancery.[2] Upon the question of the effect of a principal debtor being discharged upon the petition of a surety when the rights against the surety are reserved, I

[1] Owen v. Homan, 1853, 4 Clark's House of Lord's Cases, 997.
[2] Webb v. Hewitt, June 10, 1857, 3 Kay and Johnson, 438.

No. 14.

May 4, 1875.
Muir v. Crawford.

never entertained any doubt. On looking at the report of that case I see exactly what occurred there. The discharge there was not in the form in which it is here,—that is to say, taking part-payment and discharging the rest; but there was a purchase by the creditor of all the property of the principal debtor, and that property so acquired by the creditor was taken in discharge of the debt that was due to him; and though he said that there ought to have been in the deed that which there was not, namely, a clause reserving his rights against the surety, and that such a clause had been omitted by mistake, I held that, had it been there, the rule would not have been applicable to a case of that description, where it is impossible to say how much the debtor's estate was worth, or to say that if it exceeded or that it fell short of the amount of the debt in question. The creditor had taken it for what it was worth, and had taken it in satisfaction. Therefore, the questions which have been argued here could not possibly arise in such a case as that.

With regard to the judgment in the present case, I entirely concur in what has been proposed by my noble and learned friend on the woolsack.

CASE remitted to the Court of Session with this declaration:—It being admitted that the sum of £70 mentioned in the fourth head of the statement of facts of the appellant was paid on account of the bill of exchange for £200 as therein mentioned, declare that the interlocutors appealed from ought to be varied so far as they or any of them decern payment of the sum of £70.

CROSSE & SANDS—DAVID MILNE, S.S.C.—JAMES LAMOND—RICHARDSON & JOHNSTONE, W.S.

CASES

DECIDED IN

THE COURT OF JUSTICIARY

1874-75.

WILLIAM MACKENZIE, Complainer.—D.-F. Clark—Balfour.
JOHN LANG AND P. G. CUNNINGHAM, Respondents.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Asher.

No. 1.

Nov. 9, 1874.
Mackenzie v. Lang, &c.

Suspension—Competency—Statute 29 and 30 Vict. c. cclxxiii. (The Glasgow Police Act, 1866), secs. 131, 132.—Held that it was incompetent for the High Court of Justiciary to entertain a suspension of a sentence of the Police Court of Glasgow, sitting under the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, on grounds which amounted to defect of jurisdiction, and malice and oppression on the part of the Judge, in respect that in such cases the statute had provided an exclusive remedy by appeal to the Circuit Court.

Observed that if the proceedings had been beyond the statute the primary jurisdiction of the High Court would not have been excluded.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-Clerk.
Lord Neaves.
Lord Young.
Justiciary Clerk.

THIS was a suspension of a sentence pronounced by one of the Magistrates of the city of Glasgow, sitting under the Act 29 and 30 Vict. c. 273 (The Glasgow Police Act, 1866), against William Mackenzie.

The complainer set forth that on 11th September 1873 he was in the employment of Messrs Miller and Bannerman, wrights in Glasgow, as a journeyman joiner; that on the morning of that day, while employed at a house the joiner work of which Messrs Miller and Bannerman were executing under contract, his attention was called to two old women who were removing bits of wood from the premises; that he ordered them away, but did not force them to relinquish three small and useless pieces of wood which they had gathered; that on the afternoon of the same day he was given in charge to a policeman by Messrs Miller and Bannerman's foreman, on a charge of theft of the three pieces of wood above mentioned; that the officer on duty having made inquiry refused to entertain the charge; that on the following day, being Saturday, 12th September, when he went to receive his pay at Messrs Miller and Bannerman's office, he was again, on the same charge, given into the custody of a policeman, who was in waiting in plain clothes; that he was detained in the Central Police-office till the following Monday; that while so under detention he was visited by a detective named Jeffrey, who strongly urged him to plead guilty to the charge, in the sure expectation that he would be dismissed with a mere admonition; that on Monday the 14th September he was brought up before the Central Police Court of Glasgow, in which Bailie Bannerman was sitting, and a charge of theft of the wood was preferred against him; that while intending to plead guilty to not

No. 1.

Nov. 9, 1874. Mackenzie v. Lang, &c.

having prevented the women above mentioned from taking away the wood, his plea, owing to an impediment in his speech, was interpreted as one of guilty of the theft; that in the confusion and excitement of the moment he signed the plea without well knowing what he did; that he was at once sentenced by Bailie Bannerman to thirty days' imprisonment; and that he was immediately thereafter imprisoned, but liberated on 22d September, at the solicitation of his fellow-workmen, after having suffered eight days' imprisonment.

In support of his suspension the complainer contended that the proceedings taken against him and the sentence pronounced were illegal and incompetent, as also malicious, oppressive, and corrupt, inasmuch as Bailie Bannerman, who tried the case, was for many years the sole partner of the firm of Miller and Bannerman, and at the date of the prosecution was a sleeping partner, and retained a large pecuniary interest in the firm, of which his son was then an active partner; and further, that Bailie Bannerman had directed and instigated the prosecution which was afterwards brought before himself.

An appeal from a sentence of the Glasgow Police Court lies within fourteen days from its date to the Court of Justiciary "at the next Circuit Court to be held at Glasgow, in the manner and under the rules, limitations, and conditions contained" in the Act 20 Geo II. c. 43. This Act provides by sec. 34 that such appeal shall be served on the respondent fifteen days at least before the sitting of the Court.*

The conviction against the complainer was obtained on 14th September. The days for appealing to the Circuit Court accordingly expired on the 28th September, and the next Circuit Court sat at Glasgow on 6th October. The complainer did not take an appeal to the Circuit Court, but instead of doing so brought this suspension before the High Court of Justiciary.

The respondents objected to the competency of bringing the case by suspension to the High Court, and contended that appeal to the Circuit Court of Justiciary was the only competent mode of review under the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, 29 and 30 Vict. c. cclxxiii., secs. 131 and 132.[1]

Argued for the complainer;—Fourteen days being allowed for appeal, and fifteen thereafter being required for service, there was no time in the present case to appeal to the Circuit Court, which sat only twenty-two

* 29 and 30 Vict. c. cclxxiii, provides, sec. 131,—"No warrant granted by the Magistrate, or citation made in pursuance of the provisions of this Act, and no charge or complaint, and no proceeding or trial before the Magistrate, and no order or sentence of the Magistrate thereon, or the extract thereof, shall be quashed or vacated for any misnomer or informality, or be subject to suspension, reduction, advocation, or appeal, or any other form of review or stay of execution, unless in manner and on some one or more of the grounds hereinafter mentioned." Sec. 132,—"Any person who feels aggrieved by any order or sentence of the Magistrate may, within fourteen days after its date, appeal to the Court of Justiciary at the next Circuit Court to be held at Glasgow in the manner and under the rules, limitations, and conditions contained in an Act passed in the 20th year of the reign of his Majesty King George the Second, chapter 43, 'for taking away and abolishing heritable jurisdictions in Scotland,' on the ground of corruption, malice, or oppression on the part of Magistrate, wilful deviations in point of form from the statutory enactments, incompetency, or defect of jurisdiction, but on no other ground."

The Act 20 Geo. II. c. 43 sec. 34, provides for taking and serving appeals to the Circuit Court of Justiciary, and that "such service shall be sufficient summons to oblige the respondents to attend and answer at the next Circuit Court which shall happen to be held fifteen days at least after such service." . . .

[1] Walker v. Lang, Nov. 25, 1867, 5 Irvine, 506, 40 Scot. Jur. 89; De Belmont v. Lang, June 28, 1871, 2 Couper, 95, 43 Scot. Jur. 522.

No. 1.

Nov. 9, 1874. Mackenzie v. Lang, &c.

days after the conviction. Even admitting that the statute provided the Circuit Court as the ordinary tribunal of appeal, in this particular case it was not possible to go there, and resort to the High Court was necessary, and therefore competent.

But apart from this, a distinction must be drawn between cases where review, properly so called, was required, and those in which it was sought to quash a sentence without reviewing it. Admitting that cases of the former kind must be taken exclusively before the Circuit Court, the High Court of Justiciary still retained a cumulative jurisdiction in all cases of the latter kind. The present being emphatically a case where a sentence was sought to be quashed simpliciter might therefore be competently brought before the High Court.[1]

LORD NEAVES.—This is a case of some importance, but when examined it is not attended with any great difficulty. The position of matters is this,—the nature of the review sought in this Court, and the grounds upon which it is sought, are such, prima facie, as would have been competent had the case been brought before the Circuit Court of Justiciary. But instead of going there the complainer has chosen to come here. Now, where the multiplicity of cases coming within the provisions of an Act, such as the Glasgow Police Act of 1866, is so endless, it is most desirable that the review open to parties who may feel themselves aggrieved should be simplified and reduced to a definite mode of proceeding, and this the Legislature has recognised in sections 131 and 132 of the statute, by providing a manner in which, and certain grounds upon which, such review shall be competent. And looking at these provisions I have great doubts whether it was intended to give a cumulative jurisdiction to this Court as well as to the Circuit Court of Justiciary. There is a jurisdiction created in the Circuit Court on various grounds, among which the grounds here pleaded are included. If there is no obstacle otherwise the Circuit Court is the natural and legitimate place of resort, and the inference is that it was not intended to give an alternative and optional method of review in this Court. There may be cases,—I do not say there are,—in which the Circuit Court could not interfere, and in which, therefore, recourse would have to be to this Court. But as a general rule, where a power of review is given under a statute to a particular Court, it is to be presumed that where that power can be competently exercised all other review is excluded.

The first ground stated for bringing the case to this Court is that the complainer having fourteen days allowed to him by statute within which to deliberate whether to seek review or not, and being required to give fifteen days' notice of his appeal to the opposite party after he had determined upon it, there was not that length of time, twenty-nine days in all, intervening between the date of the sentence (14th September) and the meeting of the next Glasgow Circuit Court (6th October). It is contended that the complainer was entitled to delay making up his mind whether or not he should appeal, even although that delay

[1] Duffy v. Lang, March 5, 1869, 1 Couper, 238; Graham v. Mackay, Feb. 25, 1845, 7 D. 515, 17 Scot. Jur. 240; M'Phail v. Campbell, March 18, 1861, 4 Irv. 18, 33 Scot. Jur. 383; Gray v. M'Gill, Feb. 27, 1858, 3 Irv. 29, 30 Scot. Jur. 511; Erak. 1, 2, 26; Sheill v. Mossman, Nov. 7, 1871, 10 Macph. 58, 44 Scot. Jur. 46; Manson v. Smith, Feb. 8, 1871, 9 Macph. 492, 43 Scot. Jur. 261; M'Beth v. Innes, Feb. 8, 1873, 11 Macph. 404, 45 Scot. Jur. 270.

No. 1.

Nov. 9, 1874.
Mackenzie v. Lang, &c.

might render it impossible for him to comply with the other statutory requirements as to notice. But that is not a plea that comes very well from the mouth of the present complainer, who comes here alleging that he has met with such flagrant injustice and been misrepresented and ill-used at every step, and yet takes fourteen days to make up his mind to complain. He could have made up his mind, and he ought to have made up his mind in time to enable him to take the necessary steps to comply with the other requisites of the statute. I think, therefore, that we ought to disregard this first plea. But, further, when we come to look at the grounds upon which review by this Court is sought, we find that they are not such as would justify our interference. What might be the case where there never has been a process at all, where there is no complaint signed by a proper officer authorised by a proper prosecutor, and brought before a proper magistrate, or at least before a person having an apparent jurisdiction—where, in fact, a mere farce is enacted—I need not stop to inquire. That is not the case here. The prosecution is raised by the proper prosecutor, and brought before a Judge competent to entertain it—at least speaking generally—for there are some special objections to the jurisdiction, to which I shall immediately allude. The complainer, it seems, appeared, and, without stating any preliminary objections, deliberately pleaded guilty, in the expectation, as he says, of getting an advantage by that means. He says he meant to plead guilty to something else, but from an impediment in his speech was understood to plead guilty to the theft, and that that was a mistake. But the plea was written out upon the complaint and signed by him. He might have read it, for I presume he could read and write. At any rate he signed this plea of guilty, and must now be held to have done so deliberately.

But, further, it is said that the prosecution was "instigated" by the Judge. Instigation is a very vague word, and I cannot understand that it is instigation in an evil sense for one public official to suggest to another public official that a case of this kind requires to be looked into. That is not instigation. We are not to assume that the public prosecutor, a man of known character, weight, and integrity, was obliged to do everything which might be suggested to him, but that he brought the action in a deliberate and regular manner. Instigation as pleaded is mere vituperation, a thing that has no definite meaning at all. Then it is said that the suspender was wrongously apprehended. But I do not think that it is for him to state such an objection now. He is not a pupil requiring the protection of the Court, but a grown man in communication with a member of his own family—his wife—and he could have obtained advice if he had wanted it. But he did not apply for it, and then without any objection as to the mode in which he was brought before the Police Court he pleaded guilty. It is said that a police-officer volunteered a piece of advice, but that is no ground for interference. If the Judge could have been connected with the persuading of the man to plead guilty it might have been more serious, but it is not alleged that the magistrate who tried the case did this. The officer gave the prisoner a piece of advice, a thing which he had no right to do, but a policeman saying a thing of that kind will not vitiate a sentence.

Lastly, it is said that a man cannot be judge in his own cause, and that the judge here tried the suspender for the theft of his own wood. Now, it is quite certain that a man cannot be Judge in a civil suit involving pecuniary interests to himself. It is not, indeed, so clear that he cannot be a Judge if he happens to be connected with a company, joint-stock or otherwise, whose interests are involved in the matter at issue. But I know of no authority for saying that a Judge cannot competently sit in a criminal case because the alleged crime is an offence in some way against his own rights. All that can be said is that it is most indecorous that he should do so, and I cannot therefore entertain this ground of suspension. On all these grounds, therefore,—the incompetency of coming to this Court, the nature of the objections stated, the absence of objection made at the trial, and the plea of guilty,—I think we are bound to refuse the suspension.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion, and concur in every word which has fallen from your Lordship. But, at the same time, I would prefer to put the judgment of the Court on the preliminary question of jurisdiction.

The suspender complains of a sentence pronounced against him by a Police Magistrate of the city of Glasgow, sitting under the Act 29 and 30 Vict. c. cclxxiii. Now, it is quite clear that the instance was regular, for it was the instance of the Procurator-fiscal, who by section 115 of the statute has title and is bound to prosecute in all cases before the Court. It is further clear that the complaint was relevant, and subject to certain possible exceptions to be afterwards mentioned the jurisdiction of the Court is not questioned. The suspender pleaded guilty and signed his confession, and sentence was thereupon pronounced with all apparent regularity. What the defender now says is, that Bailie Bannerman, though a judge competent to sit in the Court, ought to have declined himself in this particular case, because, as alleged, he was a partner of the firm from whom the wood in question was charged to have been stolen; and farther, that he was disqualified from sitting in judgment in this particular case because he had directed the prosecution to be instituted.

I put it to the suspender's counsel within what category he brought his grounds of complaint. His reply was that they fell under these two,—1. Defect of jurisdiction; and 2. Malice and oppression on the part of the judge. These are, I think, the only categories under which the grounds of complaint above stated can come. But when I look at the Act of Parliament I find that it contemplates the possibility of parties being dissatisfied with the judgments of the Police Court on these very grounds, and that accordingly it provides a tribunal before which those so dissatisfied may obtain redress, and says in most distinct and emphatic terms that it shall be incompetent to resort to any other. Now, that tribunal is not the High Court, but the Circuit Court of Justiciary. But then it is argued that there is a distinction between reviewing a judgment and quashing it as funditus null and void. There may be cases in which such a distinction can be drawn. But I see no reason for drawing any such here, except it be that, review on the merits being excluded, every case of review must be in order to quash the judgment as funditus null. But in that sense of the term "review" the power of review is conferred exclusively upon the Circuit Court of Justiciary, and the question is why did the complainer not go there. He has given no satisfactory reason.

Being therefore of opinion that a proper tribunal of review is constituted by the statute, of which the complainer has failed to take advantage, and that the jurisdiction of this Court is excluded, I can have no doubt that this suspension must be refused.

But I would add that I am not of opinion that the authority of this Court to interpose in order to prevent in any case the immediate execution of an alleged

No. 1.
Nov. 9, 1874.
Mackenzie v. Lang, &c.

oppressive sentence until the proper remedy can be taken is excluded. If, for instance, a complainer were to come here and say that he was suffering in the meantime in consequence of a sentence which was ex facie illegal and oppressive, and that he could not have it brought under the review of the proper Court until after the injury was inflicted, as in the case of a sentence of whipping or imprisonment, this Court might, if it saw fit in the circumstances, interpose and suspend the execution of the sentence upon such terms as it thought proper, but only to stay execution until it could be brought under review of the proper tribunal.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur substantially in the grounds which have been stated by your Lordships, and which I need not again go over. I shall only make one or two observations in order to prevent misapprehension.

Unquestionably the statute intended, upon the plainest possible grounds of public expediency, to exclude our jurisdiction in complaints against sentences pronounced under its provisions, where the complaint is founded on grounds on which an appeal is directed to be taken to the review of the Circuit Court. But before the excluding words of the 132d clause can apply there must be a magistrate and a prosecution and a sentence, to which the main part of the clause itself applies. If it appeared so clearly on the face of the proceedings that there could be no doubt about the fact that there was no magistrate, or no prosecution, or no sentence, then I think the case would be brought within a perfectly well known rule in our practice, which has been frequently the subject of judicial recognition, namely, that though it might have been perfectly competent to take the sentence to the review of the Circuit Court under the 132d section, and for the Circuit Court finding it was a mere nullity to suspend or quash it, yet that the primary jurisdiction of this Court to prevent such abuses was not excluded. I only make these observations in order to save the opinion I have on that matter. But I do not think that we have here alleged in any relevant form a case of that kind. The facts are simply these. There was an information, it is said, given by Bailie Bannerman, a magistrate, given quite competently and to a competent person, that a theft had been committed by the suspender. He was accordingly apprehended and duly prosecuted by the proper authority. He appeared before the informant, sitting in the exercise of his public functions as a magistrate, and he pleaded guilty and received sentence. All that not only appears on the face of the proceedings, but it is admitted on both sides. And now it is said that, because the magistrate had a certain interest,—which was the whole extent of the allegation,—in the trading company whose property was the subject of the theft, we are therefore to hold that there never was any prosecution or sentence at all, and that the whole proceedings are absolutely null. I cannot hold that. I think that the allegation falls entirely short of that category up to which the suspender endeavours to bring his case. Therefore I entirely concur in the result of your Lordships' decision.

THE COURT accordingly refused the suspension.

JOHN GALLETLY, S.S.C.—CAMPBELL & SMITH, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 2.
Nov. 9, 1874.
Lazenby v. M'Arthur.

JAMES LAZENBY, Complainer.—D.-F. Clark—Orr Paterson.
JAMES M'ARTHUR, Respondent.—Rutherfurd.

Suspension—Competency—Game Dealer's Certificate—Statutes 1 and 2 Will. IV., c. 32, sec. 27, and 23 and 24 Vict., c. 90, secs. 3 and 13, 19 and 20 Vict., c.

56, sec. 17.—Held that a prosecution for dealing in game without a licence was an Excise prosecution, and that suspension of a sentence pronounced under such prosecution was incompetent in the Court of Justiciary.

No. 2.
Nov. 9, 1874.
Lazenby v. M'Arthur.
High Court. Lord Justice-Clerk. Lord Neaves. Lord Young. Justiciary Clerk.

JAMES LAZENBY was convicted before two Justices of Peace for the county of Elgin on an information at the instance of James M'Arthur, an officer of Excise, of dealing in game without a licence, in contravention of the statutes thereanent. The conviction was affirmed by the Court of Quarter Sessions. Lazenby brought a suspension of the conviction in the High Court of Justiciary.

The respondent objected to the competency of the suspension, on the ground that the prosecution was an Excise prosecution,[1] and that review, which was formerly by writ of certiorari from the Court of Exchequer,[2] was now exclusively by note of appeal to the Lord Ordinary in Exchequer causes.[3]

The complainer contended, that as the information laid against him was not for a breach of the revenue laws, but for failure to obtain a certificate from the Justices, and as the penalty was appropriated[4] to the relief of the poors-rates, the prosecution could not be held an Excise prosecution, or the penalty an Excise penalty, and, therefore, recourse had properly been had to the High Court of Justiciary.[5]

THE COURT refused the suspension as incompetent, on the ground that the prosecution was an Excise prosecution, and that therefore the proper mode of review was by note of appeal to the Lord Ordinary in Exchequer causes.

KEEGAN & WELSH, S.S.C.—THE SOLICITOR OF INLAND REVENUE.—Agents.

THOMAS AND WILLIAM SANDYS AND MANDATARY, Pursuers and Appellants. —D.-F. Clark—Mair.
LOWDEN AND ROWE, Defenders and Respondents.—M'Kechnie.

No. 3.
Nov. 26, 1874.
Sandys v. Lowden and Rowe.

Sheriff—Appeal—Competency—Debts Recovery (Scotland) Act, 1867, 30 and 31 Vict. c. 96.—An action was brought under the Debts Recovery Act for a sum under £25, which the Sheriff dismissed as incompetent, in respect that the debt sued for did not fall under the Act. Held (dub. Lord Young) that an appeal to the Court of Justiciary was competent.

Sheriff—Debts Recovery (Scotland) Act, 1867—"Merchants Accounts"—Triennial Prescription.—Held that the expression "merchants accounts" in the Debts Recovery Act was not limited to such accounts as would fall under the triennial prescription.

Question, whether an account for goods to the value of £23 supplied by a wholesale dealer in England to another wholesale dealer in Scotland fell under the triennial prescription.

ON 20th July 1874 T. and W. Sandys, trimming manufacturers, London, and their mandatary, raised an action under the Debts Recovery (Scotland) Act, 1867, in the Sheriff-court at Edinburgh, against Lowden and Rowe, wholesale small-ware dealers, Edinburgh, for payment of £22, 13s. being the amount, less 15s. of returns, of two accounts for buttons

High Court. Lord Justice-Clerk. Lord Neaves. Lord Young. Justiciary Clerk.

[1] 1 and 2 Will. IV., c. 32, sec. 27; 23 and 24 Vict., c. 90, secs. 3 and 13.
[2] Paley on Convictions, 3d ed., 277–8; Young v. Townshend, Nov. 24, 1856, 2 Irv. 525, 29 Scot. Jur. 31.
[3] 19 and 20 Vict., c. 56, sec. 17.
[4] 1 and 2 Will. IV., c. 32, sec. 37.
[5] Macdonald v. Gordon, Nov. 3, 1868, 1 Couper, 105, 41 Scot. Jur. 48.

No. 3. and other small wares furnished by the pursuers to the defenders in course of trade.

Nov. 26, 1874. Sandys v. Lowden and Rowe.

The defenders entered appearance, and pleaded, inter alia, (1) that the action being one to recover an account for goods supplied by manufacturers in England to wholesale dealers in Scotland, it was not a merchant's account in the sense of the Debts Recovery Act, and that the action was incompetent under that Act, and fell to be dismissed.

The defence upon the merits was that certain of the buttons were disconform to order, and had been returned by the defenders, and that after deducting the price of these buttons the balance due by the defenders was reduced to £8, 10s. 9d. which they were willing to pay.

On 9th October 1874 the Sheriff (Davidson) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Having heard parties' procurators on the competency of this action under the 30 and 31 Vict. c. 96, sustains the first plea of the defenders, and finds the action incompetent: Therefore dismisses the same: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses; fixes the same at £2, and decerns."*

The pursuers appealed to the High Court of Justiciary.

Argued for the appellants;—1. The appeal was competent. Refusal on the part of the Sheriff to exercise a jurisdiction which belonged to him was still a ground of appeal to the Circuit Court of Justiciary where there were circuits, and to the High Court where there were no circuits,

* "NOTE.—This is an action for the price of goods said to have been furnished by one firm of wholesale manufacturers in London and Birmingham to another firm of wholesale small-ware merchants and manufacturers in Edinburgh. The amount sued for is not great (only £23, 8s. with a deduction of 15s.), but the quantity of the same kinds of articles indicating the small individual value of each article is considerable. It is plainly a transaction or rather two transactions between two dealers in the way and for the purposes of their respective trades. It is apprehended that the mere amount of the debt claimed, or the value of the goods sold, and in that view the comparative smallness of the transactions, is not a matter of any importance. The point is, what is the character of the debt, and is it one of those which can be recovered under the second section of the Debts Recovery Act, 1867?

"If the question were whether the Triennial Prescription Act of 1579 were applicable to this debt, it is thought that it would be held to be inapplicable, and that this is not a merchant's compt,—a shopkeeper's account,—in the meaning of that Act. These were proper mercantile transactions,—the furnishing of certain goods by the manufacturers in England to other merchants in Scotland for the purposes of their business, and the result of the decision is that such mercantile transactions do not fall under the Act of 1579.

"If this be so, then the question is, Are the pursuers entitled to sue under the Act of 1867? The Sheriff does not doubt that the intention of the second section of this Act was to make competent under it such actions of debt (of the value prescribed) as are affected by the Act of 1579, and no other. It indeed leaves out the provision 'that are not founded upon written obligations.' But that is a difference which does not affect the matter at present under consideration. With the exception of this difference, the phraseology as to the subjects of the two Acts is identical, and is such phraseology as would not have been adopted in the year 1867, except for the purpose of indicating that the debts to be sued for were to be of the same kind. No doubt the word 'merchant' has now a different, or at least a more extended signification from what it had in 1579. But adopting other expressions which would not have been used in the modern Act, except for the purpose of identifying it with the old one, the Act of 1867 must be held as limiting merchants' accounts pursuable under its second section in the same way as under 1579. It is to be regretted that this Act did not expressly refer to the Act 1579."

No. 3.

Nov. 26, 1874.
Sandys v. Lowden and Rowe.

in causes not exceeding the value of £25, and that notwithstanding the exclusion of review contained in the Sheriff-court Act, 1853, and the Debts Recovery Act, 1867.[1]

2. (Upon the merits.) There were two questions in the present case,—first, whether the triennial prescription applied to this debt, and secondly whether the class of debts embraced in the Act of 1579 were the same as those embraced in the Act of 1867. If the second question was answered in the negative it was unnecessary to go into the first question. The object and character of the two Acts were widely different. The Act of 1579 was one limiting existing rights, and it had therefore received a strict construction. The Act of 1867 was an enabling Act, providing a more perfect remedy for the recovery of debts, and must therefore receive a liberal construction. The Act of 1579 applied to all debts, however large, that fell within its category. The Act of 1867 was limited to debts under £50, and it was not qualified by the expression "that are not founded on written obligations," which occurred in the Act of 1579. It was not conceivable that the Act of 1867 was not intended to apply to the case of one wholesale dealer selling articles to another wholesale dealer to an extent which relatively must be considered a small amount. It would entirely defeat the object of the Act if a preliminary inquiry was necessary in each case as to whether the person who sued was a shopkeeper or a merchant.

The respondents argued;—The appeal was incompetent. In a question not involving oppression or excess of jurisdiction the Sheriff's judgment was conclusive in causes not exceeding £25 in value. If the cause did not fall under the Debts Recovery Act there was no ground of appeal. If the cause did fall under that Act the Sheriff had committed an error in law, but the cause not exceeding the value of £25 his judgment was final.[2] If review was competent, suspension in this Court, and not appeal, was the proper form.

2. (Upon the merits.) The class of debts which could be sued for under the "Debts Recovery Act" were "house maills, men's ordinaries, servants' fees, merchants accounts, and other the like debts." The only purpose for which these old Scotch words could have been used by the Imperial Parliament in 1867 was to point out a certain class of debts to which a well known short prescription applied. It was reasonable that, as the Legislature had abridged the time within which such debts could be proved in the ordinary way, it should give exceptional facilities for their speedy recovery. It was well known that in the Scotch language of the sixteenth century the word "merchant" meant "shopkeeper," as it did still in popular language, and the triennial prescription introduced by the Act 1579 had been held not to apply to proper mercantile transactions between wholesale dealers, or between manufacturer and merchant.[3] It was true that the account in the present case was not large, but the character of an account did not depend on its pecuniary amount. It was a proper mercantile transaction between wholesale dealers, not falling under the triennial prescription, and therefore excluded from the operation of the Debts Recovery Act.

LORD NEAVES.—Upon the point of competency I have no doubt. Refusal on [1] 54 Geo. III. c. 67, sec. 5, extending 20 Geo. II. c. 43, sec. 34; 16 and 17 Vict. c. 80, sec. 22; 30 and 31 Vict. c. 96, secs. 12 and 17; Dick v. Great North of Scotland Railway Company, Oct. 8, 1860, 33 Scot. Jur. 2, 3 Irv. 616; Steuart v. M'Gregor and Sons, Sept. 23, 1868, 40 Scot. Jur. 654, 2 Couper, 92.

[2] Debts Recovery (Scotland) Act, 1867, 30 and 31 Vict. c. 96, secs. 12 and 17.

[3] Laing and Irving v. Anderson, Nov. 10, 1871, 10 Macph. 74, 44 Scot. Jur. 53.

No. 3.

Nov. 26, 1874.
Sandys v. Lowden and Rowe.

the part of the Sheriff to apply an Act where it ought to be applied is a sufficient ground for the interference of this Court; and the respondents cannot found upon the exclusion of review contained in a statute which the Sheriff has refused to apply.

The question raised upon the merits of the appeal is not free from difficulty. I think it the safer construction of the Debts Recovery Act to read it without reference to the Act 1579, or at least to hold that the latter Act is not to be taxative of the former, or to control its meaning. The Debts Recovery Act is a statute of the Imperial Parliament, and its object is to provide means for the easy recovery of small debts. The Act begins by referring to two other Acts, the Small-debt Act, 1837, and the Sheriff-court Act, 1853, neither of which is limited by the Act of 1579. And it proceeds:—"Whereas it is expedient to make farther provision to facilitate the recovery of certain debts in the Sheriff-courts of Scotland." If it had been meant to refer to certain debts already defined by an old statute, it would have been natural to say so. No reference is made in the statute of 1867 to the old Act, and although the mere words used to describe the debts are substantially identical in both statutes, the Act of 1867 does not anywhere say that they are to be treated as the same.

Some of the language certainly appears to be provincial, or, as I should rather say, peculiar to Scotland. But the words "merchants accounts" are not. I think it is safer in construing an imperial Act, unless the contrary is expressed, to read words in their present and prevalent meaning, in so far as they have such a meaning. It is different with words unintelligible to English ears. But the words "merchants' accounts" are perfectly intelligible as English words, though in a wider sense than what is generally held to be their sense in the Scotch Act of 1579. Are we to go back upon words which are not technical, and to go into an antiquarian discussion as to their meaning three hundred years ago, when the words are still used in ordinary life?

Seeing that the object of the Act is favourable, viz., to secure despatch in the recovery of debts of small amount, we must construe it liberally. And seeing how inconvenient or impossible in such cases it would be to go through the preliminary inquiry that would be necessary to ascertain whether any particular transaction fell under the Act of 1579, I am of opinion that this account might competently be sued for under the Debts Recovery Act. The limitation to debts under £50 is a sufficient safeguard against any abuse of the facilities provided by that Act.

I do not say whether the Act 1579 would exclude this debt. It is not necessary to decide that question.

Lord Young.—I agree. I have no doubt about the case, except only the jurisdiction of this Court. The subject-matter is a civil action for the price of goods sold and delivered. There is no question as to the jurisdiction of the Sheriff-court. The only question is in regard to the form of procedure in that Court of undoubtedly competent jurisdiction. The action is brought before the Sheriff-court in the summary form allowed by the "Debts Recovery (Scotland) Act, 1867," in cases between £12 and £50 value; and the objection was not to the jurisdiction of the Sheriff-court, but rather of that character with which we used to be familiar in cases where it was objected that the case was not one for summary procedure, but ought to have been the subject of an ordinary action. I had a doubt whether the High Court of Justiciary was the proper Court to resort to in a case where the subject-matter was civil; and I confess that—although, assuming the jurisdiction, I was of opinion that the form of appeal is a very suitable and convenient one,—but for the concession which counsel for the respondent has made in answer to a question put to him by me, admitting that this is the proper tribunal, assuming that any remedy is competent, I should have had great doubt upon the point. It was conceded that if the Sheriff improperly refused to exercise his jurisdiction, there would be a remedy in this Court, although it was contended that suspension, and not appeal, was the proper form; and, after that concession, I did not desire to hear further argument upon that point. On the assumption that this is the proper Court, I am clearly of opinion that an error has been committed by the Sheriff, that the case is one altogether suitable for the summary form of procedure of the Act of 1867, which is, I think, applicable. Otherwise I should have had some doubt whether the Court of Justiciary was the proper Court for giving redress against the Sheriff in a civil cause for refusing to apply a certain procedure.

No. 3.
Nov. 26, 1874.
Sandys v. Lowden and Rowe.

One cannot look to the action before the Sheriff without being compelled to withhold all sympathy from the respondents. It would be difficult to conceive a case more suitable for the exercise of the summary jurisdiction of the Sheriff, and I cannot understand how any party reasonably well advised could object to such a course being pursued. The respondents had, in the course of their trade, sent two orders for buttons and other such small wares to the appellants; the first, of the amount of £7, 15s. 9d.; and the second, of the amount of £15, 12s. 3d.—£23, 8s. in all. The respondents admitted receiving the articles, but alleged that some of them were disconform to order, and that these being returned, the account fell to be reduced in its amount to £8, 18s. 9d. The dispute is, therefore, about £14, and turns upon whether the respondents were entitled to reject so many buttons as more or less disconform to order. There was a long argument in the inferior Court as to whether certain restrictions which have generally been put upon the words of the Act of 1579 were also applicable to the same expressions used in the Act of 1867. The Sheriff has decided upon what appeared to him the true meaning of the statute, and we have the case now brought before the Court of Justiciary, all about these fancy buttons, on the question whether the Sheriff is to use one form of procedure or another in deciding the controversy regarding them.

I have no doubt that the Act of 1867 does apply to such a debt as this in its words, sense, and spirit. It is not necessary to determine whether or not the Act of 1579 would also apply, but I have no hesitation in saying that the case of Laing and Irvine v. Anderson is not in point. And being prepared to concur in the opinions of the Judges in that case, I express my opinion the more readily that the ratio of that judgment does not apply to accounts of this kind for small wares sold by a person who manufactures them to a dealer in the same articles. I am not doubtful that the Act of 1579 is applicable to such accounts, although it is not applicable to such transactions as formed the subject of litigation in the case of Laing and Irvine v. Anderson. It is certainly not true that the Act 1579 applies only to the accounts of merchants in the sense of people who keep retail shops. It is familiarly applied to the accounts of professional men—writers, engineers, and a variety of others whose debts are regarded as like those of merchants, although assuredly not so like as those of a button-maker, who supplies shopkeepers and all others who chose to buy from him. For these reasons I concur with Lord Neaves, and am of opinion that the appeal should be sustained, and the case sent back to be dealt with by the Sheriff in what I conceive to be the proper mode of dealing with it, viz., the summary mode provided by the Act of 1867.

No. 3.

Nov. 26, 1874.
Sandys v. Lowden and Rowe.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—On the question of the competency of the appeal I have no doubt. The contention that the Sheriff is conclusive as to the limits of his own jurisdiction is untenable. In regard to the form of review, appeal is an old and well-recognised mode of obtaining redress in this Court.

In regard to the question whether this account would fall under the triennial prescription I give no opinion, for it appears to me that the question whether the Debts Recovery Act is limited in its range to debts which would fall under the triennial prescription is preliminary to the other. If it is not so limited we need not go further.

The words of the Debts Recovery Act contain no limitation on the ordinary meaning of the term "merchants accounts." So far from importing that limited meaning which has been generally put upon the words, as they occur in the Act 1579, the Debts Recovery Act, while it recites two modern Acts in its preamble, does not refer to the Act 1579 at all. If it had been intended to put that limited meaning on the words, the Legislature could very easily have made that clear. Terms were chosen which had received construction in the Courts of Scotland in relation to that old statute, but I do not think that it was intended to use "merchants accounts" in any other than their ordinary meaning at the present day.

This is a very suitable case for the Sheriff's summary jurisdiction, and I see no reason why that jurisdiction should be excluded, unless it is expressly excluded by the statute. I am glad that we have come to this result, and that we are not called upon to determine the limits of the triennial prescription as applicable to dealings, whether of large or small pecuniary amount, between persons carrying on a wholesale business. This would open up a wide field. I am of opinion that the Debts Recovery Act is not limited in its terms to those debts which would fall under the triennial prescription, and that we should therefore sustain the appeal, and remit to the Sheriff to proceed with the cause.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Sustain the appeal: Recall the interlocutor appealed from, and remit to the Sheriff to proceed in the action as accords: Find the appellants entitled to the expenses of this appeal, which modify to five guineas, for which, and one guinea as the dues of extract, decern, reserving to the Sheriff to deal with the expenses in the Sheriff-court when he finally disposes of the case."

DANIEL TURNER, S.L.—GEORGE M. WOOD, S.L.—Agents.

No. 4.

Dec. 11, 1874.
Muckersie v. M'Dougall.

HELEN MITCHELL or MUCKERSIE, Complainer.—Omond.
JOHN M'DOUGALL, Respondent.—J. C. Smith.

Public-Houses Acts, 9 Geo. IV. c. 58, sec. 25, and 25 and 26 Vict. c. 35, sec. 26—Summary Procedure Act, 1864, 27 and 28 Vict. c. 53—Appeal to Quarter Sessions.—An appeal on the merits is allowed to Quarter Sessions against convictions by the Justices in Petty Sessions under the Public-House Acts; but there is no provision in those Acts, or in the Summary Procedure Act, for recording the evidence led before the Justices in Petty Sessions, but only for recording the names of the witnesses examined. Held that the Justices in Quarter Sessions are bound to rehear the evidence led before the Court below.

No. 4.

Dec. 11, 1874.
Muckersie v. M'Dougall.

Observed (per Lord Young) that a conviction before the Justices in Petty Sessions must be assumed to be valid until the contrary is proved, and that it is the duty of an appellant to adduce before the Quarter Sessions the whole evidence previously led both for the prosecution and defence.

Suspension—Competency—Statute 25 and 26 Vict. c. 35 (Public-House Acts Amendment Act, 1862), secs. 33 and 34.—The Public-Houses Acts Amendment Act, 1862, secs. 33 and 34, allows an appeal from Quarter Sessions to the Circuit Court of Justiciary "on the ground of corruption or malice and oppression on the part" of the Justices, "or on such deviation in point of form from the statutory enactments as the Court shall think have prevented substantial justice from having been done," and excludes any other form and ground of review. Where the Quarter Sessions refused, in an appeal, to rehear the evidence led before the Justices in Petty Sessions, held that they had declined to exercise their jurisdiction, that the jurisdiction of the High Court of Justiciary was not excluded by the above section of the statute, and suspension sustained.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-Clerk.
Lord Neaves.
Lord Young.
Justiciary Clerk.

MRS MUCKERSIE, hotel-keeper, Melrose, was, on 2d October 1874, tried before the Justices in Petty Sessions, at Melrose, at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal of the Justice of Peace Court of Roxburgh, on a complaint of breach of certificate under the Public-Houses Acts Amendment Act, 1862,[1] and the Acts therein recited. The Justices having heard the evidence, convicted the accused of the breach of certificate charged, and imposed a fine of £2.

The complainer appealed to the next meeting of the Quarter Sessions[2] held at Jedburgh on 27th October 1874. She then proposed to examine in support of the appeal the witnesses who had been examined before the Justices in Petty Sessions. It was objected for the respondent that "such a proceeding was incompetent, the proceedings having taken place under the provisions of the Summary Procedure Act, which provides that no record of the evidence shall be necessary, and the special Act containing no provision on that head."

The Court of Quarter Sessions sustained this objection, and refused to allow the examination of witnesses, and accordingly dismissed the appeal and sustained the judgment appealed against.

On 3d November 1874 the complainer intimated to the respondent an appeal against this judgment of the Quarter Sessions to the next Circuit Court of Justiciary.

Thereafter, without withdrawing the appeal, she raised this suspension in the High Court of Justiciary.

She pleaded;—(1) In the circumstances libelled it was incompetent for the Justices in Quarter Sessions to refuse to allow the examination of witnesses. The judgment ought therefore to be suspended. (2) The judgment now complained of is inept, null, and void, and ought to be suspended, in respect that it was ultra vires of the Justices in Quarter Sessions to refuse to hear the appeal by leading evidence de novo. (3) The complainer having been denied justice through the refusal of the said Justices to exercise their lawful jurisdiction it is competent for the High Court of Justiciary to remit to the said Justices to hear evidence and decide upon the merits of the case.

The respondent objected to the competency of the suspension, on the ground that a statutory mode of appeal had been provided to the Circuit Court of Justiciary,[3] and had been made the exclusive mode of

[1] 25 and 26 Vict. c. 35.

[2] 25 and 26 Vict. c. 35, sec. 26, and 9 Geo. IV. c. 58, sec. 25.

[3] 25 and 26 Vict. c. 35, Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862, enacts, sec. 33,—"It shall be competent to any person conceiving himself aggrieved by any warrant, sentence, &c. . . . . to bring the case by appeal

No. 4.

Dec. 11, 1874.
Muckersie v. M'Dougall.

appeal.[1] The respondent had rightly given notice of appeal to the next Circuit Court to be held at Jedburgh, and it was still open to her to go to that Court. To entertain a suspension in the meantime in the High Court of Justiciary was incompetent.[2]

Argued for the complainer;—It was not incompetent to suspend this sentence even though appeal had been intimated to the Circuit Court.[3] The reason of the complainer's coming to the High Court of Justiciary was that there were doubts of the competency of going to the Circuit Court.[4] The real objection to the judgment of the Justices in Quarter Sessions was that they refused to rehear the evidence proposed to be reled in order that they might be able to judge of the merits of the case. This was not therefore a complaint against a sentence on the ground of corruption, or malice, or oppression, or of deviation in point of form from the statutory enactments, which are the statutory grounds of appeal to the Circuit Court. It was a complaint that the Magistrates at Quarter Sessions had refused to exercise their jurisdiction, and where there was excess or defect of jurisdiction it was competent to come to the High Court of Justiciary for redress whatever statutory provision for appeal there might be.

On the merits of the suspension;—There was no provision in the statutes under which the prosecution proceeded for taking a note of the evidence.[5] The party intending to appeal was not bound to require that the evidence should be recorded. Farther the terms of the statutory enactments and the schedules annexed rendered it doubtful whether before the next Circuit Court of Justiciary, or, where there are no Circuit Courts, before the High Court of Justiciary at Edinburgh . . . . . Provided always that such appeal shall be competent only when founded on the ground of corruption or malice and oppression on the part of the Sheriff, Justice, or Justices of the Peace, or Magistrate, as the case may be, or on such deviations in point of form from the statutory enactments as the Court shall think have prevented substantial justice from having been done," &c.

---

[1] The same statute enacts, sec. 34,—"No warrant, sentence, order, decree, judgment, or decision made or given by any Quarter Sessions, Sheriff, Justice, or Justices of the Peace, or Magistrate in any cause, prosecution, or complaint, or in any other matter under the authority of the said recited Acts or of this Act, shall be subject to reduction, advocation, suspension, or appeal, or any other form of review or stay of execution on any ground, or for any reason whatever, other than by this Act provided."

[2] M'Phail v. Campbell, March 18, 1861, 4 Irv. 18, 33 Scot. Jur. 383; Mackenzie v. Lang and Cuningham, Nov. 9, 1874, supra, Just., p. 1.

[3] De Belmont v. Lang, June 28, 1871, 2 Coup. 95, 43 Scot. Jur. 522.

[4] Rhodes v. Ross, Sept. 23, 1870, 1 Coup. 469, 43 Scot. Jur. 36; Clarkson v. Muir, July 19, 1871, 2 Coup. 125, 43 Scot. Jur. 589.

[5] 25 and 26 Vict. c. 35, Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862, sec. 26,—"Every offence committed against the recited Acts and this Act, or any of them, may, except where inconsistent with the provisions and conditions of this Act, be tried and determined in a summary manner, without any written pleadings on record or notes of evidence . . . . . but in any prosecution under the recited Acts and this Act, or any of them, the complaint, and procedure following thereupon, shall be in the form, or as nearly as may be in the form, provided by schedule (D) to this Act annexed," &c.

27 and 28 Vict. c. 53, Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864, sec. 16,—"It shall not be necessary in any proceeding under the authority of this Act to record or to preserve a note of the evidence adduced, but the record shall set forth in the form of the schedule (1) to this Act annexed the respondent's plea, if any, the names of the witnesses, if any, examined upon oath or affirmation, with a note of any documentary evidence that may be put in."

No. 4.

Dec. 11, 1874.
Muckersie v. M'Dougall.

it would be competent for the Justices at Petty Sessions to record the evidence.[1]

Argued for the respondent;—There was nothing in the statute to prevent the complainer requiring the Justices at Petty Sessions to take a note of the evidence. On no other supposition was appeal to the Quarter Sessions possible on the merits, because there was nothing to warn the prosecutor that he must be prepared to relead his evidence before the Justices at Quarter Sessions. Till the case is called at Quarter Sessions there is nothing to disclose to the respondent the nature of the ground of appeal, and if the contention of the complainer in this case was admitted, it would necessitate the respondent in every appeal before Quarter Sessions being prepared with his witnesses in case they should be required. This was contrary both to practice and to common sense.[2]

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In this case we have a bill of suspension of a judgment of the Quarter Sessions of the county of Roxburgh, dismissing an appeal from the Petty Sessions, in a prosecution under the Public-Houses Acts. In such prosecutions there is provided by the statutes an appeal upon the merits from the Petty to the Quarter Sessions. But this particular appeal was dismissed on the ground that there was no record of the evidence adduced, though there was a record of the names of the witnesses examined, the proceedings having been taken under the Summary Procedure Act. The complainer proposed to lead the evidence over again, but the Quarter Sessions held that it was incompetent for them to rehear the evidence already taken, and they dismissed the appeal. The ground on which this suspension is brought is, that the Justices in Quarter Sessions in coming to this decision declined to exercise the jurisdiction conferred on them, and therefore refused to do justice to the complainer. It is objected by the respondent that the suspension is incompetent, because (1) review is excluded under the statute, except in certain specified cases, among which the present does not fall; and (2) where review is allowed, the Circuit Court is made the exclusive Court of review.

On the first point the case will not, I think, bear argument. It has been decided over and over again that if an inferior Court possessing jurisdiction under a statute either oversteps that jurisdiction or refuses to exercise it, however much review may be excluded or limited under the special statute, we, sitting in the High Court of Justiciary, have power to set matters right. I am also of opinion that the form of suspension is the proper and recognised form under which such questions should be raised. A great many cases in point are to be found in the books, but I think it sufficient to refer the parties to one of the most recent, that of Murray v. Jones,[3] which is very apposite to the present.

The second question relates to the alleged exclusion of our jurisdiction by the claim giving appeal to the Circuit Court. It is not necessary for us to decide whether appeal on the present ground is competent to the Circuit Court. That question can only arise on an appeal taken to the Circuit. At the same time it

---

[1] Anderson and Holms v. Cooper, March 7, 1868, 1 Coup. 18, 40 Scot. Jur. 292.

[2] Gardner v. Dymock, Jan. 9, 1865, 5 Irv. 13, 37 Scot. Jur. 189; Halliday v. Bathgate, June 1, 1867, 5 Irv. 383, 39 Scot. Jur. 446; Wright v. Dewar, March 9, 1874, ante, vol. i. Just. p. 1.

[3] June 17, 1872, 2 Coup. 284, 44 Scot. Jur. 458.

No. 4.

Dec. 11, 1874.
Muckersie v. M'Dougall.

is worthy of remark that Lord Deas in his judgment in the case of Rhodes v. Ross, Stirling, Sept. 23, 1870, 1 Couper, p. 469, says that "where what is done in the inferior Court is outwith the statute or contrary to the statute, such clauses of limitation and exclusion do not exclude review by the Circuit Court." But I am satisfied, independently, that there is nothing in the clause in question, giving an appeal to the Circuit Court, which can be held to exclude the paramount jurisdiction of this Court.

There remain for consideration the merits of the suspension. An appeal upon the merits is given by the Public-House Acts from the Justices in Petty Sessions to the Justices in Quarter Sessions. When this appeal was taken the prosecutor objected that there was no note of the evidence. The complainer proposed to relead the evidence that had been previously led before the Court below. I am of opinion that she was quite entitled to do that, and that the Court of Quarter Sessions was not entitled to reject this proposal and the appeal. I believe it has been a common enough practice of late years for Quarter Sessions to rehear evidence in such cases, and I entirely concur in the opinion of Lord Cowan on the subject expressed in the case of Anderson and Holmes v. Cooper,[1] as follows:—"That Court (the Quarter Sessions) does not require any note of the evidence to be taken in order to review. The Quarter Sessions, when necessary for the explication of their appellate jurisdiction, hear the cases brought before them and lead the evidence, if the case requires it, de novo, and no hardship would therefore follow where no such note has been taken."

Being of opinion that the Court of Quarter Sessions were entitled and bound to follow that course, and as they declined to do so, it follows that this bill of suspension must be sustained, and their judgment set aside.

Lord Neaves concurred.

Lord Young.—I am of the same opinion. It is clear that the complainer was entitled to appeal on the merits of her case. She did not complain of the regularity of the conviction, but appealed expressly on the merits,—that is to say, on the ground that she was convicted when innocent. The appeal was quite warranted by the Act of Parliament and was well taken, and the appellant had undoubted right to have her appeal considered and disposed of on the merits by the Court of Quarter Sessions. There was no record of the evidence led before the Justices in Petty Sessions. The appeal could therefore only be disposed of by evidence taken before the Court of Quarter Sessions itself. The Court of Quarter Sessions refused to allow such evidence to be led. In this they committed an error of judgment, and I concur in thinking that the course they followed was in effect a declinature to exercise that appellate jurisdiction which the appellant was entitled to call upon them to exercise.

I should like to add a few words with reference to an objection taken at the bar proceeding on the assumption that where there is an appeal taken on the merits from the Petty Sessions to the Quarter Sessions, it is inconsistent with principle and impossible in practice to adduce the evidence over again. What I have to say is implied in your Lordship's opinion, but I think it as well it should be distinctly stated and understood. An appeal on the merits is not of the nature of a new trial. The conviction complained of is assumed good till the [1] March 7, 1868, 1 Coup. 18, 40 Scot. Jur. 292.

No. 4.

Dec. 11, 1874.
Muckersie v. M'Dougall.

appellant proves the contrary. For that purpose it is incumbent on the appellant to lead evidence, and the Court of Quarter Sessions will be very slow to reverse a judgment unless the appellant produces to them the whole of the evidence led in the Court below. It is the appellant's duty to adduce the evidence to set aside the conviction, and for that purpose to have all the witnesses in attendance who were examined either for the prosecution or for the defence before the Justices. It would be a strong thing for the Court of Quarter Sessions to reverse a judgment of the Justices below in ignorance of the evidence on which they proceeded.

With these observations, I entirely concur in what your Lordship has said, and in the result of the judgment, viz., that this case ought to be remitted to the Quarter Sessions in order that they may proceed in the exercise of their jurisdiction to hear the evidence of new upon which the judgment complained of proceeded.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced :—"Remit to the Quarter Sessions to recall the interlocutor complained of, and to hear and determine the appeal according to the statute: Find the respondent liable in expenses," &c.

GILLESPIE & PATERSON, W.S.—PARTY.—Agents.

No. 5.

Dec. 11, 1874.
Rae v. Linton.

JOHN RUTHERFORD RAE, Complainer.—Macdonald.
THOMAS LINTON, Respondent.—M'Laren.

Suspension—Competency—Edinburgh Provisional Order Act, 1867, sec. 187.—Held that notwithstanding the terms of sec. 187 of the Edinburgh Provisional Order Act, 1867, a suspension of a conviction in the Burgh Police Court, on the ground of the irrelevancy of the libel, was competent even after the lapse of fourteen days from its date.

Libel—Relevancy.—In support of a charge of falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition, the libel set forth that the accused had wickedly and feloniously, and falsely and fraudulently, caused a cheque drawn by him upon the branch of the Bank of Scotland at Annan to be presented and cashed at the head office of the bank in Edinburgh, he well knowing that he had no money in the bank at Annan. Held that the libel was not relevant, in respect that the facts averred did not necessarily infer the crime charged.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-Clerk. Lord Neaves. Lord Young. Justiciary Clerk.

THE complainer, John Rutherford Rae, a law clerk, Annan, was tried in the Edinburgh Burgh Police Court on 14th August 1874 before Bailie Muirhead, at the instance of Thomas Linton, superintendent of police and burgh procurator-fiscal, on an indictment setting forth "that John Rutherford Rae, at present in custody, has been guilty of the crime of falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition, actor, or art and part, in so far as upon the twenty-third day of July eighteen hundred and seventy-four years, or about that time, in the Bank of Scotland, situated in Bank Street, in or near Edinburgh, the said accused did wickedly and feloniously, falsely and fraudulently, cause to be presented for payment to Robert Thomas Scott, a teller in said Bank of Scotland, a cheque or order for money, conceived in the following or similar terms :—'No. —— Annan, 23d July 1874. To the agents of the Bank of Scotland, Annan. Pay to or bearer the sum of ten pounds stg.' (Signed) 'J. RUTHERFORD RAE'—he well knowing that he then had no money in said Bank of Scotland, Annan; and having in this manner imposed upon and deceived the said Robert Thomas Scott, he did then and there cause to be delivered to the said accused the sum of nine pounds nineteen shillings and sixpence sterling, being the amount of said cheque or order, less sixpence for commission, the property, or in the lawful possession of the directors of the Bank of Scotland aforesaid, which the said accused did carry away and appropriate to his own uses and purposes, by all which he did wilfully impose upon and defraud the said Robert Thomas Scott, and did obtain the property above mentioned fraudulently, and on false pretences; the said property not exceeding in value ten pounds sterling. It is therefore craved," &c. The complainer was convicted, and sentenced to twenty days' imprisonment.

No. 5.
Dec. 11, 1874.
Rae v. Linton.

It was admitted that the complainer had an account with the Bank of Scotland at their Annan branch, although at the date libelled in the indictment there were no funds at his credit with the bank there.

On 8th December following he presented to the High Court of Justiciary a suspension of the above conviction.

He pleaded;—(2) The complainer not having been charged with or convicted of any crime known to the law of Scotland, the said conviction should be set aside.

It was objected for the respondent;—(1) The High Court of Justiciary had no jurisdiction to entertain the suspension. The proceedings of the Edinburgh Burgh Police Court were conducted under the Edinburgh Provisional Order Act, 1867. Review was regulated by section 187 of that Act,* and was limited to certain special grounds, amongst which the present did not fall,—and to fourteen days from the date of conviction. (2) Even if review on a question of relevancy were competent, as the conviction took place on 14th August, and the suspension was not brought till 8th December, it was excluded by the statutory limitation of time.

Replied for the complainer;—(1) The suspension was competent. The Provisional Order Act set forth certain things which should be competent grounds of review. But the present suspension was founded on a ground which the High Court of Justiciary was always prepared to sustain, apart from all statutory regulation or limitation of review. The respondent was outwith the statute altogether, and could claim no benefit from its provisions. The magistrate had entertained an irrelevant complaint, and had therefore exceeded his statutory jurisdiction, and accordingly his sentence could receive no protection from the statute. (2) The libel was not relevant. The act complained of was one perfectly consistent with innocence. It was sought by the use of the words "wickedly and feloniously, falsely and fraudulently," to convert that into a crime which, in itself, was an innocent act. The mere heaping up of epithets was not sufficient. Where the act libelled was not inconsistent in itself with innocence, it was necessary to specify wherein it assumed its criminal character. No. 5.

* The Edinburgh Provisional Order Act, 1867, sec. 187, enacts:—"No order, judgment, record of conviction, or other proceeding whatsoever, concerning any prosecution instituted before the Judge of Police shall be quashed or vacated for any misnomer or informality; and all judgments and sentences pronounced by the Judge of Police shall be final and conclusive, and not subject to suspension, or advocation, or appeal, or any other form of review, or stay of execution, unless on the grounds of corruption, malice, or oppression on the part of such Judge, or of such deviations in point of form from the statutory enactments as the Court of review shall think took place wilfully, or of incompetency, including defect of jurisdiction; and such suspension, or advocation, or appeal, or review, or stay of execution, must be presented to the High Court of Justiciary within fourteen days after the date of the sentence complained of."

Dec. 11, 1874.
Rae v. Linton.

LORD NEAVES.—I cannot but think that this indictment in point of laxity goes beyond the limits that can be allowed even in a Burgh Police Court. I do not say that there are not cases where the use of such words as "falsely and fraudulently" is sufficient without any specific statement that the thing done amounted to a criminal act, by reason of the state of matters existing when it was done. Some acts are in themselves inconsistent with innocence, and where that is the case there is no necessity for farther explanation in the libel of the way in which they assume their criminal character.

Now, in the present case the complainer is charged with having drawn a cheque upon his account with a bank in Annan, and with having caused it to be presented to a bank in Edinburgh, and it is sought to be inferred that he was thereby guilty of a crime because he had then no money at his credit with the bank at Annan. That is not a fair libel. You must specify in what respect the act of drawing and presenting the cheque was fraudulent. There is nothing stated in the libel which is not consistent with perfect innocence on the part of the complainer of all fraudulent design. The having money at his credit with a bank is not the only ground on which a man may draw a cheque. He may be directly authorised by the bank to draw on credit, either by reason of having granted a cash credit bond or by reason merely of his undoubted solvency, or being obliged to overdraw his account in a temporary emergency he may be as morally certain that the bank will honour his draft as he would be if he knew that he had money at his credit, or he may even be in ignorance that he is overdrawing his account at all. Yet in this indictment there is nothing but the use of the words "falsely and fraudulently" to convert that into a criminal act which is perfectly consistent with innocence. Suppose that it is proved that he drew and presented the cheque when there was nothing at his credit with the bank at Annan: is that a crime? If so, I am afraid many very respectable persons are in danger daily of having a criminal charge laid against them. The simple use of the words "falsely and fraudulently" are not enough to convert this innocent act into a crime. Some additional statement is necessary, to the effect that he had neither money nor credit, nor any right to believe that his cheque would be honoured, or that he knew that it would not be honoured.

On the question of the competency of the present suspension, which perhaps I should have disposed of first, I shall only say that the objection to the conviction does not fall under any category mentioned in the 187th section of the Edinburgh Provisional Order Act. The objection is to the relevancy. It was endeavoured to include irrelevancy under incompetency. But relevancy is not competency. A panel pleads to relevancy quite apart from competency. This complaint does not therefore fall under the clause of the statute introducing a limitation of review. It is brought before us in the exercise of our jurisdiction, which requires us amongst other things to see that nothing is made a crime in a Police Court which is not a crime in itself. The clause of limitation does not apply, and there is no such great delay otherwise as to entitle us to refuse to entertain the suspension.

LORD YOUNG concurred.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I have only a remark on one point to add. It has

No. 5.

Dec. 11, 1874.
Rae v. Linton.

been decided in several cases that where an act set forth in a criminal libel is not of itself criminal, but innocent or indifferent, the libel will not be rendered relevant merely by the addition of epithets or adjectives, but that the prosecutor must set out in his libel the specific facts which give the act a criminal character.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"In respect the libel contains no relevant charge of falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition, pass the bill, suspend the conviction and sentence complained of simpliciter: Find the suspender entitled to expenses," &c.

W. S. STEUART, S.S.C.—RICHARDSON & JOHNSTON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 6.

Mar. 12, 1875.
Paterson v. Rose.

JAMES PATERSON, Complainer.—Brand.
ARCHIBALD YOUNG ROSE, Respondent.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—R. V. Campbell.

Suspension—Jurisdiction—Police Magistrate—Competency—Statutes 1 and 2 Geo. IV., c. lx., and 12 and 13 Vict. c. lxxxix. (Airdrie Police Acts, 1821 and 1849).—The Airdrie Police Act, 1821, declared certain acts to be offences, and provided that the provost and magistrates, or a certain number of them, which was specified in reference to each particular offence, should be the tribunal for trying such offences. An amending Act, passed in 1849, created a new magistracy, and conferred upon them the jurisdiction in offences under the original Act. The interpretation clause bore that "the word 'magistrate' or 'magistrates' shall include the provost and bailies, or any one or more of them."

Held that one magistrate sitting under the amending Act could exercise the jurisdiction conferred upon the magistrates or any two of them in relation to an offence under the original Act.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-Clerk.
Lord Neaves.
Lord Young.
Justiciary Clerk.

THE complainer, James Paterson, surgeon in Airdrie, was, on 5th February 1875, convicted before Graham Stevenson, one of the magistrates of the burgh of Airdrie, on a complaint under the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, at the instance of the respondent, Archibald Young Rose, burgh procurator-fiscal, of having contravened the 22d section of the Act 1 and 2 Geo. IV. c. lx. (the Airdrie Police Act, 1821),* and was sentenced to pay a fine of five shillings, or, in default thereof, to suffer imprisonment for five days.

The Act 1 and 2 Geo. IV. c. lx., created certain police offences, and provided that the provost and magistrates, or a certain number of them, which was specified in reference to each particular offence, should be the tribunal for trying such offences.

The complainer, on 24th February 1875, presented this suspension of the conviction, on the ground, inter alia, that Mr Graham, the magistrate who tried the case, had sat alone, whereas the 22d section of the Act constituted the "provost and magistrates, or any two of them," the proper Court for trying offences under its provisions; that the conviction was therefore pronounced by a Court having no jurisdiction; and that the whole proceedings were accordingly null and void, and ought to be quashed.

* The Act 1 and 2 Geo. IV. c. lx., section 22, provides for the cleaning of private closes, back-courts, &c., by the proprietors, and enacts,—"And in case such closes, lanes, and thoroughfares, and back-courts shall not be so swept and cleaned, such proprietors shall severally forfeit and pay such sum not exceeding 5s. stirling as the said provost and magistrates, or any two of them, shall award, for each offence, to be levied and applied in manner hereinafter directed."

No. 6.

Mar. 12, 1875. Paterson v. Rose.

The respondent stated the preliminary objection that the trial of all police offences, though they might be created under the 1 and 2 Act Geo. IV. c. lx., was now provided for under the amending Act 12 and 13 Vict. c. lxxxix.; that that Act, section 49, required suspensions to be presented "within fourteen days after the date of the sentence complained of;" that the conviction in the present case was dated 5th February, while the suspension was not presented till 24th February 1875; and that, therefore, the suspension was incompetent.*

Argued for the complainer;—The question was, whether the offence was properly tried before one magistrate.[1] The complaint proceeded entirely on the Act 1 and 2 Geo. IV. c. lx., and made no reference to the amending Act 12 and 13 Vict. c. lxxxix. The sections of the Act of Geo. IV. creating statutory offences all created a special statutory tribunal for the trial of each of them. The Act 12 and 13 Vict. repealed none of these sections of the previous Act, but left them standing as the foundation of the statutory offences which they created, and of the tribunals which were to try them. It could not be contended that the interpretation clause of the Act 12 and 13 Vict. was meant by a few chance words to sweep away all the distinctions so anxiously introduced between the tribunals for the trial of different offences under the Act 1 and 2 Geo. IV. This conviction, therefore, was not pronounced by a competent Court; and if there was no Court exercising competent jurisdiction under the statutes the case was outwith the statutes altogether, and the respondent could take no benefit from any limitation of review.

---

* The Act 12 and 13 Vict. c. lxxxix. (the Airdrie Police and Municipal Act, 1849), enacted section 1, ... "That from and after the passing of this Act the said recited Act of the 1 and 2 Geo. IV. cap. lx., shall be, and the same is hereby repealed, ... so far as the same may deviate from or be inconsistent with the provisions of this Act."

Section 2.—"Provided . . . . . that in so far as not repealed by this Act . . . . . the powers and provisions of the said Act 1 and 2 Geo. IV. c. lx. shall continue to subsist and extend over the limits of the burgh of Airdrie, ... and it shall be competent to bring complaint, and sue for and recover fines and penalties, and punish misdemeanours which may be incurred under the said Act of the 1 and 2 Geo. IV. c. lx., in terms of the powers and provisions contained in this Act."

Section 8.—"And be it enacted that the magistrates shall have and possess police jurisdiction in and over the whole limits of the burgh of Airdrie, as fixed by this Act, with power to take cognisance of all crimes, offences, misdemeanours, and breaches of the police provisions contained in the before recited Act of the 1 and 2 Geo. IV. c. lx., or herein contained," &c.

Section 49.—"And be it enacted that no order, judgment, record of conviction, or other proceeding whatsoever concerning any prosecution instituted in the said Police Court by virtue of this Act shall be quashed or vacated for any misnomer or informality; and all judgments or sentences pronounced by the Judge shall be final and conclusive, and not subject to suspension or advocation or appeal, or any other form of review or stay of execution, unless on the ground of corruption, malice, or oppression on the part of the Judge, or of such deviations in point of form from the statutory enactments as the Court of review shall think took place wilfully, or of incompetency, including defect of jurisdiction of the Judge; and which suspension, or advocation, or appeal, or review, or stay of execution, must be presented to the High Court of Justiciary within fourteen days after the date of the sentence complained of."

Section 105 (interpretation clause).— . . . . . "The word 'magistrate' or 'magistrates' shall include the provost and bailies, or any one or more of them."

[1] Maitland v. Douglas, Dec. 13, 1861, 24 D. 193, 34 Scot. Jur. 77.

No. 6.

Mar. 12, 1875.
Paterson v. Rose.

Argued for the respondent;—Though the offence of which the complainer had been convicted was created under the statute of Geo. IV., upon which the complaint properly founded, the tribunal which tried it was no longer the one fixed by that Act. The amending Act of Victoria, section 8, transferred to the magistrates appointed under it jurisdiction to take cognisance of all offences created by the former Act; and farther, by section 105, provided that any one magistrate might exercise the powers of the whole. The offence created by 1 and 2 Geo. IV. c. lx., section 22, was therefore competently tried under 12 and 13 Vict. c. lxxxix. by one magistrate. But even if that was not the case, review was excluded. The ground of review fell clearly within the expression "incompetency, including defect of jurisdiction," contained in 12 and 13 Vict. c. lxxxix., section 49. If that expression did not include a case like the present, it was impossible to give a meaning to the words.

LORD NEAVES.—It is true the terms of the amending Act of 12 and 13 Victoria are not very precise, but I cannot doubt that in police cases jurisdiction is to be regulated by the latest Act, and that a single magistrate is competent to try such questions. I think it would be an unreasonable construction of the statutes to hold otherwise,—to hold that, because the original statute created the offence, therefore the original tribunal was always to continue to be the tribunal to try it. The amending statute practically extended the jurisdiction of the magistrates, or any one of them, over all the offences created by the original statute.

LORD YOUNG concurred.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur. But I am not prepared to sustain the objection to the competency of the suspension. If I could hold that two Judges were necessary while only one tried the case, I should be of opinion that the conviction was not under but beyond the statute, and in such circumstances nothing can limit our jurisdiction to interfere and give redress.

But I am quite satisfied that the suspension fails on the merits. No part of the judicial establishment provided by the first Act was imported into the second. A new judiciary was established by the Amending Act, and this new Court simply received power to try offences created by the original Act. That power has been competently exercised in the present case, and therefore there is no ground for suspension.

THE COURT accordingly refused the suspension.

W. B. GLEN, S.S.C.—R. A. VEITCH, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 7.

Mar. 16, 1875.
De Banzie v. Peebles.

JOHN CHADWICK DE BANZIE, Complainer.—Burnet—R. V. Campbell.
JOHN KIDD PEEBLES, Respondent.—Balfour—Brand.

Suspension—Indictment—Relevancy—Statute 21 and 22 Vict. c. 90 (The Medical Act, 1858), sec. 40.—Where a complaint charged the accused with a contravention of the Medical Act, 1858, sec. 40, in so far as he did "wilfully and falsely pretend to be or take or use the name of a physician, doctor of medicine, licentiate in medicine and surgery, bachelor of medicine, surgeon or apothecary, or other name, title, or description, implying that he is registered under said Act, or that he is recognised by law as a physician or surgeon or licentiate in medicine and surgery, or a practitioner in medicine, or an apothecary," held

No. 7.

Mar. 16, 1875.

De Banzie v. Peebles.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-Clerk. Lord Neaves. Lord Young. Justiciary Clerk.

that a conviction proceeding thereon, bearing merely that the accused was convicted "of the offence charged," was invalid, in respect that it did not specify the act by which the statute was held to have been contravened.

A COMPLAINT was presented under the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, by John Kidd Peebles, procurator-fiscal of Court, to the Justices of the Peace for the county of Lanark at Airdrie, setting forth that John Chadwick de Banzie, residing in Airdrie, "has been guilty of an offence within the meaning of the Medical Act, section 40, in so far as on one or other or more of the bye-past days of February 1875 years, the said John Chadwick de Banzie, defender, did, within the burgh of Airdrie, and particularly within Graham Street and Stirling Street in said burgh, wilfully and falsely pretend to be or take or use the name of a physician, doctor of medicine, licentiate in medicine and surgery, bachelor of medicine, surgeon or apothecary, or other name, title, or description implying that he is registered under said Act, or that he is recognised by law as a physician or surgeon or licentiate in medicine and surgery, or a practitioner in medicine, or an apothecary, in contravention of said section of said Act, whereby the said John Chadwick de Banzie has become liable upon summary conviction for such offence to pay a sum not exceeding £20," &c.

The case was heard at Airdrie on 18th February 1875, and a conviction pronounced in these terms:—"The Justices, in respect of the evidence adduced, convict the said John Chadwick de Banzie of the offence charged, and therefore adjudge him to forfeit and pay the sum of £20 sterling of penalty, and in respect it is inexpedient to issue a warrant of poinding and sale, ordain instant execution by imprisonment, and therefore, and in default of immediate payment of said penalty, adjudge him to be imprisoned in the prison of Airdrie for the period of three calendar months from the date of his imprisonment, unless the said sum shall be sooner paid," &c.

Against this conviction de Banzie, averring himself a natural born citizen of the United States of America, and producing what purported to be a diploma as doctor of medicine of the university of Philadelphia, brought this suspension, on the grounds, inter alia, that the 40th section of the Medical Act, under which the complaint was brought, provided a penalty for various distinct offences; that the complaint was insufficient, vague, and alternative in its form, and did not inform the accused of what particular offence he was charged; and that the conviction following thereon did not distinguish what (if any) was the complainer's offence.

There were other grounds of suspension stated on the merits [1] to the effect that, having right to the title of doctor of medicine, the use of that title could not bring the complainer within the scope of the section founded on, and proof of the genuineness of the diploma was asked.[2] The Court, however, intimated that the argument should be confined, in the first place, to the relevancy of the charge and the form of the conviction.

Argued for the complainer;—The offence created by the 40th section of the Medical Act, 1858,* was at least twofold, namely (1) the wilfully [1] Pedgrift v. Chevallier, May 28, 1860, 29 L. J. Mag. Ca. 225; Ellis v. Kelly, Nov. 14, 1860, 30 L. J. Mag. Ca., 35; Turner v. Reynall, April 28, 1863, 32 L. J. C. P. 164; Haffield v. Mackenzie, April 19, 1860, 10 Irish Com. Law Rep., 289.

[2] Cullen and Flynn v. Linton, Dec. 5, 1862, 1 Macph. 120, 35 Scot. Jur. 66.

* The Medical Act, 21 and 22 Vict. c. 90, sec. 40, enacts,—"Any person who shall wilfully and falsely pretend to be or take or use the name or title of a physician, doctor of medicine, licentiate in medicine and surgery, bachelor of medicine, surgeon, general practitioner, or apothecary, or any name, title, addi-

No. 7.
Mar. 16, 1875.
De Banzie v. Peebles.

and falsely pretending to be a physician, doctor of medicine, &c.; (2) the wilfully and falsely taking or using the name or title of a physician, doctor of medicine, &c., or any name, title, addition, or description implying that the person so taking or using is registered under the Act, or is recognised by law as a physician, surgeon, &c. But besides that two separate and distinct offences were thus enacted, there were several separate and distinct modes specified by which each might be committed. The charge, when disencumbered of the terms borrowed from the statute, simply amounted to this, that the complainer had contravened the 40th section of the Medical Act, 1858, without informing him which of the offences created by that Act he had committed, or which of the methods specified he had employed.

But even if in summary procedure the vagueness and generality of the complaint could be passed over, the conviction at least must bear a definite description of the offence found proved, and could not be sustained in such general terms as simply "of the offence charged," when the complaint contained so many alternative charges.

Argued for the respondent;—The offence created by the 40th section of the Medical Act was in reality one, namely, the pretending to be that which implied that the offender was registered under the Act, or was recognised by law as a medical practitioner, when in truth he was not, although it might be that several modes were enumerated by which the offence so created might be committed. It was not incumbent upon the prosecutor or the Court in a summary case to proceed with that strictness which was required in the High Court of Justiciary, provided the accused was made substantially aware of what he was charged with and convicted of.[1] In the present case he could be in no real doubt.

At advising,—

Lord Neaves.—This case is one of importance considering the interests it involves. Our duty is to see the law enforced, but in a manner consistent with the general principles of justice.

The charge libelled is one which involves serious consequences. But the public interests involved both deserve and require protection. The object of the 40th section of the Medical Act is to prevent what if not restrained would become a grave danger to the community, namely, the obtrusion into practice of unqualified persons representing themselves to the ignorant and simple as qualified medical practitioners, and this from a sordid desire for gain. It would be a great evil for the community that persons should be let loose upon it without proper medical qualifications, who yet assumed and pretended such in order to impose upon the medical needs or hypochondriacal fancies of mankind. It is that danger which the Legislature seeks to obviate.

But just in proportion as we see the necessity and value of these enactments must we be careful that justice is done and the due order of procedure followed.

In the present case, after bestowing on it every care and attention, I have come to be of opinion that the conviction cannot stand. The charge is vague and general, but still it is in the terms of the statute, and I am not prepared to say tion, or description implying that he is registered under this Act, or that he is recognised by law as a physician or surgeon or licentiate in medicine and surgery, or a practitioner in medicine, or an apothecary, shall, upon a summary conviction for any such offence, pay a sum not exceeding £20."

---

[1] Neilson v. Stirling, Oct. 31, 1870, 1 Coup. 476, 43 Scot. Jur. 130; Scott v. Morrison, April 9, 1872, 2 Coup. 218, 44 Scot. Jur. 377.

No. 7.

Mar. 16, 1875.
De Banzie v. Peebles.

whether the multiplicity of descriptions used are proper alternatives or not. But I consider that without bringing this vague and general charge to a specific head in the conviction the sentence cannot stand.

The Justices may have been right both in their appreciation of the facts and their view of the law. I do not say that a man though he possess a foreign medical degree, who holds himself out as having a degree conferred in this country, and practises on that footing, may not be reached under this statute. But that offence is certainly not clearly charged in this complaint or found proven in this conviction.

There is, however, another form of offence intended to be covered by the statute, namely, the pretending to be a registered practitioner without having the requisite qualification. Whenever it appears that that offence is clearly charged and found proven the conviction will be good.

But these two offences are so different that it is necessary they should be kept separate and distinct, if not in the complaint at any rate in the conviction, so that the accused may know what has been found against him. That is the point on which I think this case has failed. I do not wish it to be supposed that I think the evidence led did not clearly connect the accused with one or other of the offences charged, or that the Justices took an erroneous view of the law. On these points I reffain from indicating an opinion, and have at best but imperfect grounds for forming one. It is sufficient for the case that the conviction does not make known to the accused specifically the offence of which he has been convicted.

LORD YOUNG.—I think the general rule as to summary convictions is, that the fact which forms the ground of conviction shall be so stated as to enable the Court to see that it warrants the conviction, and that the convicting Justices have not mistaken the law. This may be done by reference to the complaint or charge, when that is so framed as to avoid all uncertainty regarding the fact; but either by such reference or by statement in the conviction itself the fact must distinctly appear.

In prosecutions for statutory penalties the common, certainly a common, case is that the statute in describing the offence makes use of general terms which embrace a variety of circumstances, and in that case it is clearly not enough to follow the words of the statute, for that would leave it quite uncertain of what particular fact in contravention of the Act the party was convicted. When the offence may be committed and the penalty incurred by any of a great variety of facts, it is not sufficient to support a conviction that it shall appear that the Justices thought it had been committed somehow in one or more of the several ways in which it might possibly be committed. The very fact which they held to be proved, and to import the offence for which they imposed a penalty, must, in my opinion, distinctly appear. Of the sufficiency of the evidence the Justices are generally the exclusive judges, but the legal sufficiency of the fact, assuming it proved, to warrant the conviction is a question of law of which they are not the exclusive judges, and hence the necessity of setting it forth so as to enable a Court of review to judge of it, and to correct an error of law should such have been committed.

Now, considering the present case with reference to these views it appears that the conviction proceeds on section 40 of the Act 21 and 22 Vict. c. 90, which imposes a penalty for falsely pretending to be a registered medical practitioner. The words of the clause comprehend a great variety of circumstances and facts by any of which the penalty may be incurred, and the complaint follows these words (although not quite exactly), without specifying the particular or individual fact by reason of committing which the party accused is charged with a contravention. It may be (in this I give no opinion) that the generality of the complaint might have been cured by the particularity of the conviction. But the conviction is necessarily as general as the complaint, being by simple reference to it. Whether the appellant incurred the penalty, according to the opinion of the Justices on the evidence, by taking the name of a "physician, doctor of medicine, licentiate in medicine and surgery, bachelor of medicine, surgeon or apothecary," or other and what other name, title, or description, does not appear. This generality of language may be allowable in a statute which is designed to include a great variety of individual cases, but in a conviction cannot be allowed. The Justices may not have mistaken the law, and probably did not, but there is nothing on the face of the conviction to give us reasonable assurance that they did not, and on the contrary the terms of it are such as may cover and conceal a very grave and serious error. It is quite possible, I do not say likely, that the Justices proceeded on the notion that the appellant by taking or using the name or title of doctor of medicine, he not having a British degree, and not being registered, implied that he was a registered practitioner, and an intention to represent that he was, and subjected him to the penalty. This, I need hardly say, would be a great error, and the terms of the conviction are, without any straining or any fanciful supposition, consistent with the suggestion that the Justices may have proceeded upon it. I am therefore of opinion that the conviction is bad, and ought to be set aside.

No. 7.

Mar. 16, 1875. De Banzie v. Peebles.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am not disposed to treat lightly the objection taken to the alternative nature of the charge in the complaint. It is, indeed, quite true that, in a summary complaint, we do not look for such precision as in an indictment before the Court of Justiciary. If the party accused receives reasonable notice of the nature of the offence charged against him then any technical inaccuracy may be disregarded.

But to sustain this complaint would give too wide a latitude. The statute very properly enumerates the different titles, the assumption of which, implying registration, constitutes an offence under the statute. But the mere repetition of this statutory enumeration in the complaint is not the way to libel an offence under it. On the contrary, this way of libelling carefully withholds from the accused that notice of the specific offence with which he is charged which he is entitled to receive.

The offence under the statute is twofold. First, the assuming wilfully and falsely any of the titles enumerated; and, second, the assumption of them in such a manner as to lead the public to the inference that the person so designed is registered under the Act. It does not follow that the title itself must be fictitious in order to the commission of the statutory offence. If it is so assumed as to imply that the user is registered under the Act when he is not then the offence is committed. That being the case, it is evidently essential that the specific title assumed should be set forth in the complaint, and the mode specified in which the offence has been committed.

But I do not need to rest my judgment upon that. The conviction is equally faulty, for it leaves the accused in as much doubt what specific offence has been found proven against him as he was before of what specific offence was charged. A case[1] was indeed quoted under the Public-House Acts, in which I held a conviction good, although general in its terms, while the charge was alternative. But, on looking into the case, it clearly appears that the same species of facts might have established any one of the alternative offences charged, or all of them. But this case is quite different. Here we have a conviction so general that it is impossible to say what specific offence has been brought home to the accused; and, therefore, I am of opinion with your Lordships that it is not a conviction which we can sustain.

No. 7.

Mar. 16, 1875.
De Banzie v. Peebles.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"In respect the conviction sought to be suspended does not sufficiently specify the offence by which the Act is held to have been contravened, pass the bill, suspend the conviction and sentence complained of simpliciter: Ordain the sum of £20, being the penalty awarded against the complainer, to be repaid to him, and decern: Find the complainer entitled to expenses," &c.

ROBERT A. VEITCH, S.S.C.—W. B. GLEN, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 8.

June 4, 1875.
Keith v. Lord Advocate.

WILLIAM TAYLOR KEITH, Petitioner.—D.-F. Clark—D. Crichton.
THE LORD ADVOCATE, Respondent.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Muirhead, A.-D.

Liberation—Undue Detention on Warrant of Commitment—Statute 1701, c. 6.—A prisoner apprehended on 18th and committed to prison on 24th September 1874 on a charge of falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition, was indicted for the Glasgow winter circuit and again for the Glasgow spring circuit ensuing, but on the one occasion the counsel for the Crown deserted the diet, and on the other did not call the case, the Court refusing a motion by the pursuer's counsel to direct the diet to be called. On 29th January 1875 he obtained a warrant for letters of intimation with a view of running letters, but failing to pay the fees the letters were not issued. On 13th May, having been continuously in prison since his first apprehension, he presented a petition for liberation to the High Court of Justiciary. The Court, on 4th June, refused the petition, in respect that a fresh indictment had been served on the prisoner for trial before the High Court on the 14th of that month, and that the public prosecutor had intimated that he was prepared to proceed to trial on that day.

Opinion (per Lord Justice-Clerk) that it was competent for the Court to entertain a petition for liberation at common law, notwithstanding the terms of the Act 1701, c. 6.

Trial—Indictment—Declaration.—Question, whether it is competent to proceed to trial against a prisoner on an indictment containing charges on which a declaration has not been taken from him.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-General. Lord Justice-Clerk. Lord Deas. Lord Ardmillan. Lord Neaves. Lord Young. Lord Mure. Justiciary Clerk.

A PETITION for liberation was presented to the High Court of Justiciary on 13th May 1875 by William Taylor Keith, a prisoner in the prison of Glasgow, under the following circumstances:—

The prisoner was apprehended on 18th September 1874 on a charge of falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition. His declaration was taken on 21st and he was committed for trial on 24th September. On 5th December an indictment was served on him for trial at the ensuing winter circuit at Glasgow.

On 23d December the diet was called against the prisoner at Glasgow. The prisoner's counsel moved the Court to delay the trial, in respect of the absence of a material witness for the defence. The motion was refused, [1] Scott v. Morrison, supra, p. 24, note 1.

No. 8.

June 4, 1875.
Keith v. Lord Advocate.

but an objection being then taken to the relevancy of one of the counts in the indictment the objection was sustained, and the diet was thereupon deserted by the public prosecutor pro loco et tempore. A new warrant of commitment was at once granted by the Judge on circuit, and the prisoner was recommitted to prison.

In order that he might run his letters under the Act 1701, c. 6, he, on 29th January 1875, obtained a warrant for letters of intimation. The letters were expede and signeted on 30th January, but being unable, as he alleged, from poverty, to pay the fee of 17s. 6d. at the Justiciary office, the letters were not issued. On the same day the Clerk of Justiciary wrote to the Crown agent requesting to know whether the Crown would advance the fees, and also applied to the Exchequer to know whether the fees would be remitted. Both applications were refused. Accordingly, the letters of intimation were never issued.

On 6th April 1875 a second indictment was served on the prisoner for the spring circuit at Glasgow. This indictment contained five charges, of which four were the same as those contained in the former indictment served. The case was not called at the instance of the Crown at the Glasgow spring circuit, the counsel for the Crown having discovered that no declaration had been taken from the prisoner, and no warrant of commitment granted on certain of the charges contained in the libel.

During the sitting of the Circuit Court the prisoner's counsel, on 23d April, moved the Court to order the diet to be called against the prisoner that the case might be disposed of, but the Court refused, and the prisoner remained in prison.

No farther steps were taken against the prisoner prior to the presenting of this petition for liberation. Intimation of the petition to the Lord Advocate was ordered, and a hearing was fixed for 21st May.

It was then argued for the prisoner in support of the petition;—There could be no doubt that this was a case of very grave oppression. Though the delay from the Christmas to the spring circuit might be excusable, further delay was an abuse of the forms of justice. The prisoner was entitled to insist upon the diet being called, and if the Crown did not appear to prosecute he was then entitled to be liberated. In refusing the prisoner's motion to this effect the Judge on circuit had denied him justice. The question was, what was now the remedy? The statute of 1701 had introduced the remedy of running letters, and the prisoner had endeavoured to take advantage of it, but had been prevented by poverty from serving the letters of intimation. Though the letters had not been formally served, the Crown office had been made fully aware of the state of matters, and the sixty days required by the statute had elapsed since they were certiorated of these facts. The statutory remedy introduced by the Act of 1701 did not limit the power of the Court, which existed prior to its passing, to prevent oppressive interference with the liberty of the subject,[1] and this was unmistakeably a case in which that power should be exercised.

Argued for the Crown;—There were sufficient reasons why the panel had not been tried at the winter and spring circuits. He would have been tried since in the High Court had he not intimated this petition for liberation. Having done so, it was not thought right to anticipate the action of the High Court. But the petition itself was incompetent. The Act 1701, c. 6, regulated the manner of a prisoner committed for trial obtaining his liberation, if his trial was unduly postponed, and no other course was competent. No example could be adduced of the Court entertaining such an application subsequent to the passing of the Act of 1701.

[1] Hume, 2, 98, et seq.

No. 8.

June 4, 1875.
Keith v. Lord Advocate.

The Court took the case ad avizandum.

On 4th June, when the case was put out for advising, the Court were informed that a fresh indictment had been served on the prisoner on 29th May for trial before the High Court on 14th June.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The petition which is now to be disposed of raises some considerations very important for the administration of the criminal law. It is presented by a prisoner in the jail of Glasgow, and the substance of the complaint which it contains is, that he was apprehended on the 18th and committed for trial on a warrant of the Sheriff of Lanarkshire on the 24th of September 1874, on a charge of falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition, and also breach of trust and embezzlement, and that he has been detained in prison ever since without trial, and he now prays for liberation. This petition, which has evidently been prepared by the prisoner himself, is expressed in incoherent and indeed unseemly language, and contains imputations on various persons, including public officials, which could not, in the mode in which they are made, be with propriety the subject of investigation. I am not, however, disposed to attach any importance to the language in which these petitions are framed. The substance of the complaint has been thought, and rightly thought, to deserve a fair hearing from the bar, in which the complainer has had the assistance, according to honourable usage, of the Dean of Faculty, and I address myself entirely to the grounds which were then urged to us, and on which this application for liberation was supported, which did not embrace any of these vague and irrelevant charges.

The facts, so far as they are material, are few and simple. The prisoner was committed for trial, as I have said, on the 24th of September 1874. He was enlisted for the Glasgow winter circuit, to be held in December following, and it appears from the record that when the case came on his counsel moved for a postponement of the trial. This was not granted, but an objection was taken to the relevancy of one of the charges in the indictment, which objection was sustained. The diet was thereupon deserted pro loco et tempore by the public prosecutor, and the prisoner was apprehended on a fresh warrant and recommitted to prison. He was again indicted for the spring circuit at Glasgow, but the prosecutor did not apply to have the diet called, and an application by the prisoner to that effect was unsuccessful, and he now remains untried in the prison of Glasgow nearly nine months after the first warrant of commitment was issued. I think these facts afford, prima facie, strong ground for the complaint contained in this petition. That two Circuit Courts should have passed since the apprehension and commitment of the prisoner without his case having been tried is of itself an unusual and a serious matter. There are, no doubt, circumstances in which such a contingency may be unavoidable. A witness may be ill, or may have absconded, or new evidence may have been discovered, or the health of the prisoner may have given way. Events like these, over which the prosecutor has no control, may unavoidably or even justifiably protract the incarceration of the untried prisoner for such a period; nor do I say that the mere lapse of time is of itself necessarily a ground for our interference. But if there be no sufficient cause for delay, and especially if the cause be one within the power and control of the prosecutor, I do not doubt that we have the power, nor that, in the absence of sufficient explanation from the prosecutor, it would be our duty to give the complainer the remedy which he asks. We have, however, had a very candid and clear explanation from the Solicitor-General of the ground on which this prosecution has not proceeded. He informs us that having ascertained that in regard to four out of the five charges contained in the indictment no declaration had been taken from the prisoner, and that no warrant of commitment had been granted, the advocate-depute declined to proceed with the trial. This was the only ground stated to us to account for the delay.

No. 8.

June 4, 1875.
Keith v. Lord Advocate.

I express no opinion whether the view on which the public prosecutor thus acted was well founded or not, because he acted on his own responsibility, and we cannot sit in judgment on the exercise of his discretion. But I am very clearly of opinion that the question whether he was right or wrong in the course which he took and in the effect which he attributed to the supposed omission in the procedure, however solved, cannot affect the decision to be pronounced on the prayer of this petition. It is enough that these were matters within the power and control of the public prosecutor, and if he elected not to proceed with the trial for which the complainer had been cited, these reasons can afford no justification for the further detention of the prisoner, if otherwise his incarceration has been protracted over an unreasonable and oppressive length.

Neither do I think it necessary to consider whether the application which was made to the Court on the part of the prisoner to have the diet called was one which ought to have been granted. The motion was disposed of by the presiding Judge, and we have no power to review his decision, but I do not think the prayer of the petition is in any degree strengthened by the fact of this motion having been made, nor would it have been weakened had no such proceeding taken place.

On these facts I should certainly have been inclined to the opinion,—though I admit the remedy is unusual,—that the prisoner should be liberated, not, indeed, to the effect of freeing him from prosecution, but to that of terminating his imprisonment. But we are now informed by the prosecutor that the prisoner has been served with a new libel, to be tried on the 14th of this month. It has also been represented that even if the complainer had served his letters of intimation on the Lord Advocate on 29th January he could not, under the Act of 1701, have thereby compelled his trial or liberation within the time which has since elapsed.

In these circumstances, and as the inclination of the majority of your Lordships appears to be in favour of this course, I am prepared, although with reluctance, to acquiesce in the refusal of the petition, but solely on the ground that the public prosecutor has intimated that he is prepared to proceed with the trial on the 14th June.

THE COURT concurred in the result of the Lord Justice-Clerk's opinion, and, "in respect that the public prosecutor has indicted the petitioner for trial on the 14th current," refused the prayer of the petition.

Æ. MACKENZIE, S.S.C.—CROWN AGENT.—Agents.

No. 9.

June 16, 1875.
Craig v. Peebles.

JAMES CRAIG, Complainer.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—M'Kechnie.
JOHN KIDD PEEBLES, Respondent.—Balfour.

Public-House—Certificate—Rei interitus.—Held that partial destruction of the premises for which a person held an unexpired public-house certificate did not put an end to the certificate, so as to subject the holder to the penalty imposed on selling without a certificate, in respect that he continued to carry on his business within the partially destroyed building while repairs were being made.

No. 9.

June 16, 1875.

Craig v. Peebles.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-Clerk. Lord Neaves. Lord Young. Justiciary Clerk.

THIS was a suspension of a conviction and sentence pronounced on 27th May 1875 by two of the Justices of the Peace for the county of Lanark at Airdrie, upon a complaint under the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, at the instance of John Kidd Peebles, procurator-fiscal of Court, setting forth "that James Craig, a spirit dealer, residing at West Merryston, in the parish of Old Monkland and county of Lanark, has been guilty of an offence within the meaning of the Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862, section 17,* in so far as on or about 8th May 1875 the said James Craig, defender, did, within the broken walls of an old public-house which was burnt down, situated in West Merryston, in the parish of Old Monkland and county of Lanark, unlawfully traffic in whisky or other exciseable liquors without having obtained a certificate on that behalf in terms of said Act."

Upon this complaint he was convicted, and sentenced to pay a fine of £7, with £2 of expenses, and failing payment to be imprisoned for six weeks.

Craig had, in April 1874, obtained from the Justices a certificate in ordinary form "to keep a public-house at West Merryston, in the parish of Old Monkland and county of Lanark;" and in April 1875 he obtained a similar certificate, the first certificate being in force for one year from and after 15th May 1874, and the second for one year from and after 15th May 1875. For each year Craig obtained an excise license.

The record of the Justice of Peace Court bore that a duplicate certificate was produced by the accused. There was no record of the parole evidence, but the following facts were not disputed.

Upon 1st May 1875 a fire broke out in the premises for which Craig held a license, and partially gutted the house, but Craig obtained leave from the Excise department to carry on his business within the walls until the premises should be put in a thorough state of repair or his stock in trade sold off.

The police, however, considered the premises dangerous, and as Craig refused to desist from carrying on his business the above mentioned complaint was served upon him.

Argued for the suspender;—The complaint was not relevant. If he had committed any offence it was certainly not selling without a certificate.

Replied;—The certificate entitled Craig to keep a public-house. The house had ceased to exist as such. If he wished to sell liquor in the ruins it was necessary for him to apply for and obtain a special permission under the 6th section of the Act of 1862.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The case is one of some novelty. But I am not prepared to affirm the proposition that, because an accident happens to premises for which a person holds a public-house certificate, which for the time would have rendered the premises unsuitable or undesirable for a certificate, if the person goes on, pending repairs, conducting his business in such premises, he com-

* This section enacts,—"Every person trafficking in any spirits or other exciseable liquors in any place or premises without having obtained a certificate in that behalf, in terms of this Act, shall be guilty of an offence, and on being convicted," &c.

No. 9.

June 16, 1875. Craig v. Peebles.

mits the offence charged. It is easy to figure extreme cases. But it is obvious that there might be such partial destruction of the subjects as would have prevented the Justices granting a certificate in the first instance, but where it would be very hard, not only to prevent a man, who had obtained a certificate for the premises, from carrying on his business there, but to convict him of an offence for so doing. In this case the substance of the complaint was, that the man was carrying on his business within the ruinous walls of his house, the sale complained of having occurred on 8th May, and the fire having occurred on 1st May. I do not think, in the circumstances, that the complaint was relevant. A certificate had been granted for the premises by the Justices, he still held the excise license, the premises were the same, and it is not easy to see how he could be prevented from selling upon that license. I do not say that he would be entitled to go on selling for a whole year without any intention to repair his premises, but considering that the sale complained of took place only a week after the fire occurred the charge and conviction are not well founded.

LORD NEAVES and LORD YOUNG concurred.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"In respect that it is not disputed by the respondent, and appears from the duplicate certificate produced, that the complainer had obtained a certificate for the public-house mentioned in the libel, which was subsisting at the date of the alleged contravention, pass the bill: Suspend the conviction and sentence complained of simpliciter: Ordain the sum of £7 of penalty and £2 of expenses awarded against the complainer to be repaid to him, and decern: Find the complainer entitled to expenses," &c.

R. A. VEITCH, S.S.C.—CHARLES S. TAYLOR, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 10.

June 16, 1875. Bain v. Mackay.

HENRY BAIN, Complainer.—D.-F. Clark—Guthrie Smith.
DONALD MACKAY, Respondent.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Johnstone.

Statute—Implied Repeal—23 and 24 Vict. c. 84, and 35 and 36 Vict. c. 74 (Adulteration Acts).—The statute 23 and 24 Vict. c. 84, sec. 1, enacts "that every person who shall sell as pure and unadulterated any article of food or drink which is adulterated, or not pure, shall for every such offence, on a conviction of the same before . . . . forfeit and pay a penalty not exceeding £5."

The statute 35 and 36 Vict. c. 74, sec. 2, contains an enactment in the same terms, with the omission of the words in italics, and with a maximum penalty of £20. Sec. 4 incorporates both statutes, and sec. 12 provides that "nothing in this Act shall be held to take away any other remedy against any offender under this Act."

Held that the 1st section of the earlier Act was not superseded by the 2d section of the later Act, and that it was still competent to present a complaint under the 1st section of the Act 23 and 24 Vict., c. 84.

Adulteration—Discretion—Oppression.—A person was charged before a burgh police magistrate with selling, as pure and unadulterated, milk which was not so. There being no public analyst in the burgh, some of the milk had been sent by the police officials to an analytical chemist, who reported unfavourably. Held that it was within the discretion of the magistrate to refuse a motion for the accused, that a portion of the milk should be handed to another analytical chemist, whose fee the accused was willing to pay, for an independent analysis, and that his judgment on this point was not subject to review.

No. 10.

June 16, 1875.
Bain v. Mackay.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-Clerk.
Lord Neaves.
Lord Young.
Justiciary Clerk.

THIS was a suspension of a sentence pronounced by one of the bailies of Dundee upon a complaint at the instance of the respondent, superintendent of police and procurator-fiscal of the burgh of Dundee, setting forth that the complainer, a farmer near Dundee, and one of his servants, had been guilty of a contravention of, or an offence under, the Act 23 and 24 Vict., cap. 84, sec. 1, within the burgh of Dundee, in so far as, on Monday, the 26th day of April 1875, and within the shop in Annfield Road aforesaid, the said accuseds did, both and each, or one or other of them, sell to William Paterson and Henry Martin, sanitary officers in the Dundee police force, as pure and unadulterated, one pint of new or sweet milk or thereby, notwithstanding that the said milk was adulterated and not pure, the same having been mixed with skim milk, water, and other ingredients, whereby the said accuseds were liable, on summary conviction, to a penalty not exceeding £5.

The bill of suspension set forth that, on 26th April 1875, Bain sent his milk as usual into Dundee, that two police officers took a quantity of the milk from his cart, which they placed in bottles and removed to the police office. One of the bottles was sent to a Mr Macdougall (no public analyst for the burgh having been appointed), who analysed the milk, and returned a report, dated 27th April 1875, to the effect that it was "inferior milk, equal to an adulteration to the extent of 24 per cent of skim milk." The complainer was cited to appear before the police magistrate on 6th May 1875, when, at his request, the trial was adjourned till 13th May. His agent moved the Court to allow a portion of the contents of one of the sample bottles to be handed to an analytical chemist, whose fee he was willing to pay, for the purpose of analysis; but the magistrate refused to allow any access to the bottles, and at the trial the suspender had no means of contradicting Mr Macdougall's report. Upon 13th May, after evidence adduced, the magistrate pronounced the following sentence:—"Finds the foregoing complaint proved against the accused Henry Bain, by evidence adduced, and finds said accused guilty accordingly: Therefore fines and amerciates said accused in the sum of £2, 10s. sterling, payable to the clerk of Court: Sentences and adjudges the said accused to be incarcerated in the prison of Dundee, therein to be detained till said fine be paid, but not exceeding ten days from this date, and grants warrant to constables of police to incarcerate the said accused in said prison, therein to be detained accordingly."

The grounds of suspension chiefly insisted on were;—(1) That the statute founded on in the complaint had been repealed by the Act 35 and 36 Vict., c. 74; (2) that the magistrate had acted oppressively in refusing the complainer's motion for an independent analysis; and (3) that the statute did not sanction imprisonment, and the sentence was therefore ultra vires of the Magistrate, and illegal.

Argued for the complainer;—The 1st section of the Act 23 and 24 Vict., c. 84, must be held to be repealed and superseded by the 2d section of the Act 35 and 36 Vict., c. 74. It was a settled principle that when a later statute dealing with the same matter varied the procedure, or provided a new punishment, it repealed the former enactment, although it might not do so in express terms.[1] A comparison of the two sections would shew the perfect identity of the offence created by the former Act, and re-enacted by the later Act, with a heavier maximum penalty.*

[1] The King v. Davis, 1783, 1 Leach, Crown Cases, 271; The King v. Cator, 1767, 4 Burr. 2026; Michell v. Brown, Nov. 24, 1858, 28 L. J. Mag. Cases, 53—see Lord Campbell, p. 55; Youll v. Mappin, April 29, 1861, 30 L. J. Mag. Cases—B. Martin, p. 237.

* Stat. 23 and 24 Vict., c. 84, sec. 1.—"Every person who shall sell any

No. 10.

June 16, 1875.
Bain v. Mackay.

2d, It would only have been reasonable, considering that there was no public analyst in Dundee, for the magistrate to have granted the complainer's motion for an independent analysis, which he was specially empowered to do under sec. 5 of the Act 23 and 24 Vict. c. 84. Mr Macdougall was merely quidam ex populo, and the complainer was virtually condemned on the evidence of one witness.

3d, The Magistrate had no authority to impose a sentence of imprisonment either under the Act of 1860 or that of 1872. Even if the 337th section of the General Police Act, 1850, were held to be applicable,† that section authorised a warrant of imprisonment only as a means of enforcing payment of the fine, and not, as was done here, in substitution of the fine.

Lord Neaves.—As regards the procedure, I cannot find anything oppressive or irregular on the part of the Magistrate.

With regard to the plea that the first Act has been repealed by the second, article of food or drink with which, to the knowledge of such person, any ingredient or material injurious to the health of persons eating or drinking such article has been mixed, and every person who shall sell as pure and unadulterated any article of food or drink which is adulterated or not pure, shall, for every such offence, on a conviction of the same before two Justices of the Peace at Petty Sessions in England, and in Scotland before two Justices of the Peace in Justice of the Peace Court, or before the Sheriff-substitute of the county, or before Justices of Petty Sessions, or a divisional Justice in Ireland, forfeit and pay a penalty not exceeding five pounds, together with such costs attending such conviction as to the said Justices shall seem reasonable."

---

Stat. 35 and 36 Vict., c. 74, sec. 2.—"Every person who shall sell any article of food or drink, with which, to the knowledge of such person, any ingredient or material injurious to the health of persons eating or drinking such article has been mixed, and every person who shall sell, as unadulterated, any article of food or drink or any drug which is adulterated, shall, for every such offence, on a summary conviction of the same, before two Justices of the Peace at Petty Sessions in England, or before two Justices of the Peace in the Justice of the Peace Court, or before the Sheriff-substitute of the county, or before any Magistrate acting under any general or local Police Act in Scotland, or before Justices at Petty Sessions, or a divisional Justice in Ireland, forfeit and pay a penalty not exceeding twenty pounds, together with such cost attending such conviction as to the said Justices, Sheriff-substitute, or divisional Justice shall seem reasonable, and if any person so convicted shall afterwards commit the like offence such Justices, Sheriff-substitute, Magistrate, or divisional Justice shall cause such offender's name, place of abode, and offence to be published at the expense of such offender in such newspaper or in such other manner as to the said Justices shall seem desirable."

† Section 166 of the Dundee Police and Improvement Act, 1871, 33 and 34 Vict. c. cliii., provides that all offences committed within the burgh against the provisions of the Act 23 and 24 Vict., c. 84, "may be tried by the Magistrate as police offences, under complaint by the Procurator-fiscal of the Police-court, and the penalties may be recovered and applied in the same way as penalties for police offences under the first recited Act" (13 and 14 Vict., c. 33).

Section 337 of the General Police Act, 1850 (13 and 14 Vict., c. 33), makes it lawful for the Magistrate "to convict or give judgment against the party complained against, and thereupon to decree, adjudge, and sentence him to pay the damages or penalty which have arisen or been incurred, and the expenses attending the proceedings, and to grant a warrant for imprisoning him until such damages or penalty and expenses shall be paid; provided always that such warrant shall specify the amount of such damages, or penalty and expenses, and shall also specify a period at the expiration of which the party shall be discharged, notwithstanding such damages, or penalty and expenses, shall not have been paid, and which period shall in no case exceed two months."

No. 10.

June 16, 1875.
Bain v. Mackay.

the relation of the statutes is certainly not very clear. If the Magistrate had gone against any special enactment contained in the later statute superseding the former, the case would have been different. But the particular species of adulteration libelled is covered by the first statute, and its provisions in regard to that point have not been repealed or modified by the later statute, so as to take the case out of the jurisdiction of the Magistrates.

I am of opinion, therefore, that we must refuse the bill of suspension.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. I know nothing of the complaint in this case except what may be gathered from the bill of suspension, and judging from what is there set forth it seems to have been inaccurate in its terms. It is there said that the adulteration of the milk complained of consisted in its being mixed with skim milk, water, and other ingredients, and it was assumed in the argument submitted to us that the adulteration might have consisted in taking cream off the milk, thereby making it less rich. I would hardly think that that would justify a conviction for adulteration. Assuming, however, that the statement of the complaint is that there was an actual admixture, then the Magistrate in taking the evidence found that the complaint was true, and we must assume that he was right, for there is no power given to this Court to review his judgment on the merits.

It is said that the Magistrate ought to have exercised the discretion conferred on him by section 5 of the statute of 1860, and to have granted the motion that was made by the complainer, that an analyst should be appointed to examine a portion of the milk sold, but neither have we any jurisdiction to review the Magistrate's judgment in the exercise of his discretion. It has been committed to his discretion either to grant or to refuse such a motion, and it may be that he exercised it properly in refusing it. In more serious cases—where, for example, poison has been mixed with food, and given to some person, causing death—in which convictions proceed upon evidence which is satisfactory to juries, the Court may or may not hand over some of the material to the accused in order to be analysed. It is quite common for such a motion to be refused. The ordinary course is for the public prosecutor to prove his case, the evidence being subject to all those observations which the prisoner's counsel never fails to make upon the fact that the prosecutor has been placed in a more advantageous position than the accused with reference to the proof adduced. I cannot hold that this is a motion which, if made, the Magistrate is compelled to grant, where the statute contemplates that it shall be left to his discretion.

The only other question of importance is, whether the statute of 1860 has been repealed. I agree in thinking that the common sense view is that the statute of 1872 does not repeal the former, but simply gives the Magistrate power to inflict a higher punishment if he sees cause. There is nothing in the later statute forbidding a prosecution under the former, but, on the contrary, it is explicitly stated in section 12 of the Act of 1872 that nothing in this Act shall be held to take away any other remedy against any offender under this Act, and besides this general clause the statute also contains an incorporating clause (sec. 4). The remedy by means of a smaller penalty in the previous statute is not taken away by the later, and the prosecutor may, if he sees cause, limit the Magistrate's power as to the penalty to be inflicted by proceeding under the statute of 1860, which makes the maximum penalty to be awarded £5 only.

No. 10.

June 16, 1875. Bain v. Mackay.

The only remaining point is, whether it was within the power of the Magistrate to sentence the party complained against to imprisonment in default of payment of the penalty. The conviction is not in the form prescribed by any of the statutes, but it is substantially authorised by the 166th section of the Dundee Police Act. That section provides that any contravention of the Adulteration of Food Act may be tried by the Magistrates as an ordinary police offence, and the penalties recovered in the same way as penalties for offences under the first recited Act,—that is, under the General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1850 (13 and 14 Vict. c. 33),—section 337 of which provides that it "shall be lawful to grant a warrant for imprisoning the party complained against until the penalty, &c., shall be paid, provided the warrant shall specify the amount of penalty, and a period at the expiration of which the party shall be discharged, notwithstanding the penalty, &c., shall not have been paid, which period shall not exceed two months." It is hypercritical to say that the imprisonment is here awarded by way of substitution for the fine, or in addition to it. The imprisonment awarded is to continue until such time as the fine shall be paid, not exceeding a specified period, and the warrant is to be viewed as simply the mode of recovering the penalty. On the whole matter, therefore, I am for refusing the bill.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur. In regard to the complaint that there was no opportunity given to the accused to have a separate and independent analysis, in the circumstances the Magistrate probably rightly exercised the discretion committed to him; and at all events, we cannot interfere with that discretion. The article was perishable, and its nature and constituent parts would alter by time.

In regard to the objection founded on the warrant of imprisonment I entirely agree with Lord Young.

The question of the repeal of the Act of 1860 is really the most important. In the first place, the repeal of one statute by another subsequently passed by mere implication is not easily to be presumed; and, secondly, before such repeal can be inferred by implication, repugnancy between the provisions of the two statutes must be proved in whole or in part. This case does not reach that point, for the statute of 1860 is not merely kept alive by the subsequent Act, but referred to as still in observance, and part of its provisions form part of the machinery of the second Act. If a larger fine had been concluded for than is sanctioned by the Act of 1860 a more difficult question would have been raised. But it is not said that the procedure in this case came into collision with the second Act where it differs from the first.

I am therefore of opinion that we must refuse the suspension.

THE bill of suspension was refused.*

DAVID MILNE, S.S.C.—CHARLES HENDERSON, S.S.C.—Agents.

* Since this judgment was pronounced both the statutes 23 and 24 Vict. c. 84, and 35 and 36 Vict. c. 74, have been repealed by "The Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875," 38 and 39 Vict. c. 63, sec. 1, except to certain limited effects therein specified.

CASES

DECIDED IN

THE COURT OF SESSION, &c.

1874–75.

WINTER SESSION.

No. 1.

Nov. 2, 1874.

Kirkwood v. M'Callum.

JAMES D. KIRKWOOD, Objector and Appellant.—J. P. B. Robertson.
MALCOLM M'CALLUM, Respondent.—Begg.

Franchise—Tenant and Occupant—Sub-letting—Demitting Possession.—Where the tenant of a house let it furnished for three months in the year, ceding possession to the sub-tenant, but leaving his servant in the house, whose wages he paid, held that he had ceased to retain such occupancy of the house as to entitle him to a vote.

Registration Appeal Court. B.

JAMES D. KIRKWOOD, South Portland Street, Glasgow, a voter on the roll for the county of Bute, objected to Malcolm M'Callum being continued on the roll of voters for the county, as tenant and occupant of a house in Marine Place, Rothesay, in respect that he had let the premises on which he was enrolled for three months during the year preceding the last day of July 1874, and had thus not been occupant for a year as required by law.

The facts as stated in the special case were that Mr M'Callum had let his house as a furnished house for the months of June, July, and August in the years 1873 and 1874, and had ceded possession to the persons to whom it was let, receiving as rent £29 for the three months of each year. Mr M'Callum left his servant in the house, but he resided elsewhere himself during the three months. The servant served the persons who took the house, but Mr M'Callum paid the servant's wages, and he also paid all rates and taxes on the house.

The Sheriff (Fraser) repelled the objection, whereupon Mr Kirkwood appealed. The question of law submitted to the Court was—"Whether M'Callum retained the occupancy of his house in the sense of the statutes, after he had let it as above set forth, his servant still continuing in it, and the whole rates and taxes being paid by him?"

Argued for the appellant;—It had been decided that a tenant of a dwelling-house in a county ceased to be in the "actual personal occupancy" thereof by letting it furnished.[1] A tenant had, it was true, been recently held to retain the occupancy of his house, notwithstanding of his having let rooms therein as furnished lodgings.[1] But in the present case the tenant had ceded possession of the whole of his house, and it was obvious that his servant had been left in the house merely for the accommodation of the sub-tenant.

[1] Donaldson v. Graham, Dec. 2, 1865, 4 Macph. 129, 38 Scot. Jur. 77.

No. 1.

Nov. 2, 1874. Kirkwood v. M'Callum.

Argued for the respondent;—The expression "actual personal occupancy" was not defined by the Representation of the People Act of 1868, but the 58th section thereof declared that the Act should be construed as one with the enactments for the time being in force relating to the representation of the people in Scotland. Now, in the 9th section of the Reform Act of 1832 the expressions "personal possession," "actual personal occupancy," and "actual occupation" were all used as synonymous, and by the practice following on that Act personal residence was not required, occupation by servants being considered as sufficient to meet the intentions of the Legislature.[2] In the present case the claimant had left in the house his own servant, whose wages he alone paid, and her occupancy was equivalent to his own. No doubt, she did not personally occupy the whole house, but a tenant who let part of his house as furnished lodgings and did not retain enough to afford a qualification for the franchise had nevertheless been held entitled to vote, and this decision necessarily implied that he was, in the sense of the statute, in the actual personal occupancy of the rooms which he had let.[3] If such partial possession was sufficient in the case of a tenant there was no reason why it should not be sufficient in the case of a tenant's servant.

Lord Ardmillan.—I have no doubt upon this case. If the claimant had continued to reside in the house himself the case might have been different; but here the whole house was let, as a furnished house, to the tenant, and the claimant resided elsewhere. He is not therefore by law entitled to a vote.

Lord Ormidale.—I am of the same opinion. I think it is impossible to read the statement of the Sheriff in regard to the servant without being satisfied that during the period in question she was not the servant of the claimant at all, but entirely and exclusively the servant of the sub-tenant, for although the claimant paid the servant's wages she was entirely at the command of the sub-tenant, and the latter must have paid a larger rent in respect of her services. The claimant might have been temporarily absent without affecting his qualification, but in this case he gave up possession entirely to the sub-tenant, and in respect of this I think that the Sheriff has fallen into error, and that his judgment must be reversed.

Lord Craighill concurred.

The Court reversed the judgment of the Sheriff, and sustained the objection.

J. & F. Anderson, W.S.—Morton, Neilson, & Smart, W.S.—Agents.

---

[1] Thomas v. Panton, Oct. 24, 1873, ante, vol. i. p. 17; Smith v. Lancaster, Nov. 17, 1869, L. R. 5 C. P. 246.

[2] Cay's Analysis of the Reform Act, p. 365; Swinton's Digest, p. 86; Nicolson, p. 65.

[3] Thomas v. Panton, supra, note 1.

GEORGE BLISS M'QUEEN, Claimant and Appellant.—Darling.
RALPH DUNN, Objector and Respondent.—A. J. Young.

No. 2.

Nov. 2, 1874.

M'Queen v. Dunn.

Franchise—Tenant and Occupant.—Held that a husband's occupation of a house of which his wife was tenant could not give him a qualification as tenant for the franchise.

Registration Appeal Court. B.

RALPH DUNN, writer in Melrose, objected to a claim for Captain George Bliss M'Queen to have his name entered in the register of voters for the county of Roxburgh as "tenant and occupant of Old Melrose mansion-house, offices, and policy, Old Melrose, in the parish of Melrose," on the ground that Captain M'Queen had not occupied the premises claimed on as tenant for twelve months immediately preceding the 31st July 1874.

The facts as stated in the special case were that the subjects in question had been taken on a verbal lease for the year from Whitsunday 1873 to Whitsunday 1874 by Mrs Eliza Russell, widow of the late Mr Russell; that she had occupied the subjects in the same way as yearly tenant for some years previously; that Captain M'Queen was married to Mrs Russell in the month of July 1873, and had since occupied the house along with her; that he took the subjects in question as tenant in his own name on a verbal lease from Whitsunday 1874, and that he and Mrs Russell, now M'Queen, had occupied the premises since under that lease.

The Sheriff (Pattison) rejected the claim, holding that right to the lease entered into by Mrs Russell did not pass to Captain M'Queen by his marriage to that lady, and that his occupancy prior to Whitsunday 1874 was not such as to give him the statutory qualification.

Captain M'Queen appealed, and the question submitted to the Court was—"Whether, by virtue of his marriage with Mrs Russell, the claimant acquired right to her then current lease of the subjects so as to entitle him to found upon his occupation between that date and Whitsunday 1874 as part of the statutory qualification requisite for his registration as a voter?"

Argued for appellant;—It was settled by the case of Gillon v. Muirhead[1] that an agricultural lease was not carried by the legal assignation of marriage to the effect of creating an irritancy where assignees were excluded. But this was not conclusive in a question of the right to vote. A man might not be a tenant in strict law and yet be tenant for the purposes of the franchise,[2] just as the husband of an owner was not owner and yet was allowed to be styled in the register "owner in right of his wife."[3] Section 9 of the Act of 1832 and section 14 of the Act of 1868 implied that, for the purposes of the franchise, a lease might come to a man by marriage. The subject of the lease here being the residence of the spouses, the appellant was entitled to possess it, and he would have been liable for the rent. He had therefore all the ordinary qualities of a tenant.

Argued for the respondent;—The qualification of the husband of an "owner" depended upon direct statutory enactment,[4] and but for that enactment would not exist. No similar provision was made by the statute giving a vote to the husband of a tenant.

THE COURT affirmed the judgment of the Sheriff.

J. STORMONTH DARLING, W.S.—JOHN STEWART, W.S.—Agents.

---

[1] M. 1775, 15,286.
[2] Nish, Cay, 1839, p. 308.
[3] Smith v. Mackay, Dec. 19, 1868, 7 Macph. p. 287, 41 Scot. Jur. 172.
[4] 2 and 3 Will. IV., c. 65, sec. 8; 31 and 32 Vict. c. 48, sec. 14.

No. 3.

Nov. 2, 1874.
Rutherford v. Riddell.

FRANK RUTHERFORD, Objector and Appellant.—Darling.
ANDREW RIDDELL, Claimant and Respondent.—A. J. Young.

Franchise—County Voters Act, 1861, 24 and 25 Vict. c. 83, sec. 27—Failure to appear.—A claim to be enrolled on the roll of county voters having been objected to on the ground that the claimant's title was nominal and fictitious, held that it was no sufficient ground for rejecting the claim that the claimant, who had not been cited by the objector, did not appear personally, although a claim on the same qualification had been rejected in the previous year on his failure to appear when cited.

Registration Appeal Court. B.

FRANK RUTHERFORD, writer, Galashiels, objected to Andrew Riddell, residing at Torr House, Castle-Douglas, being enrolled as a voter for the county of Roxburgh, as proprietor of two fields occupied by Daniel Wilson at Midlem, in the parish of Bowden, on the ground that the claimant's title was nominal and fictitious, and that he was not in Court to support his claim. He admitted that he had not cited the claimant, or given him any notice to appear; but he referred to the fact that in last year's Registration Court Mr Andrew Riddell claimed to be registered on the same qualification, and after being duly cited, and having had intimation sent to him by letter, he failed to appear, and his claim was not admitted. The objector therefore maintained that the claim should be rejected.

Mr Riddell's agent produced in support of his claim a disposition, dated 30th and registered 31st January 1873, whereby, in consideration of the sum of £240 sterling then instantly paid to him, William Riddell, farmer, Hundalee, sold and disponed to him, Andrew Riddell, the subjects claimed on, with entry as at Martinmas 1872. Mr Riddell was not personally present.

The Sheriff (Pattison) repelled the objection, and admitted the claim, holding that the objection was not established, and that Mr Riddell not having been cited this year, or served with any intimation requiring him to appear, the proceedings at last year's Registration Court could not have the effect contended for.

Mr Rutherford appealed, and the question submitted for the decision of the Court was—"Whether, in respect of Mr Riddell's failure to appear in person to support his claim in the circumstances, he was to be held as confessed in the objection, and his claim rejected?"

Argued for the appellant;—The County Voters (Scotland) Act, 1861,[1] sec. 27, entitled him to oppose a claim without giving any previous notice to the claimant. Had the claimant been present the objection might have been instantly verified,[2] and looking to the result of his claim in the previous year he was bound to appear and support it when again repeating it this year, and, having failed, must be held confessed.[3]

The respondent was not called on.

THE COURT affirmed the Sheriff's judgment.

J. STORMONTH DARLING, W.S.—JOHN STEWART, W.S.—Agents.

---

[1] 24 and 25 Vict. c. 83.
[2] King v. Mitchell, Oct. 24, 1870, 9 Macph. 15, 43 Scot. Jur. 6.
[3] Weir v. Blackwood, Oct. 19, 1869, 8 Macph. 3, 42 Scot. Jur. 14.

THOMAS JOHN DUNN, Objector and Appellant.—A. J. Young.
WILLIAM COTESWORTH, Respondent.—Darling.

No. 4.

Nov. 2, 1874.
Dunn v. Cotesworth.

Franchise—Occupancy—Salmon-fishings.—Held that occupancy of salmon-fishings under a lease for twelve months prior to 31st July was a good title to the franchise, notwithstanding the annual close-time.

Question as to the effect of a lease granting the privilege of rod-fishing merely.

THOMAS JOHN DUNN, solicitor, Melrose, objected to William Cotesworth of Cowdenknowes being retained on the register of voters for the county of Roxburgh, as "tenant of fishings in the Tweed, in the parish of St Boswells," on the ground that salmon-fishings were not lands and heritages of such a nature and character as to be susceptible of the actual personal occupancy for twelve months immediately preceding the 31st day of July in each year, necessary to confer the right of voting on the tenant thereof, fishing for salmon in the Tweed being, by the Tweed Fishery Acts, 1857 and 1859, prohibited between the 30th of November in any year and the 1st of February in the year following, and the occupancy of the tenant being thereby interrupted during that period.

Registration Appeal Court. B.

The Sheriff (Pattison) held that fishings were "lands and heritages" in the sense of the Reform Acts, and that there was no such break in the occupancy by reason of the Tweed Fishery Acts as affected the qualification of the tenant, and he repelled the objection.

Mr Dunn appealed, and the question submitted to the Court was—"Whether the objection founded on the nature and character of the subjects in respect of which the voter stands enrolled is well founded?"

THE COURT affirmed the Sheriff's judgment, on the ground that salmon-fishing was a heritable right, but reserved opinion as to what might be the effect of a lease conveying a privilege of rod-fishing only.

JOHN STEWART, W.S.—J. STORMONTH DARLING, W.S.—Agents.

ELPHINGSTON MAITLAND DALGLISH, Claimant and Appellant.—Alison.
WILLIAM WRIGHT, Objector and Respondent.—Macdonald.

No. 5.

Nov. 3, 1874.
Dalglish v. Wright.

County Franchise—Proprietor—Title—Building Society.—Held, in accordance with the case of Bishop v. Dove, Dec. 19, 1868, that a member of a building society was not entitled to be placed on the roll of voters as owner of a house allotted to him by an entry in the society's books.

County Franchise—Proprietor—Title—Sale of Heritage.—A purchaser of subjects, who has not obtained a disposition to the same till after 31st January of the current year is not entitled to the county franchise in respect thereof, unless he has, before that date, entered into a written contract of sale sufficient to bind both parties.

DALGLISH claimed to be placed on the roll of voters for the county of Stirling as proprietor of a house and garden in Lennoxtown. The claimant was a member of the Campsie Building and Investment Society. In 1871 a steading of ground was allocated by the society to the claimant, and a house costing £150 was erected thereon by the society, which the claimant had occupied from a date prior to 31st January 1874.

Registration Appeal Court. B.

On 20th December 1873 a meeting of the committee of the society, and of those members who had had property allocated to them, was held. The minute of meeting, which was initialed by the chairman, bore—After deliberating concerning the present position of the society, these

No. 5.

Nov. 3, 1874. Dalglish v. Wright.

members who have had houses allocated to them intimated their willingness to bond their properties and pay over the balance of the cost of their houses to the society, provided the society, in general meeting, agrees to wind up its affairs."

At a meeting of the society, held on 16th January 1874, it was agreed to wind up its affairs as soon as circumstances would permit.

The books of the society shewed that the claimant had paid to the society, by way of instalments, sums amounting to £30, 12s. 8d. He made no further payment till 31st March 1874, when he paid the whole balance of the price, and thereafter obtained a disposition of the subjects. Wright objected to the claim, on the ground that the claimant had not been in possession of the subjects claimed on as true owner thereof for a period of six months prior to the 31st day of July 1874. The Sheriff (Blackburn) rejected the claim, holding this case to be ruled by that of Bishop v. Dove, 19th December 1868, 7 Macph. 301, 41 Scot. Jur. 179.

The claimant appealed.

Argued for him;—He was not within the scope of Bishop v. Dove; he took the subjects, not under the rules of the society, but by an independent contract of sale evidenced by the minutes, and completed before 31st January 1874.

Argued for the objector;—The minute could not be held as an offer binding upon the claimant to purchase a heritable subject, and therefore there was no contract of sale prior to 31st January 1874.

THE COURT affirmed the judgment of the Sheriff, holding that there was no completed contract of sale before 31st January 1874, and therefore that the case must be ruled by the decision in Bishop v. Dove.

T. F. WEIR, S.S.C.—MACKENZIE & BLACK, W.S.—Agents.

No. 6.

Nov. 3, 1874. Wardrop v. Cockburn.

WILLIAM WARDROP, Appellant.—Macdonald.
THOMAS COCKBURN, Objector and Respondent.—A. J. Young.

County Franchise—Schoolmaster—Side School—Defeasible Title—Statutes 43 George III. cap. 54, sec. 11, 24 and 25 Vict. cap. 107 (Schoolmasters Acts, 1803 and 1861).—When the master of a parochial side school occupies a schoolhouse and garden in virtue of his office his title to these subjects is not so defeasible as to prevent his being on the register of voters.

Registration Appeal Court. B.

WILLIAM WARDROP stood entered in the register of voters in the county of Berwick as "proprietor in liferent ex officio of house and garden in Burnmouth, in the parish of Ayton."

Thomas Cockburn objected to the voter's name being retained, on the ground that he was not proprietor in liferent of these subjects.

It was proved that the subjects were the house and garden of the schoolmaster of Burnmouth school, which was a side school in the parish, duly constituted as such, and that Wardrop was duly elected schoolmaster thereof by the qualified heritors and minister of the parish of Ayton at a meeting held on the 23d day of December 1869, the appointment to date from 15th January 1870, all under and by virtue of "The Parochial and Burgh Schoolmasters (Scotland) Act, 1861,"* which was expressly referred

* 24 and 25 Vict. c. 107, enacts,—Sec. 3. "The minister of every parish in which there is a parochial school shall, within three months from and after the passing of this Act, and on every occasion of a vacancy in the office of schoolmaster,

No. 6.

Nov. 3, 1874.
Wardrop v. Cockburn.

to in the proceedings connected with the constituting the school a side school of the parish and the election of Wardrop. It was also proved that he had since held and continued to hold that office, and had in that capacity occupied and still occupied the subjects.

It was maintained by the objector that under and by virtue of the said statute, particularly the 6th section thereof, every side school teacher was liable to be removed from his office by the heritors and minister at any time on a notice of not less than three months requiring him to resign on their making provision for payment to him as therein mentioned; that therefore his title to the schoolmaster's house was defeasible, and he was not "proprietor in liferent" of the schoolmaster's house, or entitled to be registered as such in the register of voters.

The Sheriff (Pattison) sustained the objection, and expunged Wardrop's name from the register.

Wardrop appealed.

The question of law for the decision of the Court was—"Whether the title of the teacher of a side school in a parish, duly constituted as such, to the schoolmaster's house is defeasible, and therefore insufficient to afford him a qualification as a voter in the character mentioned in the register?"

Argued for Wardrop;—The title on which a side schoolmaster held his dwelling-house and garden was not one easily defeasible. After the three months subsequent to the passing of the Act of 1861 had expired the heritors,—and now the school board,—had no power to alter the position of the side schoolmaster unless the principal parochial school was vacant. The Sheriff had overlooked this provision of the Act of 1861.[1] It was settled law that a parochial schoolmaster was entitled to be upon the register of voters in respect of his occupation of the school-house and garden, and there was nothing so different in the position of a side schoolmaster as to disqualify him. The master of a side school being only removable by the vote of a public board, which was not to be expected to be capricious, was in a different position from bank agents, &c.

Argued for Cockburn;—Under the 6th section of the Act of 1861 a side schoolmaster was removable at the will of the school board upon three months' notice. Moreover, under the Act of 1803[2] the heritors were not bound to supply a side schoolmaster with a house and garden,[3] within six weeks after such vacancy shall have taken place, call a meeting of the heritors." . . . Sec. 4. "At the meeting aforesaid it shall . . be lawful for the heritors and minister to resolve to discontinue from and after a date to be fixed by them any subsisting side school in the parish." . . . Sec. 5. "It shall be lawful for the heritors and minister at the meeting aforesaid, or at any subsequent meeting duly called for that purpose, to resolve that a female teacher shall be established." . . . Sec. 6. "It shall be lawful for the heritors and minister, at such meeting as aforesaid to require the teacher of any side school in the parish, on a notice of not less than three months, to resign his office, on their providing to him during his life an annual payment equal in amount to the full salary to which at the date of the passing of this Act he had right by law; . . and at the expiry of three months from notice as aforesaid, if such teacher shall not previously have given in his resignation, the heritors and minister having made provision for such annual payments as aforesaid, the right of such teacher to his office shall cease and determine."

---

[1] 24 and 25 Vict. c. 107, secs. 3, 4, and 6, supra.

[2] 43 Geo. III. cap. 64, sec. 11.

[3] Heritors of Annan v. Herbertson, Feb. 21, 1837, 15 Sh. 645—9 Scot. Jur. 308.

No. 6.
Nov. 3, 1874.
Wardrop v. Cockburn.

and there was nothing in this special case to shew that he had possession of this house in right of his office.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—For my part, I am quite satisfied on this point.

The question is necessarily raised in a somewhat broad form, but I have no difficulty.

Defeasibility, or the holding at the will of another on an arbitrary and capricious tenure, is a good objection. But to hold that this gentleman's right is defeasible at the pleasure, caprice, or will of another, would be clearly contrary to the truth of this case.

A right defeasible on the caprice or arbitrary will of another, such as that of a gamekeeper, butler, or gardener, has, by a long course of decisions, been held not to qualify.

But where such right depends not on mere arbitrary will or caprice, but upon the deliberate vote of a public body acting in a responsible position, such as the heritors and minister, or the school boards which have come in their place, there is no danger and no fair suggestion of capricious decision, and no reason for holding the rule regarding such defeasibility to prevail or apply.

There is, in my opinion, no good reason for holding that the teacher of a side school is in a different position from a parochial schoolmaster under a school board. I have no difficulty in coming to that conclusion.

Mr Young had a separate argument as to the obligations of heritors to give a schoolmaster's house, under the statutes 1803 and 1861.

These may not be the same for side schoolmasters as for parochial schoolmasters; but no such question arises here. This gentleman has got a house, and dwells in it; and if the heritors give a house to the teacher of a side school, and he occupies it as teacher, he is in the same position as a parochial schoolmaster. It is well understood that parochial teachers can only be removed by a deliberate vote of the governing body; and there is no reason to suppose that their vote will be given from caprice.

LORD ORMIDALE.—I come to the same result with your Lordship in this case; but I must be understood to reserve my opinion upon the question, whether there ought to be a distinction between the case where the qualification depends on the will of a single individual, and the case where it depends on the will of a public body.

It is sufficient to say that it does not depend here on the arbitrary or capricious will of the heritors and school board, whether the side schoolmaster in question can be deprived of his qualification or not. In the first place, his status of side schoolmaster cannot be affected so long as there is no vacancy in the parochial school. And, secondly, it is indisputable that the parochial schoolmaster holds his place ad vitam aut culpam.

I am therefore of opinion that the Sheriff has fallen into error in holding that the objection taken to the claimant in this case was well founded. It appears to me, on the contrary, that, in reference to the decided cases, he must be held to have established his qualification as proprietor in liferent of the subjects on which he founds.

LORD CRAIGHILL concurred.

THE COURT reversed the judgment of the Sheriff, and repelled the objection.

DAVIDSON & SYME, W.S.—J. & J. TURNBULL, W.S.—Agents.

JOHN MACKIE ADAIR, Objector and Appellant.—Scott—R. V. Campbell. No. 7.
JOHN KAY, Respondent.—M'Laren.

Nov. 9, 1874.
Adair v. Kay.

Burgh Franchise — Successive Occupancy — Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868, sec. 13.—A person left a house at Whitsunday and took another in the same burgh in the beginning of June, and in the interval lodged at an inn. Objection that his occupation of a dwelling-house had not been continuous sustained.

KAY was enrolled as a voter in the burgh of Stranraer as tenant and occupant of a dwelling-house in George Street. Registration Appeal Court. B.

Adair objected that Kay had not been tenant and occupant of a dwelling-house in the burgh for the requisite period.

The facts stated in the special case were as follows:—Kay had occupied his present house since about the beginning of June 1874. For the year ending Whitsunday 1874 he was tenant and occupant of another dwelling-house in Stranraer. On removing therefrom at Whitsunday he had no other house taken, and for several days (until he got his present abode) he was neither tenant nor occupant of any house, but lodged at an inn in Stranraer. Until he entered his present abode his furniture was allowed to remain stored in his previous house.

The Sheriff-substitute (Rhind) repelled the objection.

The objector appealed.

Argued for him;—The occupation of the successive premises was not continuous.[1]

Argued for Kay;—The break of a few days during which the voter could not get a house was not sufficient to destroy his qualification.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—The present occupancy only began in June last. In order to have the qualification, the claimant founds, and must found, on his previous occupancy, under the 13th section of the Act of 1868. But he cannot found upon that occupancy unless it immediately precedes his present occupancy. If he had had another house ready taken when he left his former house it would not have affected his right to be enrolled that he had delayed for some days to enter his new house while it was being cleaned or papered, nor if he had actually gone to the new house would it have destroyed his vote that the missives of lease had not been made out or signed for a few days. But in this case he was neither tenant nor occupier of any house for some days. There was a distinct break in the occupancy. We must therefore reverse the Sheriff-substitute's decision, and expunge the name of John Kay from the roll.

LORD ORMIDALE and LORD CRAIGHILL concurred.

THE COURT reversed the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, and sustained the objection.

MAITLAND & LYON, W.S.—MILLAR, ALLARDICE, ROBSON, & INNES, W.S.—Agents.

---

[1] Gray v. Swanson, Dec. 19, 1868, 7 Macph. 328, 41 Scot. Jur. 192; Brown v. Blackwood, Oct. 20, 1869, 8 Macph. 48, 42 Scot. Jur. 16; Waddell v. M'Phail, Dec. 2, 1865, 4 Macph. 130, 38 Scot. Jur. 79.

No. 8.
Nov. 9, 1874.
Douglas v. Adair.

WILLIAM DOUGLAS, Claimant and Appellant.—M'Laren.
JOHN MACKIE ADAIR, Objector and Respondent.—Scott—R. V. Campbell.

Franchise—Lease, Objection to Title of Granter of.—Objection to a person claiming to be enrolled as tenant and occupant of subjects that the granter of the lease under which he held had several years before executed a disposition omnium bonorum for behoof of creditors, and had not been retrocessed, repelled.

Question, whether an inquiry into the author's title, where the qualification of the claimant is sufficient, and his possession instructed, is competent in the Registration Court.

Registration Appeal Court. B.

DOUGLAS claimed to be placed on the roll of voters for the burgh of Stranraer, as joint tenant and occupant of workshops and foundry, which were entered in the current valuation-roll as worth £20 per annum.

He produced a lease of the premises for three years from Whitsunday 1870, and another, dated September 1873, for nineteen years, from Whitsunday 1873, bearing to be granted to the claimant and his brother by John Douglas senior, proprietor of the subjects. He and his brother had occupied the premises for some years.

Adair objected that John Douglas senior had no title to grant a lease of the subjects, he having in 1860 granted a disposition omnium bonorum for behoof of creditors. Copies of the disposition and of the notarial instrument upon the same were produced.

It was not proved that Mr Douglas senior had not settled all claims due by him when he granted the disposition omnium bonorum, and on the other hand it was not proved that he had been retrocessed.

The Sheriff-substitute (Rhind) rejected the claim.

The claimant appealed.

Argued for him;—The objection to the granter's title was incompetent in the Registration Court, and, further, it was unfounded, because a trust for behoof of creditors did not divest the granter.[1]

Argued for the objector;—So long as the disposition stood, the claimant's right was defeasible, and could not confer the franchise.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I think this a good claim. The law on the subject of the effect of a disposition omnium bonorum by the author of the claimant might involve a question of subtlety, but there is no necessity here for going into that question. The claimant himself is, and has been for the necessary period, in occupation of the premises under a lease, with entry at Whitsunday 1873. He has paid the rates and taxes thereon, and he had been previously in occupation of the premises. The disposition omnium bonorum was not by him, but by his author, John Douglas. It is dated in 1860, and it was not followed by any change of possession. An inquiry into the author's title, where the qualification of the claimant is sufficient, and his possession instructed, is very rarely permitted in the Registration Court, and under the circumstances of this case the objection is not well founded.

LORD ORMIDALE.—The objection in this case is that the party who granted the lease in question had no power to do so, in respect that although he may have retained the radical right he had so long ago as 1860 executed a disposi

[1] Campbell of Edderline, Jan. 14, 1801, F.C. and M. "Adjudication," App. No. 11; Lockhart v. Wingate, Feb. 19, 1819, F.C.

No. 8.

Nov. 9, 1874.
Douglas v. Adair.

tion omnium bonorum for behoof of his creditors, and that the voter has not shewn that all the creditors have been paid. I doubt very much the competency of going into such a question as this in the Registration Court. It appears to me to be sufficient, having regard to the necessarily summary procedure of the Registration Court, that the voter here has been in possession of the subjects for the requisite time with the knowledge of the trustee under the disposition omnium bonorum, without any challenge of his right. The presumption is, looking at the lapse of time, and as this property is worth £20 a-year, that all the creditors have been paid, otherwise their trustee would have proceeded to vindicate and realise the property for their behoof. In the circumstances, I think the objection untenable.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I concur. It would require a great deal of authority to shew that the validity of the title of the granter of the lease could be gone into in the Registration Court.

Even supposing such an inquiry competent, I am not satisfied that the title is bad. The disposition was after all only a burden on the title of the granter, and he was left in the administration of the property.

THE COURT reversed the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, and repelled the objection.

MILLAR, ALLARDICE, ROBSON, & INNES, W.S.—MAITLAND & LYON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 9.

Nov. 9, 1874.
Adair v. Murray.

JOHN MACKIE ADAIR, Objector and Appellant.—Scott—R. V. Campbell.
CHARLES MURRAY, Respondent.—M'Laren.

Burgh Franchise—Dwelling-House.—A man who took his meals in his father's house, and generally slept there, rented a small room in the same tenement at 12s. per annum, in respect of which he was separately rated for the relief of the poor, and in which he occasionally slept. Held that he was not entitled to the burgh franchise as tenant and occupier of the room.

Registration Appeal Court. B.

JOHN ADAIR, solicitor, Stranraer, objected to the name of Charles Murray being continued on the roll of voters for the burgh of Stranraer. Murray stood enrolled as "inhabitant occupier as tenant of dwelling-house in Glen Street."

The following were the facts stated in the special case:—"Murray became, at Whitsunday 1873, tenant of a room in a house in Glen Street, at the yearly rent of 12s., by agreement with the factor of the proprietor. The said room was situated at the top of a stair in the house, and was about nine feet long by six feet wide, and had a window, but no fireplace. The voter's father was tenant and occupant of a room and kitchen on the ground floor of the said house, and was enrolled a voter as such. The voter, who was unmarried, resided with his father in the latter's house, getting all his meals there, and mostly sleeping there. When he did not sleep there, he slept in the room of which he was tenant, and in which there was a bed and some other articles belonging to him. He did not use the room in any other way. No one had any right to use or occupy, or did use or occupy, the room in any way except himself. He paid his rent half-yearly, and held regular receipts therefor from the landlord's factor. He was entered on the valuation-rolls of last year and of the present year as tenant and occupant of the said room at the annual value of 12s. He was in both years rated thereon to the relief of the poor, and had paid his rates for 1873, amounting to 6d., those for 1874 not being yet due.

No. 9.
Nov. 9, 1874.
Adair v. Murray.

The Sheriff-substitute (Rhind) repelled the objection.

The objector appealed.

Argued for him;—A dwelling-house was where a man dwelt. However small it might be, it must be a separate dwelling-house. The voter, in reality, lived with his father.

Argued for Murray;—The room in question satisfied all the requirements of the Act of 1868.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I am afraid this is not a very good example of the species of franchise here claimed, or of the manner in which a qualification for the franchise can be arranged. A single room may, no doubt, be a separate dwelling-house, but I do not think that this room can be so regarded. The first element is the smallness of the rent, 12s. Then, there is the absence of a fireplace, which is not perhaps absolutely necessary to constitute a dwelling-house, but it is a usual feature to give to a room the usual character of a dwelling-house. We are told that there is a bed in the room, in which the voter occasionally sleeps, and some other articles belonging to him. But we are not told what these articles are; it is not said that there is even a chest of drawers, or a table, or any other article of the nature of furniture. So far as it appears, this is merely an empty room, with a bed and some minor articles, not named or described, in it. The residence of the man, the general occupancy of this man, is of another room, and in another house.

I am, therefore, for reversing the Sheriff-substitute's decision.

LORD ORMIDALE.—I am of the same opinion. And I may say that I find sufficient grounds for decision in the statement in the special case, to the effect that the voter resides with his father in the latter's house, getting all his meals there, and mostly sleeping there. His father's house, therefore, must be held to be the house in which he dwells. It is not enough for the purposes of the franchise that a man occasionally goes into a small room little better than a box to sleep, and calls that his dwelling-house. A dwelling-house must be a place where, in a substantial and reasonable sense, the man lives, and not a small apartment in which he occasionally sleeps. It is, no doubt, stated that the apartment referred to is rated for the poor, but I cannot regard it for this reason alone as a separate dwelling-house, which it must be in order to constitute a qualification for the franchise.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I concur. It is clear that Murray is not an inhabitant occupier. He is an inhabitant non-occupier.

THE COURT reversed the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, and sustained the objection.

MAITLAND & LYON, W.S.—MILLAR, ALLARDICE, ROBSON, & INNES, W.S.—Agents.

No. 10.
Nov. 9, 1874.
Hewat v. Henderson.

RICHARD HEWAT, Objector and Appellant.—Muirhead.
JAMES HENDERSON, Respondent.—Mackay.

Franchise—Poor-Rates—Arrears—Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868, sections 3 and 6.—Held (diss. Lord Craighill) that the poor-rates, which, under sections 3 and 6 of the Representation of the People (Scotland)

No. 10.

Nov. 9, 1874.

Hewat v. Henderson.

Registration Appeal Court. B.

Act, 1868, it is necessary that an inhabitant occupier should have paid before the 20th June of the qualifying year, are only the rates which have become payable by him during the year ending with the preceding 15th of May.

RICHARD HEWAT objected to the name of James Henderson, tenant of house, King Street, Castle Douglas, being retained upon the roll of voters for the stewartry of Kirkcudbright, on the ground that Henderson was in arrear of poor-rates, which had been assessed on him in respect of the house on which he was registered, and offered to prove the same.

The special case set forth that the said James Henderson had paid all poor-rates that had become payable by him in respect of said house for the year up to the 15th day of May 1874. The objector offered to prove that Henderson was in arrear of poor-rates which had been assessed on him for the said house for the years 1869-70 and 1870-71. Henderson's agent offered to prove that there were no arrears of poor-rates, and tendered certain receipts in proof of his averment.

The Sheriff-substitute (Nicolson) refused to allow any proof on the question raised by the objector, and repelled the objection.

Hewat appealed.

The question of law for decision of the Court was—"Whether the payment of all poor-rates for the year ending 15th May 1874 is sufficient to entitle the voter to have his name retained on the register of voters, irrespective of any question regarding arrears for former years?"

In the course of the debate some discussion took place upon the refusal by the Sheriff-substitute to take evidence as to whether or not there were any arrears of poor-rates due by the voter, and the competency of a remit to the Sheriff-substitute to take evidence on the point. The Court expressed a doubt whether the Sheriff-substitute had power to sit again and take evidence.

Argued for the appellant;—Nothing could be plainer than the words of the Act of 1868 (sections 3 and 6), that it was a necessary qualification for the franchise that an occupant should have paid all poor-rates that had become payable by him in respect of the premises that gave the qualification up to the preceding 15th of May. It was impossible to limit the application of the proviso to poor-rates for one year. The respondent relied upon the English case of Cull v. Austin.[1] The English Act[2] was expressed in different terms, and from some specialties in the English system of levying the rates not much assistance could be derived from English authorities on the point. But in Abel v. Lee,[3] the Court of Common Pleas expressed opinions favourable to the view maintained by the objector. The object of the provision was evidently to secure that no person should be admitted to the franchise who had not performed the duties incumbent upon him as a citizen, and this object would be to a large extent defeated, if it was in the power of a man to obtain the franchise, by paying up his poor-rates for one year on the eve of an election. Difficulties were suggested in the working of the Act, if it embraced arrears of poor-rates. But these difficulties were exaggerated. The statute did not require an occupant to be traced from one part of the country to another, in order to find out whether there were arrears of poor-rates due by him. The statute did not go beyond poor-rates payable in respect of the dwelling-house, or lands and heritages, as the case might

[1] June 3, 1872, L. R. 7 C. P. 227.
[2] 30 and 31 Vict. c. 102 (Representation of the People Act, 1867).
[3] Jan. 19, 1871, L. R. 6 C. P. 365.

No. 10.

Nov. 9, 1874.
Hewat v. Henderson.

be, which gave the qualification. Even if the difficulties were much greater, they could not over-ride the express words of the statute.

Argued for the respondent;—"All poor-rates (if any) payable up to the preceding 15th day of May" in the 3d and 6th sections of the Act of 1868, meant rates due for the qualifying year. There might be more than one rate in one year—8 and 9 Vict. c. 83, sec. 41. Abel v. Lee was a special case, and the dicta of the Judges, so far as they imply the necessity of payment of arrears had been overruled by Cull v. Austin. It would be absurd to hold that arrears need not be paid under the English Act of 1867, and must be paid under the Scotch Act of 1868. These Acts being in pari materia, and substantially in the same terms, must receive the same construction. The construction contended for by the objector would make the Act unworkable. By the 18th section the collector of poor-rates was required to deliver to the assessor a list of the persons who had failed to pay all poor-rates (if any) that had become payable by them up to the preceding 15th of May. According to the objector's construction this list must extend back for forty years. Moreover, the objector's construction involved this anomaly, that it gave a premium on change of residence. A man who had remained many years in the occupancy of the same premises would be disqualified if he had left one poor-rate unpaid, whereas a man who had changed his residence would only be required to pay the poor-rate for the qualifying year.

At advising,—*

Lord Ardmillan.—The voter possesses the qualification required by law. He has paid the poor-rates exigible for the house which he occupies, and payable for the year of qualification, and up to the 15th of May. The objection—the only objection—is, that he has failed to pay an arrear of poor-rates, or poor-rates exigible for some previous year. The question is interesting and important, and turns on the construction of the 3d and 6th sections of the Act of 1868. There is no doubt about the obligation to pay poor-rates, nor about the right and power to enforce payment of arrears of poor-rates. No such question is here raised. The statute deals with no such question. This objection touches no such question. The words "arrear," or "bygone rates," or "past due rates," do not occur in these 3d and 6th sections, but are said to be brought in by construction. Is the 3d section or 6th section of this Act to be construed so as to include not only the poor-rates exigible for the qualifying year up to 15th May, but also all previous poor-rates for all previous years, that is to say, all arrears? If the Act says so expressly, cadit quæstio; the Act must be enforced. If it does not say so expressly, then can we reach that result by construction, that is by endeavouring to ascertain a meaning in the statute implied though not expressed? The Act we are construing bears to be "An Act for the Amendment of the Representation of the People in Scotland." The preamble makes this clear. It is undoubtedly an Act for extending the franchise. Therefore, it is an Act for amending representation by extending the franchise; and it must be construed as an enfranchising Act, and as an amending Act. There are some important canons of construction of statutes which should be kept in mind in entering on the interpretation. 1st, That must be the truest exposition of a law which

* The Court intimated that their decision was applicable to a number of cases relating to the burgh franchise in which the same objection had been taken.

No. 10.
Nov. 9, 1874.
Hewat v. Henderson.

best harmonises with its design, its objects, and its general structure. These are the words of Vatell, quoted by Dwarris (p. 556), and referred to in some of the great English authorities. 2d, A statute should be construed so as to suppress the evil and advance the remedy. 3d. An amending Act is a remedial Act, and should be construed liberally. 4th. A statute pro bono publico should be construed so as to attain the end proposed—(Dwarris, 618). All of these principles or canons of construction are here appropriate and important. Where statutory words are clear and express there is no room for construction. The words must receive effect. But where construction is required the rules of construction must not be overlooked.

It appears to me impossible to maintain here that the 3d clause in this Act of 1868 is so clear and express as not to admit of doubt, and not to require construction.

Then there is no precedent or authority to support, and no practice to sustain the objection which has here been taken.

This is a new point, which in Scotland, so far as I know, or have heard suggested at the bar, has not hitherto been brought under judicial consideration; while in England, the latest, clearest, and most authoritative decision on the corresponding provisions of the English Act is opposed to this objection.

The case of Cull v. Austin in 1872 is really conclusive of this question under the English Act. It was there decided in the Court of Common Pleas, that, in support of such an objection as this, the objector must prove non-payment of a rate laid on in the previous year, and payable in the qualifying year. Arrears before that date are not taken into account. In the previous case of Abel v. Lee in 1871, also under the English Act, the point raised was somewhat different, for the course of the rate not paid ran into the commencement of the qualifying year. In the earlier case there are obiter dicta favourable to the objection. But the decision did not require them; and in the more recent case of Cull v. Austin the previous case of Abel v. Lee was quoted and considered, and a unanimous decision was pronounced against the objection urged, as here, in respect of non-payment of arrears. It is to be observed that Mr Justice Willes concurred in both decisions.

On such a question, arising on the construction of corresponding clauses in enfranchising Acts, it would be unfortunate if the law were different in Scotland from what it is in England. I do not think it is different.

The leading enactment in the 3d and in the 6th sections of this Act of 1868 is clear and general and enfranchising. "Every man" who, in the qualifying year, has a certain qualification during that year, is entitled to be registered as a voter, and to vote. That the claimant is qualified is not doubted. A proviso, which forms an exception or deduction from the enfranchising words, follows—(reads). The premises are those occupied for the year. The objector candidly avowed that he put no limit in point of time on his objection. He maintained that an unpaid rate for any year, though ten or twenty or twenty-five years ago, operates as a disqualification. I cannot arrive at that conclusion. I think it rests on an interpretation opposed to all the canons of construction to which I have adverted.

There is a period within which under this Act all the elements of qualification, or of disqualification, must be found, and that period is twelve months back from the last day of July in the year of the claim. Back beyond that period we do not pass. To that period, as co-extensive, commensurate, with the period of qualification, I think that the clause, when fairly construed, limits inquiry into the payment of poor-rates.

No. 10.
Nov. 9, 1874.
Hewat v. Henderson.

A case was put for the respondent which well illustrates this. Successive occupancy sustains a qualification otherwise good. It was admitted, and rightly, that failure to pay arrears of poor-rates on another house previously occupied, does not disqualify. The rate must be "in respect of said dwelling-house," not of a former house. Now, observe to what an absurd and unjust conclusion the sustaining the present objection would lead. The man who has changed his house, and had successive occupation, would not be disfranchised. The man who has not changed his house would lose the franchise,—the arrears of poor-rates being common to both. The failure,—the same in both cases,—would be innocuous in the one case, and fatal in the other case.

Nothing but express words in the Act could support an objection leading to such a result. To sustain the objection without express words, and merely on construction of words requiring construction, would, in my view, be unreasonable, and in opposition to sound principles of construction.

I think that the provisions in the 17th, 18th, and 19th sections of the Act, and also the schedules C and D, tend to confirm the view which I take. The words are of course an echo of the 3d and the 6th clauses, but the working of the statute in regard to the notice, and the list, in these schedules, would be scarcely practicable if it were necessary that arrears for many years must be in every case inserted. In Glasgow it would be very difficult to work the Act. Arrears are not mentioned in the clause, or in the schedules. They may be recovered, but with that we have nothing to do here. This objection has never yet been sustained in Scotland. It has been repelled in England. After hearing a full and able argument on both sides, and after careful consideration of the question of construction, I am of opinion that the objection should be repelled here also.

Lord Ormidale.—I deem it unnecessary to follow your Lordship into a disquisition on the general principles and canons of construction which are applicable to the question now to be disposed of by the Court. I may say, however, that the views which your Lordship has expressed on that subject, as well as otherwise on the case, are so generally concurred in by me that any additional observations of mine may be considered as supplemental merely.

It would be an anomalous and somewhat startling result were it to be held that this statute, which we are now considering, has a construction in Scotland, which the Court of Common Pleas in England, after the fullest discussion and consideration, have denied to the corresponding statute in force in that country with substantially identical words. It is said, however, that while the Court of Common Pleas came to such a conclusion in Cull v. Austin, a different and opposite conclusion would appear to have been come to by the same Court in the case of Abel v. Lee. But it is not to be overlooked that the case of Cull v. Austin came after that of Abel v. Lee, and that in the latter the judgment was ex parte, no appearance having been made for the respondent. The case therefore of Cull v. Austin, besides being more in point, having regard to its circumstances, is clearly the more authoritative of the two.

We must not only keep in view the clauses of the Act of 1868, with which we have more immediately to deal, but the whole context of that statute, and the statutes incorporated with it; for the 58th section provides that the Act

No. 10.

Nov. 9, 1874.
Hewat v. Henderson.

"shall be construed as one with the enactments for the time being in force relating to the representation of the people in Scotland, and with the Registration and Valuation Acts." We are entitled therefore to read all these Acts along with the present, in order to see how far they affect the interpretation of the clause in question.

But, before doing so, let me advert to the words of the clause. Looked at by themselves merely, they would carry us back as far as it was possible for the Court to hold that poor-rates might remain unpaid. The words are plain in themselves; but are we bound or entitled so to deal with the statute? I think not. On the contrary, it appears to me that, not only the immediate context, but the whole Act, and not only the whole Act, but also the other Acts imported into it, as well as their objects, must be attended to, before the true construction of the particular clause in question can be arrived at.

The preliminary portion of the section provides for admission to the register of every man of full age, and not subject to any legal incapacity, "and who is, and has been for a period of not less than twelve calendar months next preceding the last day of July, an inhabitant occupier as owner or tenant of any dwelling-house within the burgh." Then we come to the proviso in question, that no man shall be entitled to be registered as a voter "who shall have failed to pay all poor-rates (if any) that have become payable by him in respect of said dwelling-house up to the preceding 15th May." What is the "said dwelling-house"? Surely that of which he has been "an inhabitant occupier as owner or tenant" for the "twelve calendar months next preceding the last day of July," as referred to in the earlier part of the clause. We have thus a construction of the proviso in question in the section itself, and, in my opinion, it is the only reasonable construction it is susceptible of.

We find further, in section 17, a provision for claims by persons improperly or erroneously exempted from payment of poor-rates; in section 18, a provision for notice to be sent to occupiers from whom any poor-rate is due; and in section 19, an enactment that the collector of poor-rates shall deliver to the assessor a list of persons who have failed to pay all poor-rates that have become payable by them up to the preceding 15th of May. Now, these provisions would be unworkable if the collector went beyond the year that gives the qualification, and got into an inquiry extending back, it might be, to twenty or thirty years, or even longer. A person claiming to be admitted to the register every year for a very long period may have occupied different premises, and he may have been in a distant part of the country the year immediately before the qualifying one; but how can it be reasonably supposed that in such circumstances the statute means that it must be ascertained whether there were any arrears of poor-rates, not for the qualifying year only, but for all prior years?

Again, we must look at the County and Burgh Voters Acts, and also the Valuation Act. The objects of these Acts, so far as the registration of voters is concerned, is to establish a machinery by which parties are to be placed on the roll by public officers, independently of the parties themselves. The 34th section of the Valuation Act provides that the valuation-roll shall be conclusive of the value of lands and heritages. I refer to that section, because the valuation-roll is made up annually, indicating that the period during which the incidents of the qualification are to be inquired into is limited to a year.

Again, the 2d section of the Burgh Voters Act provides for lists of voters to be made by the assessor, and without going into further details all its provisions

No. 10.
Nov. 9, 1874.
Hewat v. Henderson.

proceed upon the footing that the public officer is to confine his inquiries to one year.

This brings us back to the provision in the Act of 1868, requiring the collector to send to the assessor a list of persons in arrear with their poor-rates. The assessor is to get his information through the medium of another public officer, viz., the collector of poor-rates. The inference is strong that, as the assessor does not require to go back more than a year, neither does the collector.

The Acts of Parliament to which I have now referred, as well as the whole spirit of the statute of 1868, thus tend to shew that the true construction of the clause in question is that it applies only to poor-rates unpaid for the qualifying year. The reason of the thing tends in the same direction. The statute, being an enfranchising one, ought to be liberally dealt with, and we must take care that we place no obstruction in the way of persons getting on the roll which the statute does not authorise.

On the whole, having regard to the considerations I have now alluded to, as well as those which have been more fully stated by your Lordship, I feel myself able satisfactorily to concur in the proposed judgment.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—There is difficulty in this question, and difference of opinion cannot create surprise though it may be cause for regret. After anxious consideration of all which has been brought under our notice, the conclusion to which I have come is that non-payment of poor-rates payable by the person claiming in respect of the premises on which, as occupant, he seeks to be enrolled for any year of his occupation, is a disqualification, and, consequently, that in this case the name of the voter should be expunged.

Let me say, in the outset, that the question for our decision appears to me to be entirely unaffected by anything which has been decided either here or in England. No Scotch decision was cited, presumably because none is to be found, and the English decisions which were brought up appear to me to be inapplicable, because the provisions of the English Act 30 and 31 Vict. cap. 102, touching the present question, are materially different from the provisions of the Scotch Act 31 and 32 Vict. cap. 48, which we are now called upon to interpret.

It is also right to explain that, in my view of the matter, the consideration that this is the first occasion on which the present question has been raised for the decision of the Court creates, as I think, no presumption either in favour of or adverse to the alleged disqualification. Those who, previous to 1868, were entitled to the franchise were not members of a class likely to be in arrear with poor-rates, and besides, for anything which appears, the probability is as great that no one in arrear has claimed since 1868 as that a person in occupation of premises affording a qualification has claimed, and has, without objection, been enrolled while in arrear.

Last of all, the suggestion of hardship is not entitled, in a question like the present, to serious consideration. If a person entitled to be a voter cannot pay poor-rates he ought to ask to be and he will be excused, but for the year or years in which he is so excused he will lose the benefit of his occupation. If, on the other hand, he can pay, and nevertheless refuses to pay, the consequence of his refusal is not a thing of which he can fairly complain, inasmuch as the loss of the franchise for the time is due to his wilful disregard of an incumbent obligation.

No. 10.
Nov. 9, 1874.
Hewat v. Henderson.

Passing from these preliminary considerations, the reasons for the opinion which I have expressed will now be briefly stated. The first is, that the words submitted for interpretation are in themselves perfectly plain. The second is, that their natural meaning is not limited nor controlled by other expressions or provisions; and the third is that, on the contrary, the meaning which I ascribe to the words is suggested, or at any rate is countenanced, by the context, as well as by provisions to be found elsewhere in the statute.

Taking these in their order,—Could words be plainer than "All poor-rates, if any, that have become payable by him in respect of said dwelling-house up to the preceding 15th of May"? There is but one answer which, as I think, can be given to this question. Plainer words could not be used. Not one of them is of doubtful meaning. To be sure it has been urged that "up to the 15th day of May" implies that in construing the clause we are not to go beyond the year of which this month of May forms a part. But no reason which does not involve a begging of the question to be decided has been offered for such a limitation. In short, the plain and natural meaning of the words, if they are to be restricted, can be restricted only by shewing that there are expressions or provisions elsewhere in the statute which have the same effect as if words had been used in the clause by which it was expressly enacted that the poor-rates unpaid which were to operate as a disqualification were poor-rates payable only for the year prior to 15th May antecedent to the time at which the claim to the franchise was to be decided.

And this leads me, in the second place, to repeat that, as I think, there are no such counteracting expressions or provisions. The only thing which was suggested by the counsel for the respondent was the difficulty of giving the notice which, upon my interpretation of the clause, would be required when poor-rates had for years remained unpaid. But I am not satisfied that any difficulty could or would be experienced, and, even were this otherwise, it could not be so regarded as to involve the result that words which in themselves are unambiguous are to be read otherwise than as having their plain natural meaning.

In the third place, the context and the relative provisions in the Act 31 and 32 Vict. cap. 48, satisfy me that the natural meaning of the words is the true one. Take, first of all, the positive enactment "that every man shall in and after 1868 be entitled to be registered as a voter who is and has been for a period not less than twelve calendar months next preceding the last day of July an inhabitant occupier as owner or tenant of any dwelling-house within the burgh." Here there is a minimum period for qualification, but the occupation founded on in the claim may be of longer duration. How long it may be is not defined; it must be for a year at least, and whether longer or shorter "all rates" payable by the claimant in respect of his dwelling-house behove to be paid. The substantive enactment and this proviso are, as I read them, of equal comprehension. Further, there is a limitation as to time in the immediately preceding proviso. No man is entitled to be registered as a voter who at any time during the said period of twelve calendar months" shall have been exempted from payment of poor-rates. There is a similar proviso in the subsequent words of the clause—"No man shall be entitled to be registered as a voter who shall have been in the receipt of parochial relief within the twelve calendar months next preceding the said last day of July." What is the reasonable inference from the omission of limiting words in the intermediate provision

No. 10.

Nov. 9, 1874.
Hewat v. Henderson.

unless that no limitation was intended? Finally, the form of notice in schedule C appears to me to be irreconcilable with a different interpretation. Those for whom it is intended are persons by whom all the poor-rates which have become due from them in respect of such premises up to the 15th day of May last have not been paid. This is a notice intended not for the learned but in most cases for the uneducated, not for lawyers accustomed to scan Acts of Parliament, that what seems the plain meaning of words may be evaded, but for persons who take words presented to them in their natural and ordinary meaning. And this being the case, it is hardly conceivable that the poor-rates, the non-payment of which they were informed would be a disqualification, were only the poor-rates for a year not specified, and not the poor-rates for every year of their occupation of the premises which remained unpaid.

THE COURT affirmed the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute.

TODS, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—LINDSAY, HOWE, TYTLER, & Co., W.S.—Agents.

No. 11.

Oct. 15, 1874.
Crawford v. Field.

ROBERT CRAWFORD, Pursuer.—D.-F. Clark—Asher.
THOMAS FIELD, Defender.—Marshall—J. P. B. Robertson.

Superior and Vassal.—A proprietor granted a feu of a piece of ground described as bounded on three sides by A Street, B Street, and C Street, with free ish and entry by all roads or streets made and to be made for the use of the feuars. A plan drawn upon the back of the feu-contract, and signed as relative thereto, shewed the streets, but this plan was not referred to in the deed. At its date only one of the three streets had been formed. The vassal was taken bound to pay a proportionate part of the cost of making the streets. In a question between the feuar and the superior held that the vassal was entitled to ish and entry by the ground upon which the proposed streets were to be formed, and that the erection of wooden buildings on the site of one of the proposed streets by the superior was an invasion of the vassal's right.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Gifford. M.

THIS was an action at the instance of Robert Crawford, distiller in Leith, against Thomas Field of Bowling Green, containing a conclusion that "the defender is not entitled to occupy, with buildings or other erections or enclosures, the solum of Burlington Street, opposite the warehouse belonging to the pursuer situated on the east side of Bangor Road, Leith."

In 1864, by feu-contract, the defender sold, alienated, and in feu-farm disponed, to and in favour of Thomas Bernard, "All and Whole that area of ground containing 27 poles imperial measure, being part of the defender's property of Bowling Green, Leith, bounded as follows:—On the north by the area of ground feued to Andrew Morton, ironfounder, on the west by Bangor Road, on the east by Albert Road, and on the south by Burlington Street, and including the wall built upon the said area of ground, and forming the south boundary thereof, with free ish and entry to the said area of ground by all the roads or streets made, or to be made, by the defender for the use and accommodation of his feuars at Bowling Green." The contract farther stipulated that the feuar should be bound to pay a proportion of the expense of maintaining the streets and roadways leading to said area of ground, and the said property of Bowling Green, until the same should be taken over as public streets and roads, and assessed for as such. A plan was drawn upon the back of the feu-contract, in which the area and the streets were delineated, and was signed by the defender as relative to the feu-contract. Mr Bernard erected upon the ground so feued to him by the defender a large warehouse. The warehouse was entered by a door opening into Bangor Road, and was lighted

No. 11.

Oct. 15, 1874. Crawford v. Field.

by windows looking into Burlington Street, which had been only partially formed.

In 1867 an agreement was entered into between Bernard, a Mr Philip, and the defender that Albert Road should not be formed. Philip then obtained from the defender a feu of part of Albert Road, and agreed to give part of it to Bernard in consideration of his consenting to renounce his servitude right over Albert Road.

The defender then granted a feu-right to Philip, including in it the whole solum of Albert Road, and Philip then conveyed the half of it to Bernard by disposition dated 19th December 1867.

In 1873 Bernard conveyed the subjects belonging to him to Crawford, the pursuer, with the whole rights and privileges thereto belonging.

The defender had erected certain buildings of wood on the site of the intended street, named Burlington Street, and so shut up the access from the pursuer's feu and obstructed the lights of the warehouse erected on it.

The pursuer pleaded;—The buildings and erections complained of are an invasion of the pursuer's rights under the said charter, and are illegal and unwarrantable.

The defender pleaded;—The intended street called Burlington Street not having been formed, and there being no obligation upon the defender to form said street, at all events in hoc statu, the pursuer cannot interfere with the defender in the use of his lands by temporary erections of the kind complained of.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that, according to the true import and effect of the writs and titles granted by him, the defender is not entitled to occupy or enclose the solum of Burlington Street, opposite to the warehouse belonging to the pursuer, so as to prevent the pursuer from having the use of the solum of Burlington Street opposite said warehouse: Therefore finds, declares, decerns, and ordains in terms of the conclusions of the action: Finds the pursuer entitled to expenses," &c.*

---

* "NOTE.—In the view which the Lord Ordinary takes of this case the question is, what is the true import, nature, and effect of the feu-contracts or agreements of feu which the defender, Mr Field, entered into with his vassals? What did the parties to the feu-charters undertake to each other on the one side and on the other? What obligations are expressed, and what are necessarily implied?

"There are no questions in the present case as between singular successors, and there are none as to how far conditions of feu have been created real burdens on the property, for the question really is between the contracting parties themselves. The defender, Mr Field, is himself the granter of both the feu-charters in question, and the pursuer, although not the original feuar under these feu-charters, comes exactly in place of the original feuars, and is bound in precisely the same manner as they would have been.

"The feu-charters involved in the present question are two: (1) The feu-charter by the defender to Thomas Bernard, 29th June 1864, of the ground on which the pursuer's warehouse is now erected; and (2) The feu-charter by the defender to John Philip, 19th December 1867. The pursuer is now in right of the whole subject contained in the first feu-charter and of a portion of the ground embraced in the second. The question mainly turns upon the terms of the first feu-contract. By this deed the present defender feued to Thomas Bernard, the pursuer's author, an area of ground therein mentioned, which is described as bounded as follows:—'On the north by the area of ground feued by me to Andrew Morton, ironfounder, on the west by Bangor Road, on the east by Albert Road, and on the south by Burlington Street, and including the wall built upon the said area of ground, and forming the south boundary thereof, ... with free ish and entry to the said area of ground by all the roads or streets

No. 11.
Oct. 15, 1874.
Crawford v. Field.

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—The description in the title was merely to shew the boundaries, and imposed no obligation on the superior made or to be made by me for the use and accommodation of my feuars at Bowling Green.'

"At the date of this feu-charter the defender, Mr Field, was, and still is, proprietor and superior not only of the area feued, but of the whole ground around it on all sides. In particular, he was and is proprietor of the solum of the three streets by which the area is described as bounded on the east, south, and west sides. The north side is bounded by another feu granted by the defender. It is said that at the date of the charter only one of these streets, Bangor Road, was partially formed; but, however this may be, there is really no doubt about any of the streets, for, upon the back of the feu-charter, and signed by the defender himself, there is a very distinct plan of the feu, drawn to scale, shewing very completely Bangor Road, Albert Road, and Burlington Street, as bounding the feu on three sides thereof. It is said that this plan is not mentioned in the feu-charter as signed relative thereto. But if there was any force in this very technical objection, it is obviated by another plan annexed to Philip's feu-contract, in right of which the pursuer also is, and which is specially signed by the defender as relative to, the deed. Both plans shew all the streets in question, particularly Burlington Street, which is the pursuer's south boundary. It is perfectly plain, therefore, that the pursuer and his author took their feu and have built thereon, on the faith that it was to be bounded on three sides by the three streets specially named and described, and specially and precisely laid down on the signed plans annexed to the feu-charters.

"Now, the question is, can a superior, after granting such feu-charters and getting expensive subjects erected on the faith thereof,—it might be villas or shop property,—block up, without his vassal's consent, all or any of the streets bounding the feu on the faith of which the vassals had built, and free ish and entry by which he has expressly granted? It is vain to say the superior is leaving Bangor Road untouched, and only blocking up one side of the pursuer's feu, for if the superior has a right to block up one of the streets why not any of the streets, or why not all of them? And nothing can turn upon the fact, if it be the fact, that Bangor Road was partially formed at the date of the feu, whereas Burlington Street was not. In a question with the superior himself nothing can turn on such accidental circumstance. The pursuer says that Bangor Road was only formed the length of Morton's, that is, of a previous feu. The Lord Ordinary has allowed no proof of these facts, as he does not think them material to the issue.

"The Lord Ordinary is very clearly of opinion that, under feu-contracts like the present, the superior was bound, in common sense as well as in common fairness and honesty, at least to leave open the street ways by which his vassals' property was surrounded. It is true there is no obligation on the superior to make or form the streets, that is, to causeway or pave them, and he is not asked to do so, but at all events he must leave them open, and not cover them with buildings. The vassal would never have taken the feu had it not been surrounded by these streets. Its value was, or at all events might be greatly enhanced by its triple frontage, and it is out of the question for the pursuer to offer to prove that the true front only faces Bangor Road. The vassal is entitled to shift his front at pleasure and face any way he pleases, or, if he prefers, to face three ways at once. The pursuer was clearly entitled to make a gateway or access by Burlington Street. He is entitled to do so yet at any time—it is part of his contract. But this would be impossible if the defender is to be allowed to cover the solum of Burlington Street even with temporary buildings, and for an indefinite time. The same may be said of the pursuer's lights. He is entitled to have a street-way, and therefore uninterrupted lights on three sides of his feu. The Lord Ordinary thinks that the defender's offer to prove an 'understanding' that Burlington Street should not be made till a certain watercourse was drained is incompetent. Admittedly there is no obligation on any one to drain the watercourse, and nobody can tell when it will be drained.

No. 11.

Oct. 15, 1874.
Crawford v. Field.

to form a street. The ground belonged still to him, and he was entitled to use it in any way that did not injure his neighbours. At all events, even if it were held that the superior was bound to form a street, he was not bound to form it at once.[1]

The pursuer argued;—Although the vassal was not entitled to enforce the obligation to have the streets constructed at once he was entitled to have the ground reserved for the purposes undertaken in the feu-contract. He had an interest to have space left vacant for light and air round his warehouse. Besides, he was entitled to ish and entry by the site of Burlington Street, even although it had not been made into a road.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a question between superior and vassal, and it seems to me that one class of the cases cited to us has no application—I mean that class of which the Trustees of Free St Mark's v. Taylor (7 Macph. 415) is the most prominent, where there are two parties deriving right from a common author, and under no obligation that is not imposed in the title. The question here is whether there is any agreement, express or implied, to form these streets, and whether that obligation is binding on the superior now—not as an obligation immediately prestable, but at some time or other to form roads or streets, and meantime to reserve ground for that purpose. Every case of this kind depends on the terms of the titles, and I think the Lord Ordinary was quite right in not allowing the inquiry which was asked for. The feu-charter in favour of Mr Bernard gives a subject which is described as bounded "on the west by Bangor Road, on the east by Albert Road, and on the south by Burlington Street," and on the north by another feu. Now, it is said on behalf of the defender that this subject, at the time when the feu was given off, had no frontage except to Bangor Road, because that was the only street which had been formed at that time. But it seems to me that if it had been "On the short ground, therefore, of clearly implied contract, the Lord Ordinary holds the defender bound to leave the solum of Burlington Street unoccupied opposite the pursuer's property. He thinks the pursuer may himself pave or causeway Burlington Street at that point whenever he pleases. As to Albert Road, the principle has been recognised, for it has been shut up only by consent of everybody interested, and to these arrangements the defender was a party.

"The case chiefly relied upon by the defender was that of the Trustees of Free St Mark's v. Taylor and Others, 26th January 1869, 7 Macph. 415, 41 Scot. Jur. 232, but the cases are entirely different. Free St Mark's case was a case arising between singular successors deriving through a common author. It was a question there, not only whether real servitudes had been constituted, but whether mutual obligations towards each other had been effectually laid upon adjoining or conterminous feuars or vassals, and it was also a question how far the mention of an intended or projected street was really intended to bind any of the parties absolutely to make that street. None of these points arise in the present case, which is one directly between superior and vassal, and simply concerns the interpretation of an express or implied obligation. In the case of Dennistoun v. Thomson, 22d November 1872, 11 Macph. 121, 45 Scot. Jur. 73, which arose subsequent to that of Free St Mark's, there are important observations explaining the decision in Free St Mark's case, and one of the streets involved in Dennistoun v. Thomson was very similarly circumstanced to Burlington Street, and an implied obligation to leave the solum open was found effectual and was enforced. The present, however, is in all respects an a fortiori case."

[1] Authorities besides the cases referred to in the Lord Ordinary's note.—Barr v. Robertson, July 12, 1854, 16 D., 1049, 26 Scot. Jur. p. 567; Carson v. Miller, March 13, 1863, 1 Macph. 604, 35 Scot. Jur. p. 357.

No. 11.

Oct. 15, 1874.
Crawford v. Field.

intended that Bangor Road should be the only access, the description of the subject would have been in very different terms, instead of describing it as bounded on three sides by streets. Then there occurs the clause "with free ish and entry to the said area of ground by all the roads or streets made or to be made by me for the use and accommodation of my feuars at Bowling Green." Now, if that clause had stood alone, and there had been nothing beyond it in the deed, and all we could have discovered about the superior's intention had been in the feuing plan, I should have said that this clause would not have given the feuar any right to any particular entry. But I think the meaning was to give him access by three roads, for in another part of the feu-charter there is laid on him an obligation to pay part of the expense of maintaining the streets and roadways "according to frontage." Now, I suspect the superior would be very unwilling to limit Mr Bernard's obligation to his frontage to Bangor Road, when, in fact, he would have all the frontage to Burlington Street as soon as that street was made; but what makes it quite clear to my mind is that there is a plan made for the purpose of this feu-charter. Now, it is quite true that the mere exhibition of a feuing plan imposes no obligation on the superior to make any particular road, or prevents him from altering the general plan unless it is expressly referred to in the charter. But here there is no reference at all. The plan was a special plan made for the purpose of this very feu-charter, and in it drawn to scale we have the streets laid down as part of the contract; it is a plan written into the charter. I think there is quite enough to shew an implied agreement to form these streets for the benefit of Mr Bernard and the other feuars. Then there is the matter of Albert Road, which I think throws a good deal of light on the views of the parties. The superior did not think he could supersede the formation of Albert Road without the consent of his vassals, and so he enters into an agreement with Philip and Bernard, by which it was agreed that the ground which had been intended for Albert Road should be feued to Philip, except a small part which Philip had to hand over to Bernard as the price of his consent to the abandonment of Albert Road. Mr Field would not have made that agreement unless he had thought that Bernard could have stopped him, nor would Philip have given up the ground. So it seems to me that this arrangement shews that Bernard had a jus quæsitum. It is not necessary to examine in detail all the expressions in the different deeds. I do not think the case is a doubtful one. There is quite enough to imply an agreement to set apart this ground for streets and roads, and I do not think the superior is in the meantime entitled to make any use of it inconsistent with that purpose.

Lord Deas.—There is no question here between singular successors in the superiority and singular successors in the property. All we have to consider is the fair construction of the contract between the superior and vassal. We have, first, to consider whether any right is given of ish and entry by these roads and streets, and if it is given, then we have to decide whether it is given immediately or only at a postponed period.

The argument founded on the roads and streets being declared the boundaries of the feu is a strong one. The superior describes the ground feued as bounded on three sides by what he calls roads or streets, and I do not see that he can dispute that these roads or streets are included in the privilege conferred of ish and entry. He might have described the ground as bounded on three sides by his other property, but that is not what he does.

No. 11.

Oct. 15, 1874.
Crawford v. Field.

With regard to the feuing plan I agree with your Lordship that a reference to a plan of the particular subject endorsed upon the feu-contract is a very different thing, as regards its effect, from a reference to a general feuing plan.

The other question is, whether the right is given immediately. The vassal gets "free ish and entry to the said area of ground by all the roads or streets made, or to be made by me, for the use and accommodation of my feuars at Bowling Green." Now, some difficulty may arise from the double sense in which the word "make" is used when applied to streets. To make a street often means to pave a street, and that, I think, is the sense in which the word is used here. A street may be of importance to the vassal although it is not made in the sense of being paved, or a road may be of importance to him although it is not made in the sense of being metalled. The space on which the street or road is to be formed may be important in the meantime for light and air. It may also be important for access although neither paved nor metalled. If the right given here is not a present right the superior may exclude the vassal from possession of the area feued till the streets or roads are paved or metalled. The vassal could not till then build upon or make any profitable use of that area. That cannot have been the meaning of the contract. I think the reference to making the roads or streets was really introduced with a view to the vassal's obligation to pay a proportion of the expense of maintaining these roads or streets until that expense should be provided for by public assessment. I can have no doubt at all events that the interlocutor is right.

LORD ARDMILLAN and LORD MURE concurred.

THE COURT adhered, with additional expenses.

M'EWEN & CARMENT, W.S.—JAMES SOMERVILLE, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 12.

Oct. 16, 1874.
Baird v. Glendinning.

SIR DAVID BAIRD, Bart., Petitioner and Respondent.—Blair.
PETER GLENDINNING, Respondent and Appellant.—J. P. B. Robertson.

Appeal—Sheriff-court Act, 1853, 16 and 17 Vict. c. 80, sec. 24.—In a petition for sequestration for rent in the Sheriff-court an interlocutor was pronounced, granting warrant on a judicial manager to make a payment to the petitioner. Held that this was to be regarded, in the circumstances, as an "interlocutor, giving interim decree for payment of money," in the sense of sec. 24 of the Sheriff-court Act of 1853, and that an appeal to the Court of Session was competent.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff-substitute of Haddington.
M.

THIS was a petition for sequestration for rent at the instance of Sir David Baird, Bart., against William Robertson, tenant of the farm of Whitekirk, and Peter Glendinning, the trustee on his bankrupt estate. The Sheriff-substitute appointed Mr James Ferguson Robertson to be judicial manager in the sequestration for rent, and subsequently pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Haddington, 30th April 1874.—The Sheriff-substitute having resumed consideration of this case, with the interim state of the intromissions of the judicial manager, approves of said state of intromissions so far as the judicial manager charges against the proceeds of the sales of the crop sequestrated the outlays made by him in labouring the farm in preparation for said crop: In respect the judicial manager has in his hands funds more than sufficient to meet the rent sequestrated for, due at the term of Candlemas, grants warrant to pay said rent to the petitioner, with the interest thereof, at the rate of £5 per centum per annum from the date at which the same became due till payment; appoints the judicial manager to state in his account of intromissions any bank interest he is paid or is charged with; and appoints this cause to be enrolled for further procedure, when the whole sequestrated effects have been realised."

No. 12.

Oct. 16, 1874. Baird v. Glendinning.

The respondent appealed to the Court of Session. When the case appeared in the Single Bills the petitioner objected that the action could not be appealed under the 24th section of the Sheriff-court Act of 1853. He maintained that it was not an "interlocutor giving interim decree for payment of money," nor was it a final interlocutor, as questions of the amount of interest to be charged required to be settled.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Sheriff-substitute has pronounced this interlocutor—"In respect the judicial manager has in his hands funds more than sufficient to meet the rent sequestrated for, due at the term of Candlemas last, grants warrant to pay said rent to the petitioner, with the interest thereof, at the rate of 5 per cent per annum from the date at which the same became due till payment: Appoints the judicial manager to state in his account of intromissions any bank interest he is paid or is charged with; and appoints this cause to be enrolled for further procedure when the whole sequestrated effects have been realised."

It is objected that this is not an appealable interlocutor under section 24th of the Sheriff-court Act, 1853. But, on the other hand, it is said that a warrant ordaining an officer of Court to pay money is equivalent to an interim decree for payment. In strict construction there can be no doubt that it does not fall under the section of the Act. But the question comes to be, whether under interim decree an interim warrant is included. I think that it is within the policy, and also the fair meaning, of the statute. This is the proper, and indeed the only form to effect a payment of money, when the money is in the hands of an officer of Court. The Court will not give decree against one of its own officers, but will only order him to do what is necessary. It would be very inconvenient if the statute did not extend to a warrant of this kind. I am, therefore, for repelling the objection.

LORD DEAS.—The question is whether this interim warrant for payment falls under the 24th section of the Sheriff-court Act. I am not prepared to lay it down that every warrant for payment of money is an appealable interlocutor, but looking to the nature of this case and to all the circumstances I do not differ from the view taken by your Lordship.

LORD ARDMILLAN and LORD MURE concurred.

THE COURT repelled the objection.

HUNTER, BLAIR, & COWAN, W.S.—THOMAS WHITE, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 13.

Oct. 17, 1874. Muir v. Muir.

2D DIVISION. Lord Mure. I.

WILLIAM HAMILTON MUIR AND ANOTHER, Pursuers.—Black—Balfour.
JOHN MUIR, Defender.—Dundas Grant.

Process—Reclaiming Note—Printing Record—Judicature Act, 1825, 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, sec. 18—A. S. 11*th July* 1828, sec. 77.—A defender was allowed to make extensive additions to the closed record, which introduced an entirely new defence, and formed the main subject of debate in the Outer-House. The Lord Ordinary having repelled the defences, the defender reclaimed, appending to the reclaiming note the print of the original record with the amendments in MS. Held that, considering the extent of the additions, this was not sufficient compliance with the terms of the Judicature Act and relative Act of Sederunt 11th July 1828, sec. 77, which require the record to be printed and boxed with the reclaiming note, and the reclaiming note refused as incompetent. No. 13. Oct. 17, 1874. Muir v. Muir.

W. H. MUIR, S.S.C.—JAMES BARTON, S.S.C.—Agents.

THE LORD ADVOCATE, on behalf of the Commissioners of H. M. Woods and Forests, Pursuer.—Sol.-Gen. Millar—Ivory.
WALTER M'CULLOCH, Defender.—D.-F. Clark—Marshall.

No. 14. Oct. 20, 1874. Lord Advocate v. M'Culloch.

Salmon-Fishing—Prescription—Possession—Barony.—In an action brought against a proprietor of lands on the sea-coast to establish the right of the Crown to salmon-fishings in the sea ex adverso of his lands, the defender's titles shewed that his lands had formed part of a barony, of which the earliest extant title was a crown charter of confirmation and novodamus, dated in 1584, of the lands and barony, with fishings. By feu-charter, dated in 1587, the lands in question were disponed, with pertinents, by the baron to the defender's ancestor, fishings being mentioned in the tenendas clause only, and upon this charter the disponee was infeft. It was proved that the defender and his ancestors had possessed the salmon-fishings in question from time immemorial.

Held that the crown charter of 1584 being a sufficient title to salmon-fishings, if followed by prescriptive possession, and such possession having followed, the Crown was equally divested whether that possession had been by the crown vassal himself or some one deriving right from him, and that it was jus tertii for the Crown to found upon any defect, if such existed, in the transmission of the right from the crown vassal to the sub-vassal.

Observed that proof of immemorial possession of salmon-fishings by the defender and his ancestors raised a presumption that such possession had been enjoyed by the crown vassals from the date of the original grant.

Observed that if the question had arisen between the defender and the representative of the crown vassal the feu-charter of 1587, with the infeftment thereon, as explained by prescriptive possession, would have been a good title to salmon-fishings.

Observations on the effect of the tenendas clause in explaining the dispositive clause.

THIS was an action at the instance of the Lord Advocate, on behalf of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, against Walter M'Culloch of Ardwall, concluding for declarator that the salmon-fishings in the estuary of the river Fleet, and in the sea ex adverso of the defender's lands and islands, belonged to the Crown, and that the defender had no right or title to these salmon-fishings. 2D DIVISION. Lord Young. R.

The pursuer averred that the defender held his lands under titles which contained no grant of salmon-fishings; and further, that he and his predecessors had not, under or by virtue of a barony title, or of a title cum piscationibus, or other title capable of being a basis for prescriptive possession, fished for salmon, grilse, or salmon-trout ex adverso of the lands; and separatim, that they had not done so for such a time nor in such a way as to give them a prescriptive right to the salmon-fishings ex adverso of the lands.

The defender set forth his titles, and averred that he and his predecessors had possessed the salmon-fishings under the said titles for time immemorial.

The earliest title produced by the defender was a crown charter of confirmation and novodamus, dated 18th March 1584, granted by King James VI. in favour of William Makculloch of Myretown, and Mary Makculloch his wife, in conjunct fee, &c. of the lands and barony of

No. 14.
Oct. 20, 1874.
Lord Advocate v. M'Culloch.

Cardiness, which, it was set forth in the quæquidem clause, had belonged to the said Mary Makculloch, and had been resigned by her in favour of her husband and herself, &c. By clause of novodamus in the same charter the Crown of new conveyed, disponed, and confirmed to the spouses the said lands and barony, "cum turre fortalicio manerie loco pomariis hortis molendinis silvis piscationibus partibus pendiculis annexis connexis outsettis et pertinen. earundem."

By feu-charter, dated 12th January 1587, bearing to be granted in implement of a prior contract, the said William and Mary M'Culloch feued out to their kinsman, William M'Culloch (therein designed as "in Nether Ardwall)," and his heirs and assignees, "totas et integras nostras quinque mercatas terrarum de Nethir Arduell antiqui extentus cum suis pertinentiis jacen. in nostra baronia de Cardirnes, et infra parochiam de Anwoth et senescallatum de Kirkcudbricht tenendas et habendas totas et integras prenominatas quinque mercatas terrarum de Nethir Arduell cum singulis suis pertinentiis prefato Villelmo M'Culloch heredibus suis et assignatis de nobis et nostris heredibus et successoribus dominis de Cardirnes in feudifirma emphiteusi et hereditate imperpetuum per omnes rectas metas suas antiquas et divisas pro ut jacent. in longitudine et latitudine in domibus edificiis boscis planis moris marisiis viis semitis aquis stagnis rivulis pratis pascuis et pasturis aucupationibus venationibus et piscationibus . . ." The charter contained a precept of sasine for infefting the disponee in the said lands "cum omnibus et singulis suis pertinentiis," upon which he was infeft by delivery of earth and stone.

William M'Culloch was succeeded by his son Thomas, who completed his title to the lands of Nether Ardwall by precept of clare constat and sasine thereon.

Thomas M'Culloch subsequently obtained a disposition, dated 27th February 1619, from William M'Culloch of Myretown, of the mid-superiority of the said lands with the pertinents as presently possessed by himself and his tenants. Following upon the procuratory of resignation in the said disposition, Thomas M'Culloch obtained from the Crown a charter of resignation, dated 29th March 1621, of the lands of Nether Ardwall, with pertinents, as possessed by the said Thomas and his tenants, fishings being mentioned only in the tenendas clause. He also obtained a separate precept of sasine of the same date, for infefting him in terms of the charter, upon which he was infeft.

Thomas M'Culloch had thus in his own person both the superiority and property titles to the lands of Nether Ardwall. From him the lands passed by a regular progress of titles to the defender. No separate titles under the feu-charter of 1587 were made up by any of Thomas M'Culloch's successors, and they continued to hold on apparency the base right created by the feu-charter of 1587.

In regard to a part of the fishings claimed by the Crown, those off the island of Knockbrex, the defender was in right of the crown grant of the island, with fishings; and the only question was as to possession.

A proof was led,* the import of which sufficiently appears from the opinions of the Judges. The Lord Ordinary (Young), on 17th March 1874, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Sustains the defences, assoilzies the defender from the conclusions of the action, and decerns: Finds the pursuer liable in expenses," &c.†

* For the procedure in the Outer-House see opinion of Lord Ormidale, p. 37, before whom, as Lord Ordinary, the case originally depended.

† "OPINION.—I have considered this case since I heard it argued, and am now to state the opinion which I have formed.

"The purpose of the action is to claim for the Crown the salmon-fishings

No. 14.

Oct. 20, 1874.

Lord Advocate v. M'Culloch.

The pursuer reclaimed.

Argued for the pursuer;—The defender had no sufficient title to found specified in the conclusions of the summons. The defender resists the claim, on the ground that the fishings are part of the barony of Cardiness, and belong to him as proprietor of that part of the barony which is adjacent to the waters in which they exist. The Crown answers that there is no express grant of salmon-fishings either in the title to the barony before it was divided, or in the defender's title to the part belonging to him, and that there being no mention of fishings in the dispositive clause of any of the grants to the defender or his ancestors, but only in the tenendas, he can take no benefit from prescriptive possession, assuming it to be proved, which the Crown disputes.

"The original grant of the barony of Cardiness has not been produced, and is probably irrecoverable. There is no evidence regarding it. The earliest title produced is a crown charter of confirmation and novodamus, dated 18th March 1584, whereby the barony, as a previously created and then existing estate, was granted and confirmed to William M'Culloch of Myreton, and Maria his wife, and the longest liver, in conjunct fee, and to their heirs. This charter does not specify salmon-fishings, but only fishings. The barony might nevertheless include the salmon-fishings in question as part of it, although prescriptive possession would, by a rule positivi juris, be the only admissible evidence of the fact. When there is an express grant of salmon-fishings the matter is clear on the face of the title, and there is no room for extraneous evidence, unless, it may be, regarding the locality or extent of salmon-fishings granted in general terms. But as a barony does not necessarily or usually consist of land only, but may, and generally does, comprehend rights, privileges, and franchises which frequently are not specified, the question whether or not any particular right not specified is part of the barony is allowed to be cleared by extrinsic evidence, subject, in the case of salmon-fishings and some other cases, to the rule already noticed, that only prescriptive possession will suffice. The Crown does not dispute the law as thus stated, whereby extrinsic evidence of prescriptive possession is admitted to shew that a barony comprehends salmon-fishings, but contends that it is inapplicable to the case of the defender, who is not proprietor of the barony of Cardiness, but only of the lands of Nether Ardwell, which, although part of the barony, were separated from the remainder by ordinary alienation, as regards the property, in 1587, and as regards the superiority in 1619. This contention raises a large and important question, for it may, according to the decision of it, seriously affect the rights of proprietors in all cases where a barony has in course of time come to be divided, so as to be held in two or more distinct properties. As the charter of 1584 grants the lands cum piscationibus, it is almost superfluous to notice that, even without the element of barony, a question involving similar considerations would have arisen, it being clear law that in an ordinary title to lands fishings may be interpreted to mean salmon-fishings, upon evidence of prescriptive possession. It is, however, proper to consider the question with reference to the barony title, and unnecessary to determine how the rights of parties might have stood had there been no barony.

"The description of the barony in the charter of 1584 is—'Totas et integras terras et baroniam de Cardiness infra senescallatum nostrum de Kirkcudbryt,'—a description which necessarily left the subjects included to be ascertained, if a dispute arose, by extrinsic evidence; and while the barony remained entire, and was held as a single estate, it is not doubtful that it was competent by such evidence to prove that the salmon-fishings now in question were included. But the barony has since been divided by alienation; and the defender is now proprietor, and he and his ancestors have since 1587 been proprietors of that part of it which adjoins the waters the salmon-fishings whereof are in dispute. The question is, whether, assuming such prescriptive possession of these fishings, by himself and his ancestors since their acquisition of this part of the barony, as would have sufficed to shew that they were comprehended in the barony, had the possession been by the proprietor of the barony as an undivided estate, this possession. There was no grant of fishings in the dispositive clause of the feu-charter of 1587, which was the foundation of the alleged right, effect shall be denied to it in a question with the Crown, because the title is not to the whole barony, but only to that part of it to which the particular fishings, if comprenended in the barony, were naturally attached. I think this question must be answered in the negative. It seems to me reasonable to regard the possession, as it may be proved, of the defender and his ancestors as a continuance, with respect to their part of the barony, of the previous possession while the barony was entire. How long the barony existed as a subject of possession prior to 1584 does not appear, nor is it material, for with respect to salmon-fishings which are not of a character or value to be the subject of written leases or records, evidence of possession cannot go further back than human memory reaches, while if it goes so far, it is lawful, and, in the absence of anything to the contrary, reasonable, to carry it back by presumption as far as may be necessary to satisfy the requirements of law.

No. 14.

Oct. 20, 1874.

Lord Advocate v. M'Culloch.

"But the Crown further maintains that the defender's title to Ardwell,—the part of the barony of Cardiness belonging to him,—contains no grant of salmon-fishings in the dispositive clause of any of the grants relied on, and that the mention of fishings in the tenendas is insufficient as a foundation for prescriptive possession. I am not satisfied that the authorities on which the Crown relies for this contention are applicable to the titles here, and am rather inclined to think that these titles, followed by prescriptive possession, assuming it to be proved, are sufficient on the ordinary law of prescription. But in the view which I take of the case it is unnecessary to dwell on this aspect of it. The defender's lands of Ardwell are in fact part of the barony of Cardiness as it existed at and prior—how long prior is unknown—to the year 1584, and his titles bear that they are so. Further, they are in fact contiguous to the waters in which the fishings in question exist, so that these fishings, if part of the barony, naturally attach to them. The defender undertakes to prove by legitimate evidence that these fishings are and have all along been part of the barony of Cardiness, and consequently were alienated from the Crown when the barony was granted, and I am of opinion that his title is sufficient to entitle him to prove this in answer to the present action at the instance of the Crown. His right was not derived from the Crown, but from the baron, although he now holds from the Crown the mid-superiority created by the baron's feu-charter of 1587, and I am not of opinion that the criticisms made by the Crown on the terms of his title from the baron are sufficient to preclude him from shewing, as in right of the baron with respect to this part of the barony, that the Crown has no right to the fishings which they claim, in respect they were alienated by the Crown along with the barony, of which, assuming prescriptive possession to be proved, they were a part. To express the same thing in other words, the possession of the defender and his ancestors is available against the Crown to shew that the fishings in question are part of the barony of Cardiness, and this being shewn, their title to that part of the barony, to which, from adjacency, the fishings naturally attach, is sufficient to sustain the possession, at least in a question with the Crown, to whom any defect in the title, as in a question with the author of it, is jus tertii. I do not think the title defective, but it is, in my opinion, sufficient for the decision that the Crown, claiming the fishings against the defender as proprietor of part of the barony, cannot object to his shewing, habili modo, that they are comprehended in the barony, and so do not belong to the Crown, to whatever part of the barony, since its division, they may now pertain.

"With respect to the evidence of possession, considered, as I think it ought to be, with reference to the character and value of the fishings, I am of opinion that it is sufficient. The fishings are, from geographical position and natural causes, of inconsiderable value, and the possession has corresponded to what was reasonably to be expected. For upwards of forty years there has always been some possession, more or less, of a sufficiently marked character to be matter of evidence, though the subject was plainly never regarded as important or valu-

No. 14.

Oct. 20, 1874.
Lord Advocate v. M'Culloch.

nor in the crown charter of 1621; and this want could not be supplied by the mention of fishings in the tenendas clause.[1] Further, the Crown was not divested of the salmon-fishings in question, unless they formed part of the barony of Cardiness. A barony title was sufficient to enable the baron to prescribe a right of salmon-fishing, but there was no proof and no presumption that there had been any exercise of the right by the baron at the date when the defender's lands were feued. Subsequent possession by the defender and his ancestors was not possession under a barony title, for a barony could not be communicated by a subaltern right.[2]

Argued for the defender;—The renewal of the barony title in 1584 was sufficient to divest the Crown, if the possession following upon it had been sufficient to explain it as a grant of salmon-fishing. In a question with the Crown, possession by the defender and his ancestors was equivalent to possession by the baron. As tenants possessed for their landlords, so vassals possessed for their superiors, though on their own account, if the subject was part of the feu. In the absence of any trace of the commencement of possession on the part of the defender and his ancestors, this possession must be presumed to have been a continuance, as regards their part of the barony, of the possession by the barons of Cardiness, and to have extended back to the original creation of the barony.[3] The word "fishings" in the barony title having been established so as to mean salmon-fishing as a pertinent of the adjacent lands, the conveyance of the lands with pertinents was a sufficient transmission of the right, especially as explained by mention of fishings in the tenendas, provided the possession of salmon-fishing under the titles had been uninterrupted.[4] The defender was entitled to found on the base right created by the feu-charter of 1587, which he possessed on apparency, as a good prescriptive title, although not renewed by subsequent inable, not being so in fact. The material thing is, that the defender and his predecessors always asserted their right, making such use of it as was to be expected looking to its character, and that neither the Crown nor any other ever interfered to object, or assert a contrary right. If there was little possession, there was little to possess; and the defender and his ancestors had it all without dispute. It is, in the absence of anything to the contrary, reasonable to presume, as matter of fact, that this has always been the state of things, although the actual evidence covers only recent times.

---

"With respect to the little island of Knockbrex, which the defender holds on a separate title cum piscationibus, I have only to observe, that while there is, according to the evidence, nothing worthy of the name of a salmon-fishing on its shores, such fishing as was possible was practised by the defender and his predecessors, or with their permission.

"I am therefore of opinion that the decision must be against the Crown.

"I propose to put the judgment without any findings in point of fact—which I think unnecessary—sustaining the defences, and assoilzieing the defender from the conclusions of the action, with expenses."

[1] Stair, ii. 3, 60; Erskine, ii. 3, 23 and 24; Earl of Aboyne v. Farquharson, Nov. 16, 1814, F. C. and H. of L. April 22, 1818, 6 Paton, 380; Agnew v. Magistrates of Stranraer, Nov. 27, 1822, 2 S. 42 (N. E. 36.)

[2] Stair, ii. 3, 45; Erskine, ii. 3, 46; Montgomerie v. Dalrymple, March 2, 1813, F. C.; Baird v. Fortune, April 25, 1861, 4 Macq. 127, 33 Scot. Jur. 437.

[3] Lord Advocate v. Sinclair, June 14, 1865, 3 Macph. 981, 37 Scot. Jur. 530—(see especially opinion of Lord Curriehill), aff. June 7, 1867, 5 Macph. (H. L.) 97, 39 Scot. Jur. 459.

[4] Lord Advocate v. Sinclair, supra.

No. 14.
Oct. 20, 1874.
Lord Advocate v. M'Culloch.

feftments.[1] He did not require, therefore, to found upon the crown charter of 1621. But that charter was precisely in terms of the disposition, and procuratory on which it followed. If the right of salmon-fishing was resigned, it was re-granted. If it was not re-granted, it was not resigned, and still remained in the person of the original crown vassal in the barony. In either view, the Crown had no right to it.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—There are some very important questions raised in this case, out of proportion to the value of the right in dispute; but as they have been raised, we must decide them.

The action is one at the instance of the Crown, for the purpose of having it declared that the Crown is in right of the salmon-fishings mentioned in the summons, lying along the river Fleet, and ex adverso of the defender's lands of Ardwell; and to have it found that Mr M'Culloch, the defender, has no right or title to these salmon-fishings. The defender defends himself upon his titles; and he says that he and his predecessors have been in possession for time immemorial. If he has a title to prescribe, and prescriptive possession, that will be sufficient.

1°. The first question in all such cases is of course the possession. The Lord Ordinary has found that the defender has proved his allegation in regard to possession; and upon the best consideration that I can give the proof I concur in the Lord Ordinary's view. The proof of possession is not exuberant undoubtedly, but it is exclusive as far as it goes. It is not exuberant,—not because the defender and his predecessors did not try to catch salmon, but apparently because there were very few salmon to catch, or at least they were not able to catch them. But the right of salmon-fishing may be exercised although nothing is caught; indeed, that is not at all an uncommon result of that occupation. And, therefore, on the whole matter, looking to the evidence, especially of Mr M'Culloch himself, which is very distinct and clear, and at the same time candid, and to the nature of the possession which is proved, I think there is sufficient proof of immemorial exercise of the right of salmon-fishing along the shores of the Fleet ex adverso of the defender's property. There is not the slightest trace of any one else, without the authority of Mr M'Culloch, ever attempting to use the right. Now, if that be so, it has a most important bearing on all the other questions.

2°. The next question is, when must this possession be presumed to have commenced? Now, I imagine that it must be presumed to have been contemporaneous with the original grant or title to which it has been attributed. That was laid down, on the authority of Lord Stair, by Lord Curriehill in the case of Sinclair,[2] in some important observations. And Lord Cranworth, in the same case, says, in the House of Lords, that the English rule is the same. The result is, that the possession, being from time immemorial, must be held to have commenced with the right or title to which it is attributed. It may be different if there be proof of the commencement of the possession, but otherwise this presumption is consistent with principle as well as with reason, for undisputed possession is the indication and the fulfilment of a valid title.

[1] Caitcheon v. Ramsay, Jan. 22, 1791, M. 10,810; Waddell v. Pollock June 19, 1828, 6 S. 999.

[2] Lord Advocate v. Sinclair, June 4, 1865, 3 Macph. 981, 37 Scot. Jur. 530 aff. 5 Macph. H. of L. 97, 39 Scot. Jur. 459.

No. 14.

Oct. 20, 1874.
Lord Advocate v. M'Culloch.

A second general principle is laid down by Lord Stair in words which, in this case, have a very important effect. He says (b. 2, t. 1, sec. 26),—"So effectual is possession active, besides that it is the ground of prescription whereby property and all other rights are introduced; and passive, sufficient to hold out all others who have not a good right, and it is always favourable in dubious cases." And then, he says,—"Possession, as distinct from right, is ascribable only to that title by which it did begin, in prejudice of him from whom the possession was acquired, and to whom it must be restored, notwithstanding any other right in the pursuer to which he might ascribe it, and which, after he had quitted the possession, might recover it. But as to all others from whom the possession flowed not, the same may be defended upon all rights in the possessor, or him from whom he hath tolerance or right." And, therefore, in this case, when the right to possess is challenged by a third party, who is not the immediate author of the possessor, the latter may defend himself on his author's title, whatever right he himself may have to the subject possessed; for it is enough that the true owner has authorised or tolerated a possession with which no one else has an interest to interfere. It also follows that the possessor may found upon his own possession in fortification of his author's title, because, whether his right to possess be absolute as between him and his author, or only temporary, as under a tack, or precarious, as by bare permission or tolerance, it is by authority and in fulfilment of his author's right.

We come now to consider the feudal titles in this case. There can be no doubt that, before possession can have the effect of an express grant of salmon-fishing, there must be a title and sasine to which the possession can be referred, and this may be either a grant with the general words cum piscationibus or a general grant of barony. In both these cases the right is carried, not as a separate tenement, although salmon-fishing may be of course a separate tenement, but as the accessory or pertinent of that which is expressed; and in both,—that is, both in the barony title and in the title cum piscationibus,—the possession serves to define the extent of what is comprehended in the general words. I apply these general principles, which I think are sound, to the position of the titles in the present case. The first title which we have is not an original title. It is a grant of confirmation and novodamus,—confirmation of a prior title and a new grant, the prior title being a right of barony in the person of Mary M'Culloch, and the re-grant being a grant to her and her husband, who are the grantees in the charter of 1584. It seems to have been assumed on the part of the Crown that, prior to 1584, it could not be said that there was any title to the salmon-fishings of this portion of the barony vested in the author of Mr M'Culloch, the defender. I doubt that very much. The possession, as I have shewn, must be assumed to have been contemporaneous, not with the charter of confirmation and novodamus, but with the original crown grant. The original crown grant is not before us, and we do not know the date of it, but this we do know, that it was a grant of barony, and that it must have been granted before 1584,—how long before we cannot tell. After the long possession for three hundred years I should have been very much inclined to say that that was quite enough for the decision of the present case, and that the presumption was that the possession had existed before 1584, and that it existed upon a sufficient title, and that it had existed long enough to shew that the barony included the fishings, it being quite certain that the barony title was antecedent, and probably long antecedent to the title of 1584. And that is all the stronger that

No. 14.
Oct. 20, 1874.
Lord Advocate v. M'Culloch.

the date of these rights is prior, both to the introduction by the statute 1617 of the long positive prescription, and also prior to the institution of the registers. But I do not think it necessary to put my opinion in this case upon that ground. It is certain that the charter of 1584 was quite a sufficient title on which, if followed by possession, the right of salmon-fishing might be acquired, but it was followed by possession, and has been so until now; and on the grounds which I have already stated I do not think it signifies in the least to this challenge on the part of the Crown whether the possession has been by the crown vassal himself, or by one deriving right from the crown vassal, or by one whose possession was tolerated and permitted by the crown vassal. The Crown was thus effectually divested of the right of salmon-fishing, and it is wholly immaterial that the date of the original right is unknown.

It was farther maintained in argument for the Crown that neither the feu-right of 1587—that is, the feu-right granted by the crown vassal under the charter of 1584, which is a title on which Mr M'Culloch and his predecessors have possessed from that date till now—nor the disposition of the dominium directum in 1619, conveyed the salmon-fishings on any title on which a right to them could be acquired by prescription; and it seemed to be contended that the original crown vassal was left with a title to prescribe, but without possession, while his sub-vassal in the dominium utile, and his disponee in the dominium directum, had possession without a title. But the reasoning is fallacious, for even if the crown vassal had not transferred to his sub-vassal the title to prescribe, as in a question with him or his successors, his sub-vassal in the lands is entitled to protect his possession by pleading his author's title against the Crown, and is also of course entitled to plead his own possession in fortification of that title. It is good adverse possession against a challenge by a third party.

Putting aside for the present the effect of the crown charter of resignation, as far as the superiority title is concerned, I go on to consider whether the feu-right of 1587 is not in itself sufficient to support the possession of the salmon-fishings, or to confer a title to prescribe as in a question with the crown vassal from whom these rights flowed. I am of opinion that that is not the question with the Crown, who is a third party; but if it were necessary to decide it, I entirely concur in the view that the Lord Ordinary has taken of that question, and in the very able reasoning on which it appears that he proceeded. In regard to the privileges implied in the nomen universitatis of a barony, it does not follow that if a portion of the barony is parted with, all the privileges will follow that portion. It is clear that some of them cannot be so communicated; but the title to the lesser regalia as pertinents of the barony will pass to the disponee of that part of the barony to which they are naturally pertinent. Prescriptive possession will shew conclusively that such is the case. As possession defines and fixes the limits of the barony itself, so possession will also define the extent of the part of it which is given off. It would have been a very hopeless contention on the part of the representative of the original crown vassal, assuming that he originally had a right to the salmon-fishing by his grant and possession, that the salmon-fishing still remained with him after a possession for 300 years by the sub-vassal.

But apart from the barony title, on which I do not enlarge, because the Lord Ordinary has exhausted that part of the case, I am very clearly of opinion, on the terms of the feu-right itself, that after the vassal had possessed for the prescriptive period the crown vassal could not have disputed his right. I think, that although the extent and nature of the subject is properly to be looked for in the operative and disposing words of the feu-right, and not in the tenendas, this rule is not conclusive. This charter proceeds on a contract, the terms and tenor of which profess to follow, and the question which would have arisen between the granter of the charter and his vassal would have been, what was the true import and meaning of the contract between the parties as it related to the fishings. To ascertain this the whole deed may be consulted, and when we find the words cum piscationibus in the tenendas we may, and indeed must, infer, as a matter of ordinary reasoning, that the contract referred to the fishings as well as to the other pertinents enumerated in the tenendas. No doubt the reference to the contract might not have applied in a question with singular successors, but still it is not to be thrown out of view in construing and ascertaining the true meaning of this feu-right. In regard to the question, how far the tenendas can be looked at as qualifying the subject-matter of the disposition, it is quite true that in crown charters this is a matter which has been somewhat strictly dealt with, on the principle that the Crown is not to be assumed to give off more than the words of the dispositive clause express. Even that, however, in the case of Sinclair, was made to yield to the manifest and reasonable construction of the whole instrument, and I simply refer to Lord Cranworth's and Lord Colonsay's views expressed in their opinions in the House of Lords as putting this matter now, as matter of Scotch conveyancing, entirely beyond doubt. The passage quoted from Mr Menzies' Lectures by Lord Colonsay [1] in that opinion seems to express the true rule, viz., that although in an original right it cannot be held to have the effect of a dispositive clause, still the tenendas may be looked at, especially in a question in regard to the matters which it is the appropriate clause for expressing, in order to shew what was the meaning of the grant, and the tenendas is the appropriate clause for specifying pertinents. But I am not aware of any case in which the same strictness has been observed in feu-charters from a subject superior, and I think the terms of the tenendas of the charter of 1587, coupled with the rest of the instrument, afford a sufficient support for the possession of the salmon-fishings which has followed.

No. 14.

Oct. 20, 1874.
Lord Advocate v. M'Culloch.

It only remains to say one word upon the argument founded on the crown charter of resignation; but it will be observed that the defender does not require to defend his possession upon that charter at all. He holds still on apparency under the base right constituted in 1587; and if he has a good right under that it is wholly immaterial to him what the effect of his crown charter of resignation may be. But I shall only say that it seems to me that this is a much stronger case than the case of Sinclair, where it was very questionable whether the title had been continued through the progress. But in the present case the result is simply this,—there is a title of barony in the original crown vassal; he first gives off the dominium utile by a feu from himself, and then he conveys to his vassal the dominium directum. The disponee resigns in the hands of the Crown for new infeftment, and the charter of resignation is expressed in the same terms as those of the original disposition. One of two things follows, as was put in the case of Sinclair. If the title to prescribe a right to the salmon-fishings was constituted by the conveyance of the dominium directum, and was resigned by the vassal, it was re-granted, because the terms are precisely the same. If, on [1] 5 Macph. H. of L. 106, 39 Scot. Jur. 463; see Menzies' Lectures, 3d ed. p. 551.

No. 14.

Oct. 20, 1874.
Lord Advocate v. M'Culloch.

the other hand it was not re-granted, then it was not resigned, and it was nc conveyed, and it remains still in the person of the original crown vassal in th barony. Whichever way that question is solved the result is the same; and am of of opinion that there is no ground whatever in any of the contentions th have been maintained for this challenge on the part of the Crown.

Lord Neaves.—The views now stated, both as to the facts of this case and to the law, are in perfect accordance with those I have arrived at. I cannot di tinguish this case from that of Sinclair. Perhaps, if there is any difference, t difference is in favour of the present case. The case of Sinclair was one ab argued, carefully considered, and authoritatively decided. It was not a unani ous judgment in this Court. There were three Judges on one side and two the other, but that circumstance, if ultimately the judgment stands in the Cou of last resort, gives additional weight to any judgment pronounced, because assures us, which we cannot read the report of the case without seeing, that eve point involved in the questions at issue was gravely considered and carefully d posed of. The opinions on the other side were of great weight. Lord M kenzie in the Outer-House, and Lord Deas in the Inner-House, brought forwa all the views adverse to the judgment that could be urged, and brought th forward in the strongest way. It was decided here by a judgment of hi authority—Lord Colonsay, Lord Curriehill, and Lord Ardmillan—against t Crown, and that judgment when taken to appeal was unanimously confirm by the three Judges who disposed of it in the House of Lords. One of th was Lord Colonsay who had joined in the judgment in the Court below; l Lord Colonsay, as we all know, was of so candid a mind that he would not h been slow to express a different opinion if he had been satisfied that there room for questioning the judgment that he had formerly concurred in. Th three Judges in the House of Lords, Lord Colonsay and two English Chancell were united in the ultimate judgment, and made the case of Sinclair one of cl authority that must be followed.

In that case various points was stated,—I do not say were established,—beca after all they were points that could be deduced from the existing authorities the law of Scotland before. Your Lordship has adverted to these. There is point that immemorial possession is always to be traced by presumption retr the time when it might have begun under the titles that existed, whatever th were. The other point is that a grant of barony is a foundation, without other special clause, for acquiring by prescriptive possession a right of salm fishing. And then there came questions of nicety, which may occasionally a where there has been a splitting of a barony—whether that will give to eac the parties who are disponees a right to salmon-fishing. There may be a pute between them as to who shall have it—whether the grantee shall have i whether the disponer shall retain it. But it could never be maintained that splitting into parts of a barony, which had a right of salmon-fishing, would invest the Crown with that right to salmon-fishing which had been establis against it in a habile manner. Here I see no reason to doubt that the righ salmon-fishing was alienated under the barony title in such a way as to di the Crown of it altogether.

Your Lordship has well said that the success of salmon-fishing is not the t that is given. It is the right to fish that is given, with or without success, there will be many a fishing without success; but if there is the continued a

No. 14.

Oct. 20, 1874.
Lord Advocate
v. M'Culloch.

tion and exercise of the right to fish under a barony title, excluding the Crown, I see no reason for holding that it may not be quite good to that part of the lands with which the fishing has physically been connected.

I would further say, that suppose there was a base right given, that was sufficient to establish a right to salmon-fishing. It is not necessary that that base right which excluded the Crown at first be continued by renewals. Unless there follows some non-entry on a failure to renew, the absence of a renewal does not reinvest the superior. It may be possessed for years on apparency without any renewal of the right, and nothing will reinvest the Crown but either an utter cessation of possessing so as to bring out the Crown's supereminent title as the only existing one, or a resignation ad remanentiam, of which there is not the slightest vestige or allegation in this case.

I think it plain that there was immemorial possession here, and that from the continued assertion of that right, from time to time, to the exclusion of the Crown, that was sufficient to establish the right of this party, whether he stands upon the defensive merely, or would put himself in the further situation of taking an active title, which he does not require to do, in order to protect himself against the claim. On these grounds, I think, acting in complete accordance with the case of Sinclair, and having in that case a precedent and warrant for all we are now doing, this case must be decided in the way your Lordship has proposed, by adhering to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

Lord Ormidale.—This case originally depended before me as Lord Ordinary in the Outer-House; and a very elaborate argument was addressed to me there on the part of the Crown, with the view of satisfying me that no relevant defence had been stated, and that the pursuer was entitled at once to judgment independently of any inquiry as to the state of the possession,—it being maintained that it was of no consequence what the possession was,—there being an essentially defective title. I could not adopt that view, but, on the contrary, as explained in a note to my judgment allowing a proof, I indicated pretty plainly what would probably be the result, according to the views I then entertained of the case, if possession was proved to be with the defender.

Now, there was a proof, which was adduced before me as Lord Ordinary, which I have since carefully considered, and I concur entirely with your Lordships and with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that in the particular circumstances of the case the possession has been sufficiently established. In the words of the Lord Ordinary, the proved possession was little because there was little to possess. I think it is very obvious indeed that there was little to possess, and accordingly the possession is not of a very large or extensive character. But considering the nature of the subjects, the lie of the lands ex adverso of which the fishing is situated, and all the other circumstances, I think we have here all the possession that could naturally or well have been expected. And there is no other party interested by the proof that ever on any occasion laid claim to or exercised any right whatever on the river Fleet or estuary, so far as the present contention is concerned, to the salmon-fishing.

Therefore, assuming that there has been possession, the next consideration for the Court is, whether any of the points which were made on the part of the Crown in the argument addressed to us can entitle the pursuer to prevail. I so entirely concur in the views so well expressed by the Lord Ordinary in the opinion with which we have been furnished in an appendix that it might probably be sufficient for me to refer to that opinion as embracing my own views, and the opinion which I had formed when I allowed the proof. But out of respect to the very able and elaborate argument which was addressed to us here on the part of the Crown I think it right to notice what appeared to me to be the three chief points in that argument.

No. 14. Oct. 20, 1874. Lord Advocate v. M'Culloch.

The first point which seemed to be relied upon by the pursuer was to the effect that, as there is no express disposition or grant of salmon-fishings, or of fishings at all, in the defender's title, the reference to fishings in the tenendas clause of his title cannot supply this defect, let the possession have been what it may. Now, I am not to dispute that, as a general rule, the dispositive clause of a charter or disposition must be looked at in order to ascertain what are the subjects of the grant or conveyance. But quite consistently with this rule, not only the whole terms of the dispositive clause itself, but also (when these, as in the present instance, from their generality or otherwise, require or admit of construction), all the other clauses, including the tenendas, can be competently examined and considered, in order that the true and full meaning of the dispositive clause may be determined. Opinions in accordance with this view appear to have been expressed in the House of Lords in the case of the Lord Advocate v. Sinclair,[1] particularly by Lords Cranworth and Colonsay. The former observed, —"I do not question the general proposition that nothing which is not mentioned in the dispositive clause can be held to pass merely because it is included in the tenendas clause. I will assume further that the word 'pertinents' cannot prima facie be taken to include fishing. But in construing crown charters, as well as other written instruments, common sense suggests that we must look to the whole contents of the instrument before we can say with certainty what is the true meaning of any particular clause in it." And afterwards the same noble and learned Lord remarked that "there cannot be any principle which prevents us from discovering the true meaning of any part of an instrument by a fair examination of the whole." Lord Colonsay, again, who followed Lord Cranworth in delivering his opinion, does not repudiate, but on the contrary, substantially adopts, and by illustration and authority supports and confirms it. I cannot therefore give effect to the pursuer's argument, founded on the circumstance that in the defender's title-deeds, or some of them, essential for his case, fishings are not expressly mentioned in the dispositive, but only in the tenendas clause, for I think that, in the words of Lord Cranworth, looking at the whole terms and contents of the deeds referred to, there is no room for reasonably doubting that a dispositive clause,—such, for example, as that which we find in the charters and dispositions constituting the title of the defender and his predecessors, to the effect that their lands were conveyed with annexis, connexis, parts, pendicles, and pertinents,—is sufficient (keeping in view the reference to fishings contained in the tenendas clause, as well as the whole tenor and contents of the deeds) to carry salmon-fishings.

The second point relied upon by the pursuer is even more technical and formal in its nature than that which has just been noticed, and I am very clear that it is not well founded. It is to the effect that as the symbols of net and coble appropriate to the conveyance of salmon-fishings are not expressed in the defender's title-deeds it cannot be held that any such right has ever been vested in him or his predecessors, let the possession have been what it may, and sup-

[1] 5 Macph. H. of L. 97, 39 Scot. Jur. 459.

No. 14.
Oct. 20, 1874.
Lord Advocate v. M'Culloch.

posing the titles to be otherwise unobjectionable. But it is only fair I should explain that although a proposition to this effect appeared to be maintained for the pursuer at the outset of the discussion I understood it to have been latterly abandoned, or, at any rate, not attempted to be enforced or supported. But, whether I am right in this or not, it appears to me that the proposition, as applicable to such a case as the present, where a right to salmon-fishing, separate and independent of certain specified lands, is not the subject of conveyance, is wholly untenable and inconsistent with long established practice and precedent.

If I am right so far, nothing more is necessary for a determination of the present controversy in favour of the defender. It may be right, however, that I should notice the only remaining point in the pursuer's argument, to the effect that although the possession of the defender and his predecessors, if it had applied to the whole barony lands as an undivided estate, would have been sufficient to support a right to salmon-fishings, it can have no such effect in regard to the separate portion of these lands which were separated from the barony, and feued out to the defender's ancestor. In making this point the pursuer has omitted, I think, to give sufficient effect to the circumstances,—1st, that the possession of the defender and his predecessors of the salmon-fishings ex adverso of the lands belonging to them has been proved to have existed for time immemorial; 2dly, that these lands are part of a barony, the titles to which are admittedly sufficient, with prescriptive possession, to constitute a right to salmon-fishing; and, 3dly, that there is neither proof nor even allegation by the pursuer that possession of the salmon-fishing ex adverso of the barony lands, or any part of them, has ever, since the creation of the barony, been had or exercised by the Crown or any party other than those in right of the lands.

Having regard to these circumstances, and giving them the effect to which they are fairly entitled, it appears to me to be a perfectly legitimate conclusion that, at the time the defender's lands were feued out the party then in right of the barony lands, including that portion of them now belonging to the defender, was in possession of, and had a right to, the salmon-fishing ex adverso of the whole of them, and, if so, that the defender's predecessor got along with his lands the salmon-fishing ex adverso of them. It may be impossible now, owing to the lapse of time, to establish this by direct and positive evidence; but that is not necessary, for, according to a well established principle in the law of prescription, noticed by Lord Curriehill in Sinclair's case, possession, when proved to have existed for time immemorial, is held, independently of direct or positive evidence, to draw back to the earliest title to which it can be ascribed; or, in the words of Lord Young, it is only "reasonable to regard the possession of the defender and his ancestors as a continuance with respect to that part of the lands of the previous possession while the barony was entire."

With these observations, I concur with your Lordships in opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor ought to be adhered to.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Refuse the reclaiming note, and adhere to the interlocutor complained against: Find the pursuer liable in additional expenses," &c.

DONALD BEITH, W.S., Solicitor H. M. Woods, &c.—WILSON & DUNLOP, W.S.—Agents.

No. 15.

Oct. 23, 1874.
Pirie v. Meikle.

WILLIAM PIRIE, Pursuer.—Rhind.
ARCHIBALD MEIKLE, Defender.—Mackintosh—J. P. B. Robertson.

Expenses—Jury Trial.—An action of damages for slander and a counter action of damages for assault were tried together before the same jury. In the action for slander the jury found for the pursuer on one of the issues, and assessed the damages at 1s. The Judge refused to certify that the case was suitable for jury trial under section 40 of the Court of Session Act, 1868. In the counter action for assault the jury found for the pursuer, and assessed the damages at £5. Held, in the circumstances, that the pursuer of the action for damages for assault was entitled to expenses.

1ST DIVISION. M.

IN April 1874 Archibald Meikle raised an action against William Pirie and George Pirie, concluding for £500 of damages for slander.

In June 1874 William Pirie raised an action against Archibald Meikle for £500 for assault.

Both actions arose out of a dispute which took place between the parties in a hotel in Musselburgh. Issues were adjusted, and the two cases were tried together before the Lord President. In the action for slander the jury gave a verdict finding for the defenders, the Piries, on several of the issues, and for the pursuer, Meikle, on an issue, "whether the defender, William Pirie did say of and concerning the pursuer that he was a kip-keeper (meaning thereby a brothel-keeper)," and assessed the damages at 1s. The Lord President refused to certify that the case was suitable for jury trial under section 40 of the Court of Session Act, 1868.

In the action of damages for assault by Pirie against Meikle the jury gave a verdict for the pursuer, Pirie, and assessed the damages at £5. The pursuer now asked the Court to apply the verdict, and find him entitled to expenses.[1]

LORD PRESIDENT.—The impression which I have formed of these cases, which I tried, is that they arose out of a discreditable brawl in a public-house. The pursuer of the action for slander having obtained only a shilling of damages applied to me to give him a certificate under the 40th section of the Court of Session Act of 1868, to the effect that the action was brought for the vindication of character, and was suitable for trial in the Court of Session. I refused to grant the certificate, because I thought it was not a case suitable to be tried in the Court of Session. But a demand is made for expenses in the action for assault. The result of the evidence was that the assaulted man, the father Pirie, was not prepared to bring any action until brought into this Court by the action for slander. But when that action was brought he brought the action for assault as a set-off to the other action. He had no alternative but to follow Meikle into this Court. He has obtained £5 of damages, and prima facie that would carry expenses. In consequence of Meikle having improperly brought his action Pirie was forced into this Court. I think that expenses should be given to the pursuer of the action for assault.

LORD DEAS, LORD ARDMILLAN, and LORD MURE concurred.

JOHN A. ROBERTSON, S.S.C.—CHARLES B. HOGG, L.A.—Agents.

[1] Pedelty v. Mackenzie, May 21, 1874, 2 Macph. 1094, 36 Scot. Jur. 535

No. 16.

Oct. 24, 1874.
Coxe v. Cox.

SIR JAMES COXE AND MRS ROBINA COX OR IVORY, First Parties.—D.-F. Clark—Mackay.
ROBERT COX AND OTHERS, Second Parties.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—M'Laren.
MRS MARGARET M'CULLOCH OR COX AND ANNE IVORY, Third Parties.—Adam—Kinnear.

Succession—Testament—Implied Revocation.—Terms of a codicil which held to nominate residuary legatees in addition to and not in room of those appointed by a prior deed.

Succession—Legacy—Condition.—Held, upon the terms of testamentary writings, that a legacy given in substitution of a prior legacy was not intended to be subject to a condition attached to the former.

Succession—Testament—Implied Revocation.—A bequest of a share of residue to each of a testator's nephews and nieces nominatim held to supersede a residuary bequest to them as representing their father, contained in a prior writing.

2D DIVISION. B.

MR JOHN COX, Gorgie Mills, died on 16th January 1874.

By holograph will, dated 24th December 1850, he directed his executors, after payment of debts and legacies and an annuity to his widow, as follows:—"They shall divide the residue of my said means and estate equally among my next of kin, declaring that with respect to any of my next of kin who have predeceased or shall predecease me, leaving issue, that such issue shall succeed equally among them to the share which would have belonged to their parent if alive."

At the date of the will his next of kin then living were his brothers Robert, Abram, and James, and his sister Mrs Ivory. Another brother, George, had died before the date of the will (in 1847), leaving three children, Robert, Isabella, and Anne (Mrs Chiene).

By holograph codicil on a separate paper, dated 7th November 1859, the testator declared "that if Robert Cox, only son of my late brother George Cox, shall succeed to my estate of Gorgie Mills as my heir-at-law, his share of the residue of my moveable estate shall be only one-half of what it would otherwise have been, and the other half shall be divided amongst my remaining residuary legatees, in proportion to the sums otherwise falling to them."

By a holograph writing, also on a separate paper, dated 10th August 1872, the testator declared,—"In case I may not have made alterations on my last will, I now declare it to be my will and wish that my dear wife, Margaret Cox, be paid out of my funds the sum of £20,000 over and above the amount left her in other documents: That Robert Cox, my nephew, after succeeding to Gorgie Mills (subject to such occupation as my wife wishes during her life), shall be one of my residuary legatees, along with my dear wife, my nieces, Isabella and Anne Cox, and Anne Ivory; but before the residuary amount be arrived at my will is that my sister-in-law, Mrs George Cox, receive £2000, my brother, Sir James Coxe, £1000, and my sister, Mrs Ivory, £1000."

At the date of this writing Sir James Coxe and Mrs Ivory were the only surviving next of kin, the testator's brothers, Robert and Abram, having died without issue.

The residuary personal estate of the testator amounted to about £60,000. His nephew, Robert Cox, succeeded to his heritable property as heir-at-law.

A special case was presented by—(1) Sir James Coxe and Mrs Ivory; (2) Robert Cox, Miss Isabella Cox, and Mrs Anne Cox or Chiene, and her husband and marriage-contract trustees; (3) Mrs Cox, widow of the testator, and Miss Anne Ivory.

The first parties maintained that the residue of the testator's personal

No. 16.
Oct. 24, 1874.
Coxe v. Cox.

estate was divisible, in terms of his testamentary writings, into seven parts, and that his residuary legatees were Sir James Coxe, Mrs Ivory, Mrs Cox (his widow), Mr Robert Cox, Miss Isabella Cox, Mrs Chiene, and Miss Ivory.

The second and third parties maintained that the writing of 10th August 1872 operated as an implied revocation of the previous bequest of residue to Sir James Coxe and Mrs Ivory, and that the residue was accordingly divisible into five parts only.

A second question was whether Mr Robert Cox was entitled to an equal share with that of the other residuary legatees, or only to one half of such share.

The second parties further maintained that in the event of it being held that Sir James Coxe and Mrs Ivory were entitled to shares of the residue, they were also entitled to shares of the residue under the will of 1850, as coming in place of their father, Mr George Cox, in addition to the shares which they took individually under the writing of 10th August 1872.

The Court were of opinion,—(1) That the codicil of August 1872 was not a sufficiently distinct expression of intention to revoke the nomination of Sir James Coxe and Mrs Ivory as residuary legatees; (2) That the condition attached to the bequest of residue to Robert Cox in the codicil of November 1859 was revoked by the codicil of August 1872; and (3) That the nomination of Robert, Isabella, and Anne Cox as residuary legatees in the codicil of August 1872 came in place of and revoked the bequest of the share of residue which they would have taken under the will as representing their father.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find . . . that under the testamentary writings of the late Mr John Cox, Sir James Coxe, Mrs Ivory, Mrs Cox, Mr Robert Cox, Miss Isabella Cox, Mrs Chiene, and Miss Ivory are entitled in equal shares to the residue of the said John Cox's personal estate, and decern."

LEBURN, HENDERSON, & WILSON, S.S.C.—MORTON, NEILSON, & SMART, W.S.—ADAM, KIRK, & ROBERTSON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 17.
Oct. 27, 1874.
King v. Pollock.

ARCHIBALD KING, Pursuer and Respondent.—Kirkpatrick—Millie.
JAMES POLLOCK, Defender and Appellant.—Moncreiff.

Reparation—Negligence—Culpa—Gun.—A blacksmith sent for a gun (a muzzle-loader) belonging to him, which he had left unloaded at a farm bothy on the last occasion he used it, about two months before. When it was brought him, he asked the boy who brought it whether it was loaded, and upon the boy saying he did not know he lifted the doghead and found there was no percussion-cap on the nipple. He next attempted to draw the ramrod to test whether the gun was loaded or not, but failed in consequence of the rod being stiff from rust, or from the wood having swollen. Without further examination he placed the gun in a press or wardrobe in his smithy, where it was partially concealed. On the same day, the blacksmith having been called out of the smithy to speak to some one, a boy took up the gun, which from some unexplained cause went off, and severely injured a journeyman in the blacksmith's employment. Held that the blacksmith had reasonable cause to believe that the gun was not in a condition to be a source of danger, and accordingly that he was not guilty of such negligence as to render him liable in damages to the man injured.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Lanarkshire. I.

THE present action was raised by Archibald King, journeyman blacksmith, in the Sheriff-court at Hamilton, against James Pollock, blacksmith; John Dunn, farmer; James Dunn, son of the said John Dunn; and James Frew junior. The summons concluded against the defenders,

No. 17.

Oct. 27, 1874.
King v. Pollock.

jointly and severally, for payment of £500 damages, for injuries sustained by the pursuer through the culpable negligence of the defenders, or one or more of them.

Proof was led, which established the following facts :—

Pollock had been in the habit of occasionally shooting rabbits on a farm of which John Dunn was tenant. On 2d October 1872 Pollock asked James Dunn, a boy of fourteen, to bring his (Pollock's) gun from a bothy at the farm, where he had left it unloaded on the last occasion he used it, which was about two months before. Next morning accordingly James Dunn brought the gun to Pollock's smithy, and handed it to him. Pollock asked Dunn if it was loaded. Dunn replied that "he did not know if it was," or "not that he was aware of." Pollock thereupon lifted up the hammer of the gun, it being a muzzle-loader, and saw that there was no percussion-cap on the nipple. He thereafter attempted to pull out the ramrod in order to test whether the gun was loaded or not, but either from rust, or the wood being swollen, or some other cause, he did not succeed. Without further examination he placed it in a press or wardrobe in the smithy used for keeping nails and files, so that the gun was partially concealed by the folding doors of the press. In the afternoon James Frew jun., a boy of fourteen, came into the smithy, and was asked by Pollock to blow the bellows. While he was so employed Pollock was called out of the smithy to speak to some person, and during his absence Frew caught sight of the gun, and went to the press, and took it into his hands. While in his hands the gun from some unexplained cause went off, and numerous pellets were lodged in the right arm of the pursuer, who was pursuing his ordinary avocation as a journeyman blacksmith in Pollock's service. The pursuer was severely injured, and his arm partially disabled for life.

The Sheriff-substitute (Spens) found that no culpa had been proved against John Dunn, and that if any culpa had been proved against James Dunn it was too remote to be tangible by a Court of law, and accordingly assoilzied these defenders, but found that culpa had been proved against Pollock and Frew, and found them liable, jointly and severally, in £70 of damages.

Pollock and Frew appealed to the Sheriff (Dickson), who, on 2d March 1874, adhered.

Pollock appealed to the Court of Session.

The undernoted authorities were cited.[1]

At advising,—

LORD NEAVES.—This appeal relates to an important subject, and one requiring great delicacy in applying to the circumstances the general principles of law by which it must be regulated. The accidents that may occur from the use of fire-arms are numerous and formidable; and it is the duty of the Court to enforce with strictness the observance of all reasonable precautions in that use. Several cases have been cited, in which parties negligently placing fire-arms in such a position as led to their being injuriously used by others have been subjected in liability. In the present case the Sheriffs have decided that there was culpable negligence

[1] Dixon v. Bell, June 18, 1816, 5 Maule and Selwyn, 198; Illidge v. Goodwin, Dec. 22, 1831, 5 Car. and Payne, 190; Lynch v. Nurdin, 1841, 1 Ad. and Ell, N. S. 29; Abbott v. Macfie, Dec. 7, 1863, 2 Hurlston and Coltman, 744, 33 L. J. Exch. 161; Mackintosh v. Mackintosh, July 15, 1864, 2 Macph. 1357, 36 Scot. Jur. 678; Campbell v. Ord and Maddison, Nov. 5, 1873, ante, vol. i, p. 149.

No. 17.
Oct. 27, 1874.
King v. Pollock.

on the part of Pollock, and we have to say how far their judgment is well founded as regards that defender.

We must consider what the culpable negligence must amount to. It is impossible to hold that the owner or possessor for the time being of fire-arms is in the position of an insurer that no damage shall arise from their use. To found liability there must be fault of a tangible and intelligible description,—such a neglect of the interests of others as a man of careful and conscientious mind would not allow if his own family were concerned.

The gun in question belonged to Pollock, but it had not been recently in his possession. When he last parted with it it was not loaded, and therefore not a source of danger. When it again came into his possession he did not know that it was loaded. It is said that he did not use all means of ascertaining whether it was loaded or not. If it had been made out that he knew that it was loaded I should have been unwilling to disturb the judgment, but I think that he believed it to be unloaded. He shewed a desire to ascertain whether it was loaded. He asked the lad who brought it, who could not tell him. He then examined the nipple, and found no cap upon it. Now, had he known that the gun was loaded, and yet seeing that there was no cap upon the nipple, had determined to run the risk of the absence of a cap being a complete security, he might have been guilty of culpable negligence. But if he looked at the want of a cap as evidence of the gun not being loaded, his conduct assumes a different aspect. The only point that is made against him is his having tried to pull out the ramrod, and failed through its being stiff. He then placed the gun in a press in the smithy. When he was called to the door for a minute, the lad Frew began to manipulate the gun, and the accident followed.

I cannot see that there was here such negligence on the part of Pollock as to involve liability. I cannot do better than contrast this case with one which Lord Denman puts:—"If I am guilty of negligence in leaving anything dangerous in a place where I know it to be extremely probable that some other person will unjustifiably set it in motion to the injury of a third party, and if that injury should be so brought about, I presume that the sufferer might have redress by action against both or either of the two, but unquestionably against the first. If, for example, a gamekeeper returning from his daily exercise should rear his loaded gun against a wall in the playground of schoolboys, and one of these should playfully fire it off at a schoolfellow and maim him, I think it will not be doubted that the gamekeeper must answer in damages to the wounded party."[1] Now, in all the circumstances figured by Lord Denman there is the plainest element of indifference to consequences. There is the knowledge that the gun is loaded, the place in which it is left,—one surrendered to boys,—and the probability that one of them will use it in the way described. None of these elements occur here. Pollock had not been in possession of the gun for some time. He does what he thinks right to find whether it was loaded or not. He puts it in a receptacle in his own smithy. He leaves it for a moment on business, in the presence of grown men, who might be expected to put a stop to any meddling with it.

Upon the whole, I think that, unless we are to hold that the possessor of a gun is responsible for all accidents that may occur with it, we must recall the interlocutors appealed against, and assoilzie the defender.

[1] Lynch v. Nurdin, 1841, 1 Ad. and Ell., N. S. 29.

No. 17.

Oct. 27, 1874.
King v. Pollock.

LORD ORMIDALE.—I entirely concur in the observations of Lord Neaves, to the effect that it would be quite extravagant to hold that the person in charge of a fire-arm is responsible for every injury that may be caused by it. The most that can be expected is that he should use all the precautions incumbent on a prudent man, having due regard to the dangerous nature of the instrument, and the safety of others.

The Sheriff-substitute, I think, puts it well, "that the question of Pollock's legal responsibility falls to be determined by a consideration of whether, on the facts proved, Pollock took those precautions which a prudent man might have been reasonably expected, in the circumstances, to take with reference to the gun in question." In deciding this question we must keep in view the facts which the Sheriff and the Sheriff-substitute concur in holding to be proved.

Two months would appear to have elapsed since Pollock had used the gun; and when he last had it in his possession it was unloaded. But when it was brought to him in the smithy he did not simply assume that it was in the same state as when he had left it. He took precautions to see whether it was now unloaded. He says in his evidence,—"I asked Dunn if it was loaded, and he said not that he was aware of, but he had not been using it. . . . I lifted the hammer, and saw that there was no percussion-cap." He is entirely corroborated in this by Dunn, who says,—"He asked me if it was loaded, and I said I did not know." And then he says,—"I saw Pollock lifting the hammer off the nipple." Pollock's attention was, therefore, undoubtedly directed to whether there was a cap upon the nipple; and we must hold it to be a fact that there was not. Pollock, however, was not even yet satisfied. He tried to draw the ramrod in order to put it down the barrel, but could not do so, owing either to its having got rusted in its place, or from the wood of which it was made having become swollen with damp. Instead of this telling against him, as was suggested in the course of this discussion, I think it may very well be founded on in his favour. He had left the gun unloaded about two months previously, and when he found the ramrod so stiffly wedged in its place that he could not draw it he might very naturally conclude that it had not been interfered with since he left it unloaded. The gun unfortunately turned out to have been loaded, for it went off in the hands of Frew. But how this exactly happened has not been cleared up. It has been suggested that some detonating powder had been left about the touch-hole, or that the percussion cap had got wedged into the dog-head, and in that way was not observed by Pollock. I must own that I think it just as likely that the lad Frew had some loose caps in his pocket, and that he put one on the nipple of the gun. Beyond saying that he had the gun for about a minute in his hands he can give no account of how it went off. He says he was knocked so stupid by what occurred that he can give no explanation on the subject.

Be that as it may, I cannot see that there is anything disclosed by the proof sufficient to inculpate Pollock, and to make him liable in damages. He appears to me to have used every precaution reasonable in the circumstances. As Lord Neaves has well observed, the owner or possessor of a gun does not insure the lives of the lieges against accidents from it. Still, as well from my unwillingness to do anything that might be construed into a relaxation of the rule that great care must be taken by any one in charge of a dangerous weapon that it is not the cause of damage to others, as for the reason that both the learned Sheriffs have evidently bestowed great pains upon this case, I have had great reluctance in coming to the conclusion that the judgment brought under review must be reversed, but I can come to no other.

No. 17.

Oct. 27, 1874.
King v. Pollock.

I reserve my opinion on the question whether it is a sufficient precaution for a man who knows that a gun is loaded to remove the cap before laying it aside. That may depend on all the circumstances.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur. I think there is no doubt (1) that this gun was charged, but had no cap on the nipple; (2) that the appellant did not know that it was charged; and (3) that he had reasonable grounds for thinking that it was not charged.

Whether a man is guilty of negligence who leaves a gun, which he knows to be charged, with the cap off, is a question on which I give no opinion. It is certainly a very rare circumstance for a gun to go off without a cap. I would only suggest as a possible origin of the accident that the cap had been originally too small for the nipple, that some one had attempted to fire the gun, and the cap had been pushed down, but had not exploded; that the first percussion had expanded it, and that it had thus got wedged into the doghead.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find that on the occasion libelled, James Pollock, the appellant (defender in Sheriff-court), examined the gun in question, for the purpose of ascertaining whether it was loaded, and that he found that there was no percussion-cap on the nipple of the gun: Find that the appellant did not know, and had no occasion to suppose, that the gun was charged with powder and shot, and that he had reasonable cause to believe that it was not in a condition to be a cause of danger: Therefore sustain the appeal, recall the interlocutors complained against as regards the appellant, and assoilzie him from the conclusions of the summons, and decern: Find the appellant entitled to expenses both in this Court and in the Sheriff-court," &c.

THOMAS LAWSON, S.S.C.—ALEX. MORISON, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 18.

Oct. 29, 1874.
Sutherland's Trustees v. Clarkson.

WILLIAM MILLER AND OTHERS (Sutherland's Trustees), First Parties.—Black.

MRS MARY ANNE SUTHERLAND OR CLARKSON AND HUSBAND, Second Parties.—Reid.

MRS MARGARET MOWAT OR SUTHERLAND AND JOHN SUTHERLAND, Third Parties.—Black.

GEORGE SUTHERLAND, Fourth Party.—M'Kechnie.

Succession—Vesting—Trust.—Where trustees are directed to hold a fund for behoof of children, and to divide and pay the same when it can be conveniently done, and it is declared that in the event of a child dying without issue before receiving his share under the trust the same shall be divided among the survivors, payment to one beneficiary of his share fixes the period of vesting for all.

2D DIVISION.

JOHN SUTHERLAND died on 16th May 1856 leaving a trust-disposition and settlement executed the previous day, by which he directed his trustees to hold his estate for behoof of his wife and four children equally share and share alike.

The deed proceeded—"And I direct my said trustees, when the same can be conveniently done, to divide, pay, assign, and dispone the same accordingly, it being distinctly understood that my wife shall have the

No. 18.

Oct. 29, 1874.
Sutherland's Trustees v. Clarkson.

same share as one of my children, declaring that, in the event of any one of my children predeceasing me, or dying without lawful issue before receiving his share under this trust, the share of such child shall be divided between my wife and my other children equally amongst them, share and share alike; and declaring further, that in the event of my eldest surviving son, or his heirs, quarrelling this disposition and claiming right as heir to my heritage, he or they shall not have any right whatever to any share or portion of my moveable estate, and he is hereby in that case expressly excluded therefrom, and my trustees shall divide the same amongst my wife and other children."

The truster had been twice married. He was survived by his second wife, one daughter of the first marriage, who became Mrs Clarkson a few months after her father's death, and three sons of the second marriage, John, Alexander, and George, born in 1851, 1853, and 1854 respectively.

The trustees, being aware that the settlement was reducible so far as regards the heritage ex capite lecti, allowed the eldest son, upon his coming of age on 17th May 1872, to repudiate the settlement and take possession of the heritage, without requiring him to obtain a decree of reduction.

The trustees in 1857 paid to the truster's widow and daughter two-fourths of the free moveable estate, the other two-fourths being retained for behoof of the younger sons. There was no minute of the trustees allocating any part of the estate to Alexander or George.

Alexander died on 12th May 1872 unmarried and intestate, without any portion having been handed over to himself.

Mrs Clarkson, who, upon the assumption that the share provided to Alexander had vested in him, was excluded from his succession by his full brothers, maintained that the period of vesting was postponed till distribution, and that, consequently, the share was divisible, under the father's settlement, between the widow and the other children.

A special case was presented to the Court by—(1) Sutherland's trustees; (2) Mrs Clarkson and husband; (3) Mrs Sutherland, the truster's widow, and John Sutherland, the truster's eldest son; (4) George Sutherland, the truster's youngest son.

The questions submitted to the Court were,—"1. Did the share of the said trust-estate, provided to the truster's son Alexander, vest in Alexander prior to his death? 2. To whom, and in what proportions, are the parties of the first part bound to pay the foresaid balance of said share remaining in their hands?"

Argued for Mrs Clarkson;—Where trustees were directed to pay when the same could be conveniently done, a delaration in the trust-deed that vesting shall not take place till payment must receive effect, unless there was undue delay on the part of the trustees in making the division.[1] Here there was no undue delay, for till the eldest son came of age the amount of the fund divisible could not be ascertained.

Counsel for the other parties were not called upon.

The Court held that although it lay with the trustees to fix the period of payment, which was also to be the period of vesting, they could not fix different periods of vesting in the case of the different beneficiaries; that the payment to one beneficiary of her share proved that the convenient time had arrived, and the period of vesting was therefore fixed when the widow and daughter received their shares.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"The Lords . . . are of opinion and find (1) that the share of the trust-estate of the late [1] Howat's Trustees v. Howat, Dec. 17, 1869, 8 Macph. 337, 42 Scot. Jur. 116; Thorburn v. Thorburn, Feb. 16, 1836, 14 S. 485, 8 Scot. Jur. 239.

No. 18.

Oct. 29, 1874. Sutherland's Trustees v. Clarkson.

John Sutherland, under his trust-disposition and settlement, provided to the truster's son Alexander, vested in Alexander prior to Alexander's death; and (2) that the balance of the said share is divisible in the following proportions, viz., one-third each to the parties of the third and fourth parts in the special case; and decern."

D. Currob, S.S.C.—Philip, Laing, & Monro, W.S.—H. W. Cornillon, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 19.

Oct. 30, 1874. Magistrates of Inverkeithing v. Ross.

THE MAGISTRATES OF INVERKEITHING, Pursuers.—D. F. Clark—Orr Paterson.
ALEXANDER ROSS, Defender.—Marshall—M'Laren.

Superior and Vassal—Entry—Composition—Novodamus.—A vassal who held lands under old charters in favour of disponees, "their heirs and assignees," and by which the duties payable at entry of "heirs and assignees" were taxed at double the feu-duty, obtained in 1858 a charter of confirmation and novodamus. The clauses of confirmation and novodamus were in favour of the vassal, "his heirs and assignees whomsoever, excluding assignees before infeftment." The duties payable at the entry of "heirs and assignees" were taxed at double the feu-duty.

In an action of declarator of non-entry brought by the superior, held (1) that the taxing clause in the earlier charters must be read as applicable only to assignees before infeftment, and not as applicable to disponees; and (2) (rev. judgment of Lord Young), that the taxing clause must receive the same construction in the charter of novodamus, in respect that it did not appear that the terms of the entry were intended to be altered.

Question, Whether, in the construction of a charter it is competent to refer to the previous negotiations of the parties when a reference to these negotiations is made in the charter?

1st Division. Lord Young. R.

THIS action was raised on 6th May 1874 by the provost, magistrates, councillors, and treasurer of the royal burgh of Inverkeithing against Alexander Ross, concluding for declarator that the following lands belonging to the defender, of which the provost, and magistrates, and councillors were superiors, were in non-entry by the death of James Wilson, the last vassal infeft, viz.:—"(1) Eight-sixteenth parts of Crooks or Cruicks Easter; (2) one-sixteenth part of the lands of Crooks or Cruicks Wester, called Foul Briggs; (3) five-sixteenth parts of lands lying in Easter Cruicks, sometime possessed by John Lindsay, tenant thereof,—all as particularly described in the instrument of sasine in favour of the deceased Alexander Wilson, contractor, sometime residing at Granton, recorded in the General Register of Sasines at Edinburgh the 25th day of June 1858."

In his defences the defender stated that the superiors refused to give an entry except on payment of a year's rent, and maintained that he was only bound to pay double the feu-duty.

In support of this defence the defender founded chiefly upon a charter of confirmation and novodamus granted by the magistrates in June 1858. "Considering that the conditions and reservations under which some of the lands aftermentioned are held as expressed in the recent charters thereof are not conform to the conditions contained in the original and more ancient charters of these lands, and that questions have arisen between us and Alexander Wilson, contractor, residing at Granton, the vassal, as to the clauses, and conditions which are obligatory upon him, and we have agreed to compromise and transact all such questions, by the said Alexander Wilson paying to the town-council of said burgh the sum of £300 sterling upon our granting him a charter of confirmation and novo-

No. 19.

Oct. 30, 1874. Magistrates of Inverkeithing v. Ross.

damus, in the terms and manner afterwritten, and now seeing," &c., "we do hereby confirm for ever to and in favour of the said Alexander Wilson, and his heirs and assignees whomsoever (but excluding assignees before infeftment)," &c., "(1) All and Whole these eight-sixteenth parts," &c.; "and we . . . . . do hereby of new sell, alienate, and in feu-farm dispone to and in favour of the said Alexander Wilson, his heirs and assignees whomsoever, but excluding assignees before infeftment, and declaring that these presents shall not be a valid warrant for sasine after the term of Martinmas next (1) All and Whole these eight-sixteenth parts," &c., "with entry as at the term of Martinmas last, and we oblige ourselves and our successors in office to infeft the said Alexander Wilson and his foresaids, To be holden . . . the said Alexander Wilson and his foresaids paying yearly to us and our successors in office, or to our treasurer for the time being, for the several lands, as follows, viz., for the said eight-sixteenth parts of Crooks Easter the sum of," &c., "doubling the said feu-duties at the entry of every heir or assignee to the said several lands."

In all the charters prior to 1850 the grants were in favour of the disponees, their heirs and assignees, and the entry of "heirs and assignees" was taxed at double the feu-duty. In the case of some of the earlier charters of certain of the lands,* the words followed, "as use is of feu-farm."

The pursuers contended that the word "assignee," as so used in the earlier charters, could only be construed as meaning assignee before infeftment, and that the word "assignee" in the taxing clause of the charter of novodamus must be construed in the same way, the intention of the parties in inserting the clause, excluding assignees before infeftment, and requiring infeftment within twelve months, obviously being merely to force an immediate entry, and not to alter the taxing clause.

The earlier charters referred to are quoted in the opinion of the Lord President.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuers are bound to grant an entry to William Wilson, contractor, Granton Villa, as vassal in the lands comprehended in the charter of confirmation and novodamus of date 2d June 1858, referred to in the record, being the lands first, second, and fourth specified in the summons, on payment of a duplicand of the feu-duties exigible for said subjects, the said William Wilson being ready and willing to take such entry; and appoints the case to be put to the roll: Grants leave to the pursuers to reclaim, if so advised."†

---

* See Lord Deas' opinion, p. 55.

† "NOTE.—. . . With respect to the lands first, second, and fourth specified, and which are comprehended in the charter of novodamus of 2d June 1858, the question between the parties turns on the construction of the word 'assignees' as used in the reddendo in that charter. The pursuers maintain that it means only those to whom the personal right before infeftment is transferred, assignation being in that case only the proper form of conveyance. The defender, on the other hand, while conceding that the terms 'assignation' and 'assignee,' when used with technical accuracy, are only applicable, the one to the transference, and the other to the transferee, of the personal right, maintains that the term 'assignee' is sufficiently flexible to admit of another construction which will comprehend a disponee of the complete feudal right, when that clearly appears to be in accordance with the meaning and intention of the party using it, which he contends is the case here, and relies on the case of Hamilton v. Dunn, 15 D. 925.

"I agree with the defender,—1st, that the term 'assignees' is flexible, and may mean disponees of the feudal subject; and 2d, that this is the sense in which it is used in the charter of 2d June 1858. The exclusion of 'assignees before

No. 19.

Oct. 30, 1874. Magistrates of Inverkeithing v. Ross.

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—In none of the earlier charters was there any limitation of the superior's right to claim composition upon the entry of a singular successor, and so, if there was such limitation, it could only be found in the charter of confirmation and novodamus. In that charter there occurred, in the confirmation clause and clause of novodamus, the expression "excluding assignees before infeftment," while in the reddendo the usual expression "heirs and assignees" was used. The question was, did the expression in the two former clauses limit and explain that in the latter clause? It did not have any such effect, for the plain reason that the insertion of the expression was to benefit the superior, and not for the purpose of limiting or abandoning a right which he formerly had. The purpose was to make it clear that the disponee and his heirs alone could take infeftment, and to prevent him assigning the charter with open precept. It was not intended to make any change in the holding.[1]

The defender argued;—"Assignee" was a word of the widest signification, meaning a person to whom a right was conveyed in one way or another from the original vassal. Here the meaning which parties intended to put upon the word was clear, from the use of the words "excluding assignees before infeftment" in the dispositive clause. When in one clause of a charter a distinct meaning was impressed upon a word, a different meaning would not be given to the word in another clause except upon the strongest grounds, and the clearest indication that such different meaning was to be used. But there was no indication of any qualification of the word "assignee" in the reddendo clause, and it must there be read as excluding assignees before infeftment—that was, as meaning disponees or singular successors.

When there was a new grant in gremio of a deed it was not competent to refer to former grants. In all cases in which the Court had held that it was competent to go back to the old infeftments the novodamus expressly stipulated that such should be the case.

The clause of the charter of confirmation and novodamus, giving the consideration of granting, bears that the deed was intended to settle all disputes between the parties, and the question of entry must be held to infeftment' shews clearly that the term is not used in the sense of assignees before infeftment, and disponees is the only other meaning that it admits of. That it does admit of this meaning is settled by the case of Hamilton v. Dunn.

---

"The pursuers further maintain, that it appears from the negotiations and correspondence, which resulted in the charter of 1858, that the novodamus was for the purpose of settling some controversies about mineral rights, and that it was not in the view of the parties to make any change upon the reddendo with respect to casualties or otherwise. But, first, I think it is not allowable to refer to negotiations or correspondence in order to construe the charter; and, second, the original charters of the lands embraced in the novodamus have not been produced, and I understand are not now obtainable. Farther, the previous charters by progress produced are not clear in the pursuers' favour for an untaxed entry of singular successors, and it is the legitimate purpose of a novodamus to make the reddendo, including the taxation of casualties, certain."

[1] Bell's Prs. sec. 728; Bell's Ill. vol. ii. pp. 34 and 37; Boyd v. The Vassals of the Estate of Linlithgow, Elchies, voce Superior and Vassal, No. 13; Hamilton v. Dunn, July 16, 1853, 15 D. 925, 25 Scot. Jur. 576; Magistrates of Inverness v. Duff, M. 15,059; Thomson, May 22, 1810, F. C.; Craig, 2, 12, 8 and 9; Ersk. 2, 3, 20, and 23; M'Leod v. Ross, 1777, 2 Paton, 430; Stewart v. Duke of Montrose, Feb. 15, 1860, 22 D. 755, 32 Scot. Jur. 308; Harvie v. Stewart, Nov. 17, 1870, 9 Macph. 129, 43 Scot. Jur. 73.

No. 19.

Oct. 30, 1874.
Magistrates of Inverkeithing v. Ross.

have been one of these questions. In that charter "assignee" meant "disponee."

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a declarator of non-entry at the instance of the Magistrates of Inverkeithing against Alexander Ross. There is no dispute that the defender's lands are in non-entry, or that the pursuers are the superiors. The dispute is whether the vassal is or is not entitled to be entered on payment of a double of the feu-duty. The parcels of ground in dispute are those mentioned in the first, second, and fourth conclusions of the summons, and the pursuers contend that in regard to each of these they are entitled to a year's rent. The defender contends that the entry is taxed at a duplicand of the feu-duty. The Lord Ordinary has found that the entry is so taxed, and he has not pronounced any further order. The question is one of considerable importance, and in considering it, it is necessary to give attention to the charters which have been laid before us. As regards the first and second parcels, we have not the original charter. In regard to the fourth, we have an original charter. But in regard to the other two, although we have not the original, we have charters by progress, which distinctly set forth the reddendo and the terms of entry. The first parcel is the eight-sixteenth part of Easter Crooks, and is contained in a charter of confirmation of 1690, in which the reddendo is thus expressed,—"The said Master Duncan Whyt and his foresaids paying yerily for the lands above written to us and our successors or treasurer for the tyme, the soume of threttie-four pund ten shilling Scots money, and that at two termes in the year, Whitsonday and Mertimies, be equall portiones, in name of few-ferme, doubleing the said few-ferme in and at the entrie of everie air or assigney, or airs or assigneyes, to the foresaid lands, with ther pertinents, as use is, of few-ferme."

The second parcel is one-sixteenth of Wester Crooks, and the earliest charter of it which we have is dated 23d February 1826. It is a charter of resignation, in which the reddendo is thus stated,—"For payment to us and our successors in office, or our treasurer for the time, for the use and behoof of the community of the said burgh, for the said one-sixteenth part of Crooks or Cruicks Wester, of the sum of four pounds six shillings and six pennies Scots, at the term of Lammas yearly, in name of feu-farm, beginning the first year's payment at Lammas next to come, with the double of the said feu at the entry of every heir or assignee to the land."

The fourth parcel of Easter Crooks comes to be united with another sixteenth of Easter Crooks, and now stands as five-sixteenths of the lands of Easter Crooks. The original charter of the one-fourth is dated in 1603, and in it the reddendo is thus expressed,—"Reddendo inde annuatim predicti Thomas Mitchell et Isobella Broun ejus spousa heredesque eorum et assignati ut supra nobis et successoribus nostris seu Thesaurariis pro tempore pro dictis terris cum pertinentiis ejusdem summam triginta solidorum usualis monete regni Scotie tanquam firmam antiquam seu annuum redditum de predictis terris solvi solitum, nec non summam duodecim librarum monete predicte in augmentationem rentalis extendendo in toto ad summam tredecim librarum et decem solidorum monete prescripte, annuatim solvendarum ad duos anni terminos consuetos festa viz. Pentecostes et Sancti Martini in hieme per equales medias portiones nomine feudifirme Duplicando dictam feudifirmam seu annuum redditum in introitu cujuslibet eorum heredis vel assignati tantum ad dictas terras cum pertinentiis jacentes ut supra

No. 19.

Oct. 30, 1874.
Magistrates of Inverkeithing v. Ross.

prout usus est feudifirme tantum pro omni alio onere seruicio seculari questione seu demanda que de predictis terris cum pertinentiis prefato burgo spectantibus per quoscumque juste exigi poterint quomodolibet vel requiri."

Then by a charter of confirmation, 20th September 1664, we have the total subject extending to five-sixteenths of Easter Crooks, and the expression is in substance the same, "Doubling the said feu-ferme at the entrie of any of their heir or heirs or assignees to the said lands, with the pertinents whatsomever, as use is of feu-ferme." It appears to me that in regard to all these the expression is substantially the same.

The duplicand is said to be payable at the entry of every heir and assignee to the feu. Keeping in view that the right of the superior to a year's rent on entering a vassal is a clear legal right, I am of opinion that there is no taxation of the entry of singular successors in the original charters. It would be dangerous to hold that the superior intended to change the reddendo merely because a different expression has been used in charters by progress.

For the purpose of illustrating this I refer to a charter of resignation, of date 4th April 1850, which bears that "in consideration of the sum of £21, 11s. 3d. Scots money, instantly paid to our treasurer, do hereby give, grant, and dispone for us and our successors in office perpetually, confirm to and in favour of John Forrest, clerk in the National Bank of Scotland's office, Edinburgh, the great-great-grandson of the deceased John Craich, sometime bailie of Inverkeithing, his heirs and disponees, secluding assignees before infeftment, heritably and irredeemably," and then there follow the words "doubling the feu at the entry of every heir or assignee to the same." It might be contended that, as assignees before infeftment are excluded, and as the conveyance is to John Forrest and his heirs and disponees, assignees must mean disponees; but this would be a dangerous supposition, as nine years before a singular successor is entered on payment of a composition. Therefore it would be rash to infer from the use of the particular expression by a conveyancer in a charter by progress that there is a purpose by the superior to abandon his right.

But what the defender mainly rests his case on is a charter containing a novodamus. When you have a novodamus you may very properly suppose that the charter contains something which was not in former charters. Now, this charter of confirmation and novodamus, which is dated 2d June 1858, contains a very distinct cause of granting,—"Considering that the conditions and reservations under which some of the lands aftermentioned are held as expressed in the recent charters are not conform to the conditions contained in the original and more ancient charters of these lands, and that questions have arisen between us and Alexander Wilson, contractor, residing at Granton, the vassal, as to the clauses and conditions which are obligatory upon him, and we have agreed to compromise and transact all such questions, by the said Alexander Wilson paying to the town-council of the burgh the said sum of £300 sterling upon our granting him a charter of confirmation and novodamus, in the terms and manner afterwritten." Now, this charter contains the whole of the three parcels of land in question, and the object of granting the novodamus is to reconcile differences which had arisen between the ancient and recent charters. When we examine the charters we find what the discrepancies were. In the old charters the reservation of the minerals is for the use of the superior, and in the recent one the reservation was absolute. The first time the absolute reservation occurs is in a charter of confirmation in 1728. In the older charters the reservation is always in the same terms as in the charter of 1603. "Reservando nobis et successoribus nostris burgensibus predicti burgi de dictis terris aut aliqua earundem parte potestatem lucrandi effodiendi et abducendi carbones lapides duffatis faillis clay cum libero introitu et exitu in et ad eadem ut expedit nostris usibus tantum intra libertatem prefati burgi." After 1728 the reservation of minerals is absolute. Now, so far as I can see there are no other discrepancies between the modern and ancient charters. There is no change of the entry of singular successors or of heirs. In this novodamus we have a restoration of the old qualified reservation of minerals. The vassal paid £300 for his charter, and he expects that he should get something for his money. What he gets is the qualified reservation, and this is a very distinct reason for granting the novodamus. But it is said that the charter is so expressed as necessarily to alter the mode of entry. It may be so, and if it is done with sufficient clearness to show that such was the intention it will be effectual. But the grant of novodamus is not to be extended beyond the words which occur in the confirmation clause,—"We, the said provost, bailies, treasurer, and councillors, for ourselves and our foresaids, and representing as aforesaid, do hereby confirm for ever to and in favour of the said Alexander Wilson, and his heirs and assignees whomsoever (but excluding assignees before infeftment)," and in the clause of novodamus, "do hereby of new sell, alienate, and in feu-farm dispone to and in favour of the said Alexander Wilson, his heirs and assignees whomsoever, but excluding assignees before infeftment, and declaring that these presents shall not be a valid warrant for sasine after the term of Martinmas next." In connection with this the defender has pointed out that the reddendo clause is thus expressed,—"The said Alexander Wilson and his foresaids paying yearly to us and our successors in office, or to our treasurer for the time being, for the several lands as follows, viz., for the said eight-sixteenth parts of Crooks Easter, doubling the said feu-duties at the entry of every heir or assignee to the said several lands." The argument was that as assignees before infeftment are excluded, therefore assignees cannot mean assignees before infeftment, and must mean singular successors or disponees. But the reason of the expression appears from the novodamus, where assignees before infeftment are excluded, and it is declared "that these presents shall not be a valid warrant for sasine after the term of Martinmas next." The object is plainly to ensure that the charter should be immediately feudalised. The circumstance that there was an alteration in the reservation of minerals made it necessary that the charter should be immediately feudalised. There is one person at least in the burgh whose interest it is to have as many transfers as possible, and this clause secures that there shall be as many infeftments as possible. But, having thus found a sufficient explanation for the words, I cannot think that it was intended by them to alter the reddendo. The result therefore of my opinion is that the entry of singular successors is not taxed.

No. 19.

Oct. 30, 1874.
Magistrates of Inverkeithing v. Ross.

LORD DEAS.—This is a question between superior and vassal. The vassal claims right to an entry upon payment of double feu-duty, and the superior demands a year's rent. The vassal's claim is founded on two different grounds,—1st, It is said that under the original charters the entry of singular successors, as well as of heirs, is taxed at a double of the feu-duty; and 2d, that assuming this not to be so, the benefit of such taxation was extended to singular successors by the charter of confirmation and novodamus granted and accepted in

No. 19.

Oct. 30, 1874.
Magistrates of Inverkeithing v. Ross.

1858. These two pleas are altogether distinct, and require to be separately considered.

The lands in dispute are those described in the first, second, and fourth conclusions of the summons, viz.,—1st, Eight-sixteenths of Cruicks Easter; 2d, one-sixteenth of Cruicks Wester; and 3d, five-sixteenths of Cruicks Easter.

It will be convenient to consider the titles of the last-mentioned lands first, because it is of these lands only that what appears to be an original grant has been produced; or, rather, to speak quite precisely, an original grant of four out of the five-sixteenths has been produced, to which another sixteenth was afterwards added, which the pursuers have slumped along with the four-sixteenths in the fourth head of their summons, and held to be in the same position with the four-sixteenths.

The grant of the four-sixteenths (therein called a fourth part) of Cruicks Easter, is dated 24th March 1603. It conveys the lands (reserving a certain privilege as to the coal, &c.) to Thomas Mitchell, and Isobel Brown, his wife, and longest liver of them, in conjunct fee, and to the heirs procreated, or to be procreated between them, whom failing to the said Thomas Mitchell, his heirs and assignees whomsoever, for payment of a specified feu-duty,—"Duplicando dictam feudifirmam seu annuum redditum in introitu cujuslibet eorum heredis vel assignati tantum ad dictas terras cum pertinentiis jacentis ut supra prout usus est feudifirme tantum pro omni alio onere," &c.

The earliest deed produced applicable to the additional one-sixteenth of Cruicks Easter is a charter of confirmation dated 20th September 1664. The reddendo clause of that charter is identical in its terms with the reddendo clause of the charter of 1603, and I need not repeat the quotation.

Now, it appears to me that upon the terms of these charters there is no question open. It has been decided that a reddendo clause in the above terms does not include taxation of the entry of singular successors, and that the word "assignees" in such a clause means assignees before infeftment.

The case of the Magistrates of Inverness v. Duff and Others, 2d February 1769, is precisely in point. The reddendo there was for payment by the vassal "hæredes sui et assignati" of a specified annual sum, "nec non duplicando dictam feudifirmam primo anno introitus cujuslibet hæredis aut assignati et dictas terras aliaque præscripta, prout usus est feudifirmæ duplicatæ, pro omni alio onere," &c. In an action of declarator of non-entry against the defenders, who were singular successors, they pleaded that they were assignees in the sense of the reddendo clause, and therefore entitled to be entered on payment of double feu-duty. The report bears—"The Lords found the defenders liable to the town of Inverness for a full year's rent upon getting an entry from the town."

This judgment proceeded upon the footing that the word assignees, as used in the reddendo clause, meant assignees before the charter should be feudalised by infeftment. All the authorities affirm that to be a sound proposition—Stair, 2, 3, 5; Erskine, 2, 7, 5.

The feu-rights in the case of the Magistrates of Inverness, like the charter of 1603 in this case, had been granted at a time when the vassal could not voluntarily alienate the feu to any one not alioqui successurus without the authority or consent of the superior, which remained necessary till the passing of the Act 20 Geo. II., c. 50. In a question whether and how far the superior has relaxed that rule the words used by him in the charter have always been con-

No. 19.

Oct. 30, 1874.
Magistrates of Inverkeithing v. Ross.

strued strictly in his favour. In modern conveyances,—now that all restrictions on the transmission of heritable estate have been removed,—the words "heirs and assignees," in an ordinary disposition, are understood to cover disponees as well as assignees properly so called. But the technically correct rule was that stated by Sir George Mackenzie (Lib. 3, tit. 5) that "if sasine be once taken on an heritable right it cannot thereafter be transmitted by assignation, but by disposition;" and, according to this rule, the word "assignees" in a reddendo clause was held to mean assignees to the grant so long, but so long only, as it stood upon what we still familiarly call a personal right to the lands, meaning thereby a right not followed by infeftment. It was, however, by no means a valueless privilege to the vassal to be authorised to transfer his right to the lands so long as he had not taken infeftment. Nor was it unusual for the vassal or his heirs to find it necessary to apply to the superior for an entry while holding an open charter,—examples of which are given by Lord Curriehill in Hamilton v. Dunn, 15 D. 945-6. That a feu-charter in favour of a party et heredibus et assignatis quibuscunque did not entitle the feuar to assign or convey before infeftment was brought out in the strongest of all ways, viz., in a process of recognition, in the case of Lady Carnegie, 5th February 1663, M. 10,375, followed by the case of Lockhart, 14th January 1696, M. 6411.

The only variation between the terms of the charters applicable to the five-sixteenths of Cruicks Easter, granted in 1603 and 1664, and the subsequent charters prior in date to the charter of novodamus of 1858, consists in the omission in the later charters, of the words "as use is in feu-farm," which were in the two older charters. But it is not said that this mere omission can have the effect of innovating upon the reddendo as expressed in the charters of 1603 and 1664, and the result necessarily is that, as regards these five-sixteenths of Cruicks Easter, this case, unless in so far as affected by the novodamus of 1858, stands upon all fours with the case of the Magistrates of Inverness.

As regards the eight-sixteenths of Cruicks Easter, the earliest charter produced is a charter of confirmation dated 25th February 1790. The reddendo of that charter is in the same terms with charters of 1603 and 1664 applicable to the five-sixteenths, and the same omission of the words "as use is in feu-farm" occurs in the subsequent charters prior to 1858. The remarks already made as to the five-sixteenths are therefore equally applicable to the eight-sixteenths of the lands of Cruicks Easter.

With regard to the one-sixteenth of Cruicks Wester only two deeds are produced altogether,—a charter of resignation dated 23d February 1826 and a charter of confirmation dated 27th March 1851. In both of these deeds the reddendo clause is for payment of a specified annual sum "with the double of the said feu at the entry of every heir or assignee to the said lands, and that for all burden, secular service, question, or demand, which can be exacted or required furth thereof." The words "as use is in feu-farm" are not in either of these deeds, but I did not understand it to be contended that the want of these words, especially in the absence of the original grant, which may have contained them, will warrant us in holding that "assignee" meant anything else than "assignee before infeftment," if this be the legitimate meaning of the word in the charters of the other lands in dispute.

But assuming all this to be decided adversely to the defender, his second contention is,—and here he has the judgment of the Lord Ordinary in his favour,—that the reddendo clause was innovated upon and changed by the charter of confirmation and novodamus of 2d June 1858, so as to extend the taxing clause to all singular successors.

No. 19. Oct. 30, 1874. Magistrates of Inverkeithing v. Ross.

In judging of this contention we must not only set out with the assumption that this was not so under the titles as they stood prior to 1858, but we must keep in view the grounds and principles which obviously led to the conclusion arrived at in the case of the Magistrates of Inverness, although not fully embodied in the report of the case. This is necessary in order to enable us to judge of the effect of the variations from the previous deeds, which are to be found in the deed of 1858, and it is for this reason mainly that, in the first part of my opinion, I have so far explained these grounds and principles as being sound in themselves, in place of simply citing the authority of the case of the Magistrates of Inverness.

That in the deed of 1858 there are certain variations from the phraseology of the previous deeds is undoubted. The question is whether these have the effect of extending the application of the taxing clauses in the original grants which were in full operation at and prior to the date of that deed.

In this respect the case is quite different from the cases of Hamilton v. Dunn, 16th July 1858, in which the question was (as in the first branch of this case) as to the import and effect of the original grants. The grounds upon which the majority of the Court in that case held the entry of singular successors in general to be taxed as regarded Wester Kilbowie were substantially, 1st, that in place of saying "as use is in feu-farm," there were long and special stipulations applicable to different circumstances, indicating that nothing was left upon this general rule of law; 2d, that while heirs were to be entered on payment of double feu-duty, the assignees mentioned, in place of being put on the same level with them (as in the case of the Magistrates of Inverness) were to pay quadruple the feu-duty; and 3d, that the deeds specified by which the assignees mentioned were to enter were deeds appropriate to the entry of singular successors after infeftment, viz., by "charter of confirmation, resignation, or otherways as can be best devised."

The grounds on which a like conclusion was arrived at, by the majority, with respect to Easter Kilbowie and Milton of Duntocher (which the parties did not distinguish from it) were substantially, 1st, that the superior in place of binding himself to receive heirs and assignees, bound himself to receive the heirs and successors of the vassal and of the vassal's heirs. 2d, These heirs and assignees were to be received upon payment, by each heir, of five merks Scots, and, by each assignee, to whom the lands should "happen to be disponed in haill or in part," of ten merks, which, in place of being double feu-duty, in either case, was a mere fractional part of the feu-duty, which was £81, 13s. 4d. Scots per annum. This, it is obvious, was not "as use is in feu-farm," and, accordingly, these words were not used. 3d. The assignees who were to be entered on payment of ten merks were, as the quotation just made bears, assignees to whom the lands should be "disponed" in whole or in part, implying that the class of "successors" who were to be received, was not limited to proper assignees but comprehended disponees.

A weighty minority thought that these reasons were not sufficient to overcome the presumption in favour of the superior's right to a year's rent; but, whether they were sufficient or not, that case cannot solve the present, in which we have the additional presumption which always arises against innovation of the original grant, and which can only be overcome by shewing that the superior and vassal had transacted and agreed to make the particular innovation in dis pute. It may be that that presumption is not quite so strong where the alleged innovation is in favour of the vassal as where it is against him, because the superior's agent generally prepares the deed; but still it is a well established and strong presumption either way.

No. 19.

Oct. 30, 1874. Magistrates of Inverkeithing v. Ross.

I am not prepared to say that there is any general incompetency in referring to contemporaneous documents passing between the superior and vassal, in ascertaining whether innovation had been transacted for or not. An important authority on that point came under our notice in the late case of Harvie v. Stewart, 17th November 1870, 9 Macph. 129. An older case between the predecessors of the parties was there referred to, in which a variation was said to have been made in a charter of confirmation granted in 1794, on the terms in which the coal in the lands had been mentioned in the original titles. In 1804 the vassal sought to reduce the charter in so far as regarded that variation. Lord Armadale, Ordinary, assoilzied from the reduction, but this upon the express grounds, 1st, that the charter "was adjusted by the men of business of the parties in Edinburgh, upon production of the original titles, and after a very tedious discussion for years before them;" and 2d, in respect that the said charter declares that the reservations therein are conform to the ancient rights and infeftments, which ancient rights and infeftments the pursuer has not produced in this process." To this judgment the Court adhered in terminis on 30th May 1810 (quoted 9 Macph. 133-4.) In the present case the charter in dispute itself supplies to a great extent the necessary narrative for ascertaining what the innovation intended by it was, and drives us, so far as that narrative is imperfect or ambiguous, to the previous titles and the contemporary documents for the explanation of what it leaves doubtful. The charter narrates "that the conditions and reservations under which some of the lands aftermentioned are held as expressed in the recent charters thereof are not conform to the conditions contained in the original and more ancient charters of these lands, and that questions have arisen between us and Alexander Wilson, contractor, residing at Granton, the vassal, as to the clauses and conditions which are obligatory upon him, and we have agreed to compromise and transact all such questions by the said Alexander Wilson paying to the town-council of our burgh the sum of £300 sterling upon our granting him a charter of confirmation and novodamus in the terms and manner afterwritten." Nothing could be more explicit to shew that the questions which were to be compromised and transacted were solely questions which had arisen, and that these related entirely to conditions and reservations which were differently expressed in the recent charters from what they had been in the original and more ancient charters, and an examination of the title-deeds themselves indicates pretty clearly that this difference did not relate to the tennendas or reddendo clauses, but to the reservation of minerals.

But this is placed beyond all doubt by what took place at the time, as recorded in writings which must be presumed to have been known to and acquiesced in by the vassal who entered into the compromise and transaction which was proposed to him by the superior. The town-council on 5th February 1858, on the narrative that the vassal was applying for a charter with a limited reservation of the minerals in favour of the burgesses only, in place of the unqualified reservation contained in recent charters, remitted to the town-clerk, Mr Fraser, to investigate how this matter stood, and to report. Mr Fraser accordingly examined all the title-deeds, and reported how the clauses as to

No. 19.
Oct. 30, 1874.
Magistrates of Inverkeithing v. Ross.

minerals were expressed in the various charters, and thereupon the town-council authorised him to take the opinion of counsel on the subject, and to ascertain whether the vassal "would enter into a compromise, which might be taken into consideration along with the entry-money" (meaning, obviously, the entry-money he was to pay on that particular occasion, which was afterwards fixed at £300), to all which the vassal agreed, and the charter of confirmation and novodamus was granted and accepted accordingly.

None of the variations reported by the town-clerk as occurring in the progress of titles had any reference to the tenendas or reddendo clauses, and it is plain that no question had arisen between the parties as to either of these clauses. The object in adding a novodamus to the confirmation obviously was that the vassal might have an unequivocal conveyance to the property of the minerals as partes soli, subject only to a limited use thereof reserved to the burgesses of the burgh. No trace of an intention to alter or interfere with the bearing or legal effect of the tenendas or reddendo clauses anywhere appears.

Holding it now to be clear that the narrative of the charter of 1858 does not set forth or indicate any intention to innovate upon the tenendas or reddendo clauses of the then existing investiture, let us next see what the words in that charter are which are supposed to have this effect.

The Lord Ordinary mentions them in the note to his interlocutor. He says,—"The exclusion of 'assignees before infeftment' shews clearly that the term is not used in the sense of assignees before infeftment, and disponees is the only other meaning that it admits of."

Now, with a view to precision, it is right to observe that it is not in the tenendas or reddendo clauses that these words occur. It is in the confirmation clause of the charter and in the dispositive clause of the novodamus that the new words are introduced. The words of the tenendas and reddendo clauses are identical with the words of the corresponding clauses in the only charters produced applicable to the one-sixteenth of Cruicks Wester, and they are also identical with the words of the corresponding clauses in the only charters produced applicable to the other disputed lands, viz., the eight-sixteenths and the five-sixteenths of Cruicks Easter, subject to the explanation that the older titles of these two last mentioned parcels contained the words, "as use is of feu-farm," which had been dropped out of the later titles.

Of course the construction of the word "foresaids" in the tenendas clause is affected by reference back to the confirmatory and dispositive clauses, so as to make the tenendas clause to import that the lands are to be holden of the superiors by Alexander Wilson, his heirs and assignees whomsoever, but excluding his assignees before infeftment. In other words, assignees before infeftment are not to hold the lands at all. But this only adds to the importance of the observation that it is into the confirmatory and dispositive clauses of the charter of 1858 that the new words are introduced; for the result of that is that the lands are not confirmed and conveyed to assignees before infeftment upon a different holding or reddendo from what they had previously been, but they are not confirmed or conveyed to assignees before infeftment at all. If the purpose was to extend to disponees after infeftment the same privilege of a taxed entry which had been previously conferred on assignees before infeftment this would certainly be a very strange and ineffectual mode of attempting it.

But the words introduced indicate no such purpose. Let it be kept in mind that with reference to the titles, as they stood prior to 1858, it was clear law that the words doubling the feu-duty at the entry of every heir or assignee conferred upon the vassal and his assignees before infeftment, but before infeftment only, a privilege, the importance of which I have already pointed out (although not so important now as it once was). To add to the words "every heir or assignee" the further words, "but excluding assignees before infeftment," was simply to neutralise that privilege, and this, which is the legal construction of the words, I have no doubt was the object of the town-clerk (acting for the superiors) who added them. The superiors had an interest (whether legitimate or not) to compel assignees before infeftment to accept of untaxed entries, not to speak of the interest of the town-clerk to increase his fees for charters and infeftments, and the words added were either calculated to produce these effects, or they could have no effect at all. I see that the same gentleman, as town-clerk, had introduced the same words into one of the previous charters of the five-sixteenths of Cruicks Easter, viz., the charter of resignation of 4th April 1850, but dropped them out again in the very next charter in the print of the same lands, dated 27th March 1856. There is no evidence whatever before us that the vassal transacted to give up the privilege competent to assignees before infeftment, and nothing I have said is meant to indicate that he must submit to have the added words continued in subsequent charters.

Be this as it may, however, I cannot hold that the addition of words which, in their terms, take away the privilege of an untaxed entry from a class of persons who had that privilege before, extend the privilege to an unlimited class of persons who had it not before. And yet that really is the result of the Lord Ordinary's judgment.

Although the parties have argued the case to us fully and ably upon both its branches, I do not observe that the Lord Ordinary indicates any doubt that but for the charter of 1858 the judgment must have been in favour of the superiors.

Taking that view of it, the question is not, as in Hamilton v. Dunn, and other cases of that class, what would be the construction of certain words in an original grant. The question is, whether, in a charter by progress, words have been used sufficient to innovate upon and alter the original grant. The introduction of a novodamus, for the purpose already explained, into the charter of confirmation did not prevent the charter from being, in other respects, a mere charter by progress; and taking the case so, I am clearly of opinion that the benefit of the taxing clauses has not been extended, by the charter of 1858, in the way contended for by the defender.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—There seems little room for doubt as to the facts of this case. The question raised is entirely one of construction of feudal title.

The pursuers are superiors of the subjects. The defender, Mr Ross, acquired the dominium utile of the subjects in May 1873 from William Wilson, who was the disponee of James Wilson, the last entered vassal. The disposition to William Wilson is dated 13th August 1868, and was followed by sasine on 14th August 1868. James Wilson after granting that disposition died in 1872.

William Wilson, disponee of the last entered vassal, is willing to enter with the superiors. But he maintains, and the defender, Mr Ross, as his disponee maintains, that he (William Wilson) is entitled to an entry on payment of the duplicand of feu-duty, which, he contends, is the composition at which the entry of a disponee or singular successor is taxed by the charter of confirmation and novodamus granted in June 1858. The pursuers deny that William Wilson is entitled to enter on payment of a taxed composition, and they demand payment of a year's rent.

No. 19.
Oct. 30, 1874.
Magistrates of Inverkeithing v. Ross.

The question depends, as I think, on the ascertainment of the true meaning of the charter of novodamus, read of course in connection with the older titles. The language of the novodamus is most unusual; the meaning is by no means clear; and the question of construction is, in my view, attended with extreme difficulty.

We must look, in the first place, at the original charter of 24th March 1603. The construction of that charter is not quite free from doubt; but reading it by the light derived from the authorities, both institutional and judicial, I concur in the opinion expressed by your Lordships, that the entry of a disponee or singular successor is not by that charter taxed to a duplicand of the feu-duty. The words "cujuslibet eorum heredis vel assignati" are qualified by the words "prout usus est feudefirme;" and these qualifying words are considered by all our authorities as most important. At the date of this charter, in 1603, there can be no doubt what was the feudal usage of Scotland on the subject of the entry of vassals. Therefore, giving effect to the reference and to the usage as referred to, I arrive at the same conclusion as your Lordships in regard to this charter. I come to the same conclusion in regard to the construction of the charter of 1690; and also, though not without some difficulty, in regard to the construction of the charter of 1826.

But the real difficulty arises on the construction of the charter of confirmation and novodamus in 1858.

This charter proceeds on the consideration "that the conditions and reservations under which some of the lands after-mentioned are held, as expressed in the recent charters thereof, are not conform to the original and more ancient charters of these lands, and that questions have arisen between us and Alexander Wilson, the vassal, as to the clauses and conditions which are obligatory on him." This introduction to the charter is important, as explaining the meaning of the charter. The cause and consideration of granting is disconformity between the conditions of recent charters and the conditions of the original and more ancient charters. In construing the grant of novodamus we must bear in mind that this disconformity in previous charters was the occasion and consideration of the grant. The charter then proceeds to narrate that "we (the superior and the vassal) have agreed to compromise all such questions." By these words I understand all questions which had arisen, or such as had arisen between the superior and vassal out of the disconformity which I have explained between the old and the recent charters. No other questions appear to have arisen. The mode of effecting the compromise and transaction of such questions which had been agreed on is then stated. The vassal pays £300, and the superiors grant a charter of confirmation and novodamus in the terms now before us. It is rightly maintained for the vassal that the terms of the charter, and especially of the novodamus as expressed, form the counterpart of the payment which he made; and that he is entitled to enforce it according to its true meaning. On the other hand, it is rightly contended for the superiors that the cause or consideration of granting the novodamus was the discovery of disconformity between the old and recent charters, and that the questions which had arisen related to the clauses and conditions in these conflicting charters, and that the agreement to compromise and transact embraced only all such questions as arose out of such disconformity.

The ascertainment of the true meaning of this introductory part of the charter is of great importance, and I shall have occasion for a moment to return to it.

No. 19.

Oct. 30, 1874.
Magistrates of Inverkeithing v. Ross.

In the meantime, I proceed to consider the terms of the clause of confirmation, and the terms of the clause of novodamus.

By this charter the superiors do confirm the subjects, which are fully described, "to and in favour of the said Alexander Wilson and his heirs and assignees whomsoever (but excluding assignees before infeftment)." Then the superiors proceed "of new to sell, alienate, and in feu-farm dispone to and in favour of the said Alexander Wilson, his heirs and assignees whomsoever, but excluding assignees before infeftment, and declaring that these presents shall not be a valid warrant for sasine after the term of Martinmas next." The obligation to infeft is "to infeft the said Alexander Wilson and his foresaids,"—and it is a fair remark, that this seems a singular obligation if by "foresaids" are meant disponees and not merely assignees before infeftment. The tenure is thus set forth,—"To be holden of us and our successors in office in feu-farm and heritage for ever by all the rights, meaths, and marches of the same, ancient and accustomed, as they lie in length and breadth." I am disposed to concur with the counsel for the defender in holding that the word "rights" may be a mistake for the word "righteous" meaths and marches. But still the holding is to be apparently according to ancient and accustomed possession. No new condition of tenure is in this clause set forth or suggested. Then the charter proceeds to set forth the sums annually payable by Alexander Wilson as feu-duty, which is followed by the words "doubling the said feu-duties at the entry of every heir or assignee to the said several lands." The words, "as use is," or similar words equivalent to the words "prout usus est feudefirme," do not occur in this charter of novodamus. The omission of these words is strongly and very properly founded on by the vassal, because such words have in several cases been held as qualifying the language in the context.

Now, the question before us turns on the construction of the word "assignees," as used in the reddendo in this charter of novodamus. I am of opinion that a charter of novodamus, in so far as it is a novodamus, has the character of an original grant. It is a grant de novo. In the words of Lord Stair, "the clause de novodamus doth dispone the fee as by an original right." Whatever is within a clause of novodamus by a subject superior is held to be validly granted, if the superior had the power to grant it. A variation from the original grant, if in favour of the superior, is unfavourably viewed by the law. He cannot augment his own rights and impair his vassal's rights in a charter of novodamus, unless by transaction with the vassal. Where the words require construction, an intention to withdraw or to restrict the rights of the vassal cannot be presumed in a charter of novodamus. The clause must, in dubio, be construed against such withdrawal or restriction of right. But where there is in the novodamus a concession of right by the superior, and where the right of the vassal is extended or amended, there is no such adverse presumption or unfavourable canon of construction. In such a case the power to make the concession being beyond question, the words of the grant must receive a fair, and, as regards the vassal, a not unfavourable construction, and their true meaning must be ascertained.

Now, what is the true meaning of the reddendo in this clause of novodamus, read in connection with the other clauses in the charter?

In approaching this question of construction I am disposed to go very much along with the argument for the vassal. The words must be fairly construed as they stand. There is no presumption against the vassal's claim. For my part, I must say that I think the claim is not in itself unreasonable. The superior's

No. 19.

Oct. 30, 1874.
Magistrates of Inverkeithing v. Ross.

right to demand a year's rent from the vassal on his entry may surely be surrendered by the superior on substitution of a duplicand of feu-duty. There is no presumption to exclude it; and looking to the relative rights of superior and vassal as now recognised, and as affected by equities which have arisen in the progress of society, I am disposed to think that the law would not look unfavourably on a construction in support of such a substitution.

I think it right also to add, that the date of this charter of novodamus is, in the question of construction, of some importance. This charter was granted in 1858, and I am not aware of any case in which a decision unfavourable to the vassal on such a question has been pronounced where the charter of novodamus was of recent date.

According to our older law, a feu was inalienable without consent of the superior. While such was the relation between the superior and the vassal it was to be expected that the clauses of a charter would be read in favour of the superior's rights, which the law then fully supported, and against the rights claimed by the vassal, which the law then refused to recognise. Therefore, charters dated during that early period of our law seem to have been construed in dubio in favour of the superior. But, when we look at the progress in the course of legislation on the subject—to the Act 1469, c. 37, an Act anent aprisers for debt—to the statute 1669, c. 18, anent adjudications—to the statute 1681, c. 17—and above all to the statute 20 George II. c. 50,—it seems impossible to doubt that the unfavourable presumptions, and the severe rules enforced in the construction of old charters have now lost much of their force, and are no longer applicable.

In the case of Hamilton v. Dunn, July 16, 1853, the charters were of date 1643 and 1659, a period when the vassal's right to alienate the feu had not been fully recognised, and yet, even in that case, and in regard to such a charter, the opinion of a majority of the Court was in favour of the vassal. In the case of the Magistrates of Inverness, and several of the other cases quoted, the charters were of old date, and suitable rules of construction were applied. In no case has a charter granted since the 20th of George II. been construed on a presumption so unfavourable to the vassal. If I understand aright the opinion of Lord Curriehill, whose opinion in the case of Hamilton v. Dunn was in favour of the superior, he would have taken a different view if he had been construing a modern charter. Therefore, up to the point of entering on the ascertainment of the meaning of this particular clause, my view of this case is favourable to the vassal.

But notwithstanding this, and setting aside as inapplicable all unfavourable presumptions or rules of construction adverse to the vassal's claim, I have come to the conclusion that, reading the words of the charter before us fairly, and endeavouring to ascertain their true meaning, it was not intended to alter the former holding, to change the customary entry, or to substitute a duplicand of feu-duty for payment of a year's rent. The charter was granted as the result of a compromise and transaction, and that was limited to disputes arising out of the disconformity of charters. There is no indication or suggestion of any question having arisen in regard to the conditions of entry before the date of this novodamus; there is no disconformity on that subject between the more recent and the more ancient charters; and there was, so far as we can see, no necessity, no occasion, and no desire, for compromise or transaction in regard to entry. The omission of the words "as use is," is, I admit, not without importance, for the introduction of these words has in several cases been viewed as qualifying the language of the context by reference to the prior usage. But here, where the new grant was issued as the result, and in terms of a compromise and transaction not relating to the subject of the vassal's entry, I do not think that the omission of the words "as use is" can have the effect contended for by the vassal.

No. 19.

Oct. 30, 1874.
Magistrates of Inverkeithing v. Ross.

Then I do not think that the use of the word "assignees" is of itself sufficient to support the defender's plea. A fixed and inflexible meaning is not attached to the word, and it does not necessarily and exclusively express assignees to the personal right and before infeftment. But it may do so; and it has frequently done so; and in this case, when I consider the introduction to the charter—the whole structure of the charter—the obligation to infeft "Alexander Wilson and his foresaids," which would be inapplicable if it meant his disponees,—and the fact of the existence of other questions regarding minerals, really turning on disconformity between the old and the recent charters—I feel unable to resist the conclusion at which your Lordships have arrived, that taxation of this entry by substitution of a duplicand feu-duty for a year's rent was not intended by the parties in 1858—not demanded by the vassal, and not conceded by the superior. I have considered this case with great anxiety. The views which I entertain in regard to the change in the relations between superior and vassal, and in regard to the presumptions and canons of construction in application to modern charters of novodamus, tended to dispose me to concur, if I could, with the Lord Ordinary's judgment. But notwithstanding these views, and not rejecting or overlooking the equitable considerations to which I have adverted, I have been unable to read the words of this charter before us otherwise than as your Lordships have done.

LORD MURE concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the said interlocutor: Find that the entry of singular successors to the lands first, second, and fourth mentioned in the conclusions of the summons is not taxed: Find the pursuers entitled to expenses since the date of the interlocutor reclaimed against, and remit to the Auditor to tax the account of the said expenses, and report to the Lord Ordinary, reserving all other questions of expenses; and remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed with the cause, and with power to decern for the expenses now found due."

J. & A. PEDDIE, W.S.—LINDSAY, PATERSON, & HALL, W.S.—Agents.

No. 20.

Oct. 30, 1874.
Robeson v. Waugh.

ROBERT ROBESON, Pursuer and Appellant.—Guthrie Smith—Blair.
ROBERT WAUGH, Defender and Respondent.—D.-F. Clark—M'Kechnie.

Sale—Horse—Warranty—Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, 19 and 20 Vict. c. 60, sec. 5.—To establish an express oral warranty of goods sold it is necessary to prove the very words used.

Sale—Horse—Fraud—Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, sec. 5.—In an action for payment of the price of a horse the defender disputed liability, on the ground that the pursuer had represented the horse to be sound while he knew it to be unsound, and that the defender had rejected it on the day after the sale. Held that, although it was proved that the horse was unsound at the date of the sale, the sale was valid, in respect that it was not proved that the seller either warranted it to be sound or knew of the unsoundness.

No. 20.

Oct. 30, 1874. Robeson v. Waugh.

1st Division, Sheriff of Haddington. M.

THIS was an action in the Sheriff-court of Haddington by Robert Robeson, farmer, Springwells, against Robert Waugh, farmer, Eweford, concluding for payment of £60, the price of a mare sold and delivered by the pursuer to the defender at Dunbar on 27th July 1873.

The defence was that the mare had been warranted sound and had turned out to be unsound.

A proof was led, in which the following facts were established:—Both the pursuer and the defender were members of the East Lothian and Berwickshire Yeomanry Cavalry. During the drill at Dunbar in the summer of 1873 the pursuer rode a grey mare, which he wished to sell. The defender was brought to look at the mare, on a Tuesday, on the sands of Dunbar during the drill, by a friend of the pursuer, a Mr Hogarth. The interview was thus described by the pursuer in his evidence,—"Defender asked me what I was wanting for the mare. I asked £70. He said it was too much. Defender asked if I would warrant her. I said, 'No, that she had never been lame with me.' I also said 'there is Mr Hogarth, he knows the mare as well as I do;' whereon Hogarth said that he 'never had seen her lame.' We did not make a bargain."

On the following Sunday the defender sent his groom with instructions to ask a Mr Elliot to buy the mare for £60, or a smaller sum. The groom not seeing Mr Elliot entered into negotiations for the purchase of the mare at £60. The mare had by this time been sent away from Dunbar, and was brought back. The pursuer met the defender in the Railway Hotel, Dunbar, on the Sunday evening, when a sale was concluded, and the pursuer received a cheque for £60. The following morning the defender rode the mare and found she was lame, and he stopped the cheque at the bank.

The negotiations at these meetings are set out fully in the Lord President's opinion.

The Sheriff-substitute (Shirreff) pronounced an interlocutor, in which, inter alia, he "finds in point of fact, 1, that the defender spoke to the pursuer regarding the mare in question, on Monday the 21st or Tuesday the 22d of July 1873, when the pursuer stated that the mare had never been lame while in his possession; 2, that the defender again spoke to the pursuer on Thursday, the 24th July, when the pursuer, in answer to his question, said to the defender that said mare was sound; 3, that in consequence of the pursuer's representation that the said mare was sound the defender sent his servant, Richard Fortune, to ask his friend, Mr Elliot of Lamberton, to purchase said mare on Sunday, the 27th of July last; 4, that failing to find Mr Elliot, Fortune agreed to purchase the said mare on behalf of the defender at the price of £60 sterling; 5, that on the evening of the same day the defender gave the pursuer a cheque for £60 sterling as the price of said mare: . . . . . Finds in point of law, 1, that the statement that the mare was sound, made by the pursuer to the defender, was such a statement as rendered the pursuer liable in warranty; 2, that the defender was entitled to return said mare as disconform to warranty, and is not liable in payment of the price: Therefore assoilzies the defender from the whole conclusions of the action, and decerns."

The Sheriff, on appeal, affirmed this interlocutor.

The pursuer appealed, and argued;—The statements made by the pursuer amounted to no more than that the mare had never been lame with him. It had not been proved that she ever was lame before. There was therefore no case of fraud.[1]

---

[1] Scott v. Steel, Dec. 9, 1857, 20 D. 253, 30 Scot. Jur. 129; Behn v. Burness, Feb. 24, 1863, 32 L. J. (Q. B.) 204.

No. 20.

Oct. 30, 1874.
Robeson v. Waugh.

The defender craved to be allowed to amend the record, and was allowed to add the following statement and plea, on payment of £4, 4s. of expenses:—(Stat. 8) "At the date when the said mare was sold to the defender as aforesaid, and for a long time prior thereto, she was unsound in her legs from contraction and navicular disease. At the time of the sale the pursuer well knew that the mare was unsound, and he not only concealed this fact from the defender, but, on the contrary, represented her to be sound." (Ans. 8) "Denied."

"Additional plea in law.—(4) The pursuer having been aware at the time of the sale that the said mare was unsound, and having represented her to be sound, cannot recover the sum sued for."

The defender argued;—A representation might amount to a warranty. It came to be a question whether the parties intended that the statements should constitute warranty. There was here a case of direct warranty. The pursuer's statement amounted to this, "I will uphold the mare as sound."[1]

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This action is brought to recover payment of the price of a mare said to have been sold by the pursuer to the defender on the 27th day of July 1873. The defence is that the mare was warranted sound, and has turned out to be unsound. Another defence has recently been stated. I will afterwards allude to it; but the original defence was founded on the alleged warrandice.

The first question is whether the mare was unsound, and upon that question I can entertain no doubt that the mare was unsound. The second question is, was she warranted?

The first meeting between the parties is said to have taken place on a Tuesday. There were two witnesses to this meeting, the pursuer and Hogarth, who both distinctly say that the pursuer was asked to warrant the mare, and refused to do so. The defender gives a different account of the meeting. He says,—"When I reached the mare I said, addressing myself to Mr Hogarth, 'Is she sound?' Hogarth said, in the hearing of the pursuer, 'Yes, she is as sound as a bell.' I looked at the mare, and asked the pursuer if she was sound? He said 'Yes, she is sound.' He further said, 'that he had hunted her for two years, and she never had been lame.'" Now, it is clear that some such conversation passed, and the pursuer and Hogarth say, in addition, that there was a demand for a warranty, which was refused. One thing is clear that on the Tuesday no warranty was granted. Even admitting that all that the defender says is true, the words used would not amount to a warranty under the 5th section of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act. The second meeting was on the Thursday, and the pursuer has no recollection of it. This is not surprising, as it was a mere casual meeting, and did not last for more than a minute. The account which the defender gives of the meeting is as follows:—"On the following Thursday I was with Mr Miller of Newhouse, who had asked me to change horses with him for the rest of the week, as his horse had got a kick, and I was drilling on the flank. I said to Miller, 'Here is a mare that I once thought of buying,' and I asked him to come and take a look at the pursuer's mare. That was during the fall-out for refreshment. Miller and I went and looked at the mare. We just looked at her casually. Pursuer was leading her, or at any rate was near her. I nodded to [1] Smith's Mercantile Law (1871), p. 510; Addison on Contracts (1869), p. 216.

No. 20.

Oct. 30, 1874.
Robeson v. Waugh.

the pursuer, and before anything was said by me Miller, looking at the mare, said, in the pursuer's hearing, 'She is a nice looking mare if she is all sound.' I said to the pursuer, 'Mr Robeson, the mare is sound, is she not!' Pursuer answered, 'She is quite sound, and a good mare, and you should buy her.' I said, she is too dear, and I walked away with Miller to the refreshment tent." It would be absurd to attach any importance to such words, which were merely verba volantia. Therefore, in regard to the two first meetings, even if we were to take the account of the defender as correct, the words used would be of no avail.

Another matter occurred before the time when the mare was delivered. It is stated by Waugh that he went to church on the Sunday, and then he says—"Before leaving home I told my groom, Richard Fortune, who drove me to church, to go and see Mr Elliot, and tell him to try and buy 'the grey mare' of the pursuer's, and not to go above £60, but to buy as cheap as he could." Now, looking to the circumstance that Waugh had already asked for a warranty, and been refused, or at least failed to obtain it, it is strange that, in giving instructions to his groom to purchase the mare, he should have said nothing as to warranty. Elliot would have been quite entitled to go and buy the mare for £60 without any question as to soundness. The defender, having failed to get a warranty, had made up his mind to take the mare without warranty. There seems to be some doubt whether Richard Fortune was not entitled to buy the mare himself. I am inclined to think Fortune negotiated but did not enter into any contract. In consequence of this the mare which had been sent away was brought back, and then there is a contract between the pursuer and defender.

With regard to the last meeting there is a discrepancy between the account of the pursuer and defender. The defender thus describes what passed:—"I then said to him, 'If you will warrant the mare to me thoroughly I will give you the £60 sterling.' He said, 'She is perfectly sound;' he had hunted her for two years, and she had never been lame with him. I then agreed to purchase the mare for £60." He afterwards gave a cheque for the sum. "In handing the cheque to the pursuer I said, 'Now, Mr Robeson, if the mare is not what you represent her to be you will hear from me.' He said, 'The mare is all right.'" On the other hand, the pursuer says that "the same Sunday afternoon, between four or five o'clock, the defender came to my lodgings; he grumbled about his servant having given too much for the mare, and wanted me to take less than £60, which I declined to do. Defender accompanied me to the Railway Hotel; he got a blank cheque from Mr Anderson, which he filled up for £60 and handed to me. It is No. 5 of process. This was done in the front room down stairs on the left hand of the front door on entering. There was another gentleman in the room at the time, but I do not know who he was. There was nothing said then about the soundness of the mare, and I did not warrant her sound. My brother William, and Mr Elliot of Lamberton, came into the room before the defender left, and were told of the sale. Defender said if the mare did not turn out well he 'would give us a good swearing next year.'" Now, here there is certainly a discrepancy, but there is more reason for believing the one statement than the other. It would have been very odd if the pursuer, having refused formerly to give a warranty, had at last consented to do so; but I do not think it has been proved that words were used which, under the circumstances, could be construed as giving an express warranty. I have entered thus minutely into the facts of the case, because they bear upon the question of law, and I am clear that what is proved does not amount to an express warranty. If an express warranty is not reduced to writing, there must at least be satisfactory evidence of the words spoken—the very words spoken—which are alleged to constitute such express warranty.

No. 20.
Oct. 30, 1874.
Robeson v. Waugh.

The defender has thought fit to place on record an amendment in the following terms:—

"Stat. 8. At the date when the said mare was sold to the defender as aforesaid, and for a long time prior thereto, she was unsound in her legs from contraction and navicular disease. At the time of the sale the pursuer well knew that the mare was unsound, and he not only concealed this fact from the defender, but, on the contrary, represented her to be sound."

"Ans. 8. Denied."

"Additional plea in law.—(4) The pursuer having been aware at the time of the sale that the said mare was unsound, and having represented her to be sound, cannot recover the sum sued for."

Now, this is a very serious charge, and amounts to nothing less than an allegation of fraud. No one, however, can doubt that the mare was unsound; and if we are to believe the evidence of the veterinary surgeons who have been examined, it would be difficult to say that the pursuer did not know of the unsoundness; but we all know that in such evidence there is usually great exaggeration, and it is impossible to believe that the mare was so apparently unsound. She was seen by the defender and other farmers, who are accustomed to examine horses, and they do not seem to have thought her lame. The pursuer, we know, had been hunting her all the season, and rode her not only on the Sands of Dunbar, where her lameness might not be observed, but also to and from his place of residence. He was accompanied by his brother and by neighbours, who do not seem to have observed any unsoundness. I, therefore, come to the conclusion that the unsoundness was not of an obvious kind. It is only from the nature of the unsoundness that we can say that the pursuer knew of it, as there is no direct evidence of his knowledge. To hold the charge of fraud proved would be a very strong thing, and, in my opinion, the defender has failed to make out his charge. I am therefore for altering the judgment of the Sheriff, and giving decree for the amount concluded for.

LORD DEAS, LORD ARDMILLAN, and LORD MURE concurred.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutors of the Sheriff-substitute and the Sheriff complained of: Find that on the 27th of July 1873 the pursuer sold to the defender a grey mare at the price of £60, and delivered the same to the defender, receiving in return a cheque on the defender's bankers for the price of £60: Find that on the following day the defender returned the mare to the pursuer on the ground that she was unsound, and that the pursuer had warranted her sound, and at the same time the defender stopped payment of the said cheque: Find that the mare at the date of the sale was unsound; but find that the pursuer did not warrant the said mare to be sound: Find that the pursuer at the time of the sale represented to the defender that the mare had never been lame while in his possession; but find that the defender has failed to prove that at the date of the sale the pursuer was in the knowledge of the unsoundness of the said mare: Find that the said mare was sold under a warrant of the Sheriff . . . . . Find the pursuer entitled to expenses both in this Court and the inferior Court," &c.

WM. B. HAY, S.S.C.—WM. SCOTT STUART, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 21.
Oct. 30, 1874.
Austin v. Shennan.

JAMES AUSTIN, Inspector of Poor of Closeburn, Pursuer and Respondent.—Macdonald.
ROBERT SHENNAN, Inspector of Poor of Kirkgunzeon, Defender and Appellant.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Guthrie Smith.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Wigtown. M.

Poor—Poor-Law Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1845, 8 and 9 Vict. c. 83, sec. 71—Inspector's Disbursements.—In an action by the inspector of poor of the parish of Closeburn against the inspector of poor of the parish of Kirkgunzeon (1) for relief of a pauper's aliment, (2) for repayment of the travelling expenses incurred by the pursuer in obtaining information as to the settlement of the pauper, and (3) for the expense incurred in prosecuting the husband of the pauper for desertion, held that the second and third items could not be recovered under the 71st section of the Poor-Law Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1845.

JAMES SOMERVILLE, S.S.C.—W. S. STUART, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 22.
Oct. 30, 1874.
Hill's Trustees v. Thomson.

JOHN HILL AND ANOTHER (Mrs Hill's Trustees), First Parties.—Marshall.
ALEXANDER THOMAS NIVEN (Mrs Finnie's Curator Bonis), Second Party.—Marshall.
WILLIAM HILL THOMSON AND OTHERS, Third Parties.—M'Kie.

Succession—Trust—Apportionment—Insanity of Trustee—Exercise of Power.—The sole trustee under a settlement was directed to hold a sum for behoof of a family of children, and was invested with the amplest discretionary powers as to the proportions in which the sum should be paid, and the times and manner of payment. The trustee, after making unequal payments to the beneficiaries to account of their shares, became hopelessly insane. She had previously assumed a co-trustee, who after her insanity assumed another trustee under the Trusts Act, 1867. Held that a valid bequest had been made to the children as a class, and that the powers conferred upon the trustee were a burden on that bequest; that since these powers could not be exercised by the trustee named in the settlement, the effect was not that the powers were transferred to the assumed trustees, but that the burden flew off, and the bequest to the children as a class became unqualified, and accordingly that the fund fell to be divided in such proportions as, when added to the payments to account previously made, would produce equality among the beneficiaries.

2D DIVISION. I.

BY her trust-disposition and settlement, Mrs Hill, who died in 1868, conveyed her estate to her daughter Mrs Finnie as sole trustee.

By the last purpose of the trust Mrs Finnie was directed to "retain in her own hands" one third of the free residue of the estate, "and apply the same for the use and behoof of the surviving children of the marriage between the Rev. William Thomson, my son-in-law, and Catherine Hill or Thomson, my daughter, now deceased, and that at such time or times, and in such way and manner as my said trustee, in whose judgment and discretion I have perfect confidence, may think most conducive to the welfare of the said children, with full power to her to divide and apportion the said provision among the said children, or to apply the same for their behoof, in such shares and proportions as she may think proper, without the interference or control of any one or more of the said children, who shall have no vested interest therein."

The deed contained no power of assumption of new trustees.

At the death of Mrs Hill there were two sons and three daughters of Mr and Mrs Thomson in life.

On 13th February 1873 Mrs Finnie assumed Mr John Hill as a co-trustee under her mother's settlement.

No. 22.

Oct. 30, 1874.
Hill's Trustees v. Thomson.

On 19th May 1873 Mrs Finnie, who had fallen into a state of mental incapacity, was removed to a lunatic asylum.

Mrs Finnie had before her insanity paid to Mrs Thomson's two sons one-fifth each of the sum available for distribution among the Thomson family, and a smaller sum to each of the three daughters, all to account of their respective shares of the residue of Mrs Hill's estate. A sum had since that time become free by the death of an annuitant under Mrs Hill's settlement, and another sum would become available for distribution on the death of another annuitant.

Mrs Thomson's children having called upon Mr Hill and another trustee, whom he had assumed in 1874, with the consent of the Court, in terms of the Trusts Act, 1867, to pay them the sums available for division, the trustees expressed their willingness to do so if they had the power, but they were advised that it was not in their power, at all events without judicial authority, to exercise the discretion which had been reposed in Mrs Finnie alone.

A special case was presented to the Court by (1) John Hill and another, the acting trustees under Mrs Hill's settlement, (2) A. T. Niven, C.A., who had been appointed curator bonis to Mrs Finnie, and (3) Mr and Mrs Thomson's children. It was stated in the special case that there was no prospect of Mrs Finnie's recovery.

Mr Niven as curator bonis stated that he was prepared to acquiesce on the part of Mrs Finnie in any division of the funds which the Court should hold to be within the powers of the trustees.

The questions submitted to the Court were;—"1. Whether the parties of the first part, as the acting trustees and executors under the trust-disposition and settlement of Mrs Hill, are, during the incapacity of Mrs Finnie, entitled to distribute among the parties hereto of the third part the whole or any part of the one-third share of the residue which the truster directed Mrs Finnie to retain and apply for behoof of the children of Mr and Mrs Thomson? 2. Whether the sums presently available for division are to be distributed equally among the parties hereto of the third part, or in such proportions as, when added to the payments to account previously made, will make the payments to all the five children of equal amount?"

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—We have had an able argument from the bar upon the question, to what extent the Court could assume the right or power of directing parties, not named by the testator, to exercise a discretionary power.

This is not an application to us for special powers, and if special powers were to be conferred on these trustees it would need to be under a more formal application.

In regard to the powers of the Court in such a case very delicate questions might arise. On the one hand, where there is a manifest delectus personæ and intention to entrust such a power as here to a particular person, the Court might hesitate to transfer the power to another. On the other hand it is quite clear that where a discretionary power is conferred upon ordinary trustees, not implying delectus personæ, the Court might more readily confer these powers on new trustees. I am, however, very clearly of opinion that these questions do not arise in this case.

The view I take is derived from the words of the settlement, and by these words I am of opinion that a valid bequest is made to the children of Mrs Thomson as a class, and the power conferred on Mrs Finnie is merely a burden on that bequest. The provision that they are to have no vested interest is merely to prevent the beneficiaries from interfering with the exercise of this power. Nothing vests in them individually to that effect. What has happened here is that the discretionary power cannot now be exercised and never can be, but the effect of that is not that the power is to be transferred to the other assumed trustees, but that the burden flies off and the bequest to the children as a class becomes unqualified.

No. 22.
Oct. 30, 1874.
Hill's Trustees v. Thomson.

I am of opinion that the trustees are entitled to divide the whole free fund at present available, and the remaining sum as soon as it is set free, and that, as the discretionary power is at an end, the division should be in such proportions as to produce ultimate equality.

We have not been told the ages or condition of these beneficiaries—whether they are married or unmarried—and some information will be necessary before we pronounce judgment.

LORD NEAVES.—I am of the same opinion with your Lordship.

It is material to notice that this is not an application to us to exercise our discretionary powers.

We are only asked to decide on the law of the case, and on the terms of the bequest. Our nobile officium is not invoked, and we have merely to give a legal decision as to the import of the documents before us.

If we had to decide on the question of our discretion, it would be a matter of great delicacy, and it would depend on the nature of each case, whether the Court should interfere. In a case where an advance was necessary for the support of a person remotely interested I can understand that we might interfere. But I think that we should not make an inquisitorial investigation into the behaviour and moral character of such a person—or be moved by anything but considerations of strong necessity. The original trustee might do so, but I think the Court would not. No such question, however, arises here.

LORD ORMIDALE.—I entirely concur in your Lordship's view of this case, and in the explanations you have given of the principles upon which the proposed judgment is to proceed.

It is satisfactory to me to think that it is not necessary to consider how far the Court could itself exercise the discretion conferred on a testamentary trustee who has become incapacitated as in the present case. Before the Court could do so it would at least be necessary that the age and circumstances of the beneficiaries were ascertained and stated. But even were all that distinctly before the Court, it would be an extremely delicate question whether the discretion committed by the testator to the trustee nominated by her, and to that trustee alone, could be competently exercised by any one else or by the Court; and in regard to that, or any such question, it is to be understood that my opinion is reserved.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"The Lords . . . are of opinion and find (1st) that the parties of the first part, as the acting trustees and executors under the trust-disposition and settlement of Mrs Hill, during the incapacity of Mrs Finnie, are entitled to distribute among the parties of the third part the whole of the one-third share of the residue which the truster directed Mrs Finnie to retain and apply for behoof of the children of Mr and Mrs Thomson, as the same may arise for division, and (2d) that the sums presently available for division are to be distributed among the third parties in such proportions as to produce ultimate equality, and decern."

No. 22.
Oct. 30, 1874.
Hill's Trustees v. Thomson.

WILLIAM KENNEDY, W.S.—JOHN N. FORMAN, W.S.—Agents.

JAMES FLETCHER, Pursuer and Respondent.—Asher—Pearson.
JOHN DAVIDSON, Defender and Appellant.—M'Kechnie.

No. 23.
Nov. 3, 1874.
Fletcher v. Davidson.
1st DIVISION.
Sheriff of Ross, Cromarty, and Sutherland.
M.

Process—Appeal—Removing—6 Geo. IV. c. 120, sec. 44.—In an action by James Fletcher of Rosehaugh against James Davidson, tenant of one of his farms, laid on A. S. 14th December 1756, anent removings, the conclusions were that the tenant should find caution for arrears, and for the rent of the remaining years of the lease, failing which, to remove from his farm.

The Sheriff ordained the defender to find caution, and subsequently, in respect that he had failed to find caution, decerned against him "in terms of the summons." An appeal to the Court of Session was refused as incompetent under the 44th section of the Judicature Act, 1825.*

GIBSON-CRAIG, DALZIEL, & BRODIES, W.S.—W. K. THWAITES, S.S.C.—Agents.

EDWARD JAMES STOPFORD BLAIR AND OTHERS (Maxwell's Trustees), Petitioners.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Mackintosh.
EDWARD HERON MAXWELL AND OTHERS, Respondents.—D.-F. Clark—Duncan.

No. 24.
Nov. 4, 1874.
Maxwell's Trustees v. Maxwell.

Trust—Trustee—Power to resign—24 and 25 Vict. c. 84; 30 and 31 Vict. c. 97 (Trusts Acts, 1861 and 1867).—A marriage-contract executed prior to the Trusts Act of 1861 provided that if any trustee desired to resign it should be in the power of the other trustees to discharge him. The whole trustees being desirous to resign, presented a petition, founding on the Trusts Act 1867, for the appointment of a judicial factor and for authority to resign. It was opposed by the beneficiaries. Held that the trustees had power to resign under the Trusts Acts 1861 and 1867, and that the power was not excluded by the terms of the marriage-contract, and a judicial factor appointed.

MR E. J. STOPFORD BLAIR AND OTHERS were the trustees under the marriage-contract of Mr and Mrs Edward Heron Maxwell, dated 14th October 1847, and held a considerable amount of property for behoof of the spouses and their children, some of whom were in minority and pupillarity. The contract contained this clause:—"In case any trustee should become incapable of acting as such, or should desire to be relieved of the said trust, it should be in the power of the other accepting and surviving trustees therein named, or to be assumed, if they should deem it expe-

1st DIVISION.
Lord Gifford.
M.

* . . . "When any judgment shall be pronounced by an inferior Court, ordaining a tenant to remove from the possession of lands or houses, the tenant shall not be entitled to apply as above by bill of advocation to be passed at once, but only by means of suspension, as hereinafter regulated."

The process of advocation was abolished, and appeal substituted by the Court of Session Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 100), secs. 64 and 65.

No. 24.

Nov. 4, 1874.
Maxwell's Trustees v. Maxwell.

dient, to discharge and exoner him of the said trust upon his denuding thereof in favour of the others."

In consequence of disagreement with Mr and Mrs Maxwell all the trustees resolved to resign, and presented this petition to the Court, founded on the Trusts Act, 1867,[1] secs. 9, 10,[2] 12, 16. They prayed the Court (1) to appoint a judicial factor; (2) to authorise the petitioners to resign; (3) to grant them a discharge.

The petition was opposed by Mr and Mrs Maxwell and their two eldest children, who had attained majority, who maintained that the trustees were not entitled to resign without accounting for their management and intromissions. The trustees declined to enter into an accounting because there was no person who could give them an effectual discharge until a judicial factor was appointed.

After some ineffectual negotiations, while the case was in the Outer-House, for the appointment of new trustees, the Lord Ordinary, on 21st July 1874, pronounced this interlocutor:—"In respect that the whole persons nominated and appointed as trustees by the interlocutor of 7th current have failed or declined to accept the office, and in respect that the respondents decline to name or suggest any other persons as trustees, nominates and appoints Mr Thomas Martin, chartered accountant in Edinburgh, to be judicial factor upon the trust-estate created by the antenuptial contract of marriage between the respondents Edward Heron Maxwell and Helen Stopford Blair or Heron Maxwell, his spouse, dated 14th October 1847, with all the usual powers, he always finding caution before extract: Quoad ultra continues the cause for such further proceedings as may be competent: Finds the petitioners entitled to payment of the expenses hitherto incurred by them in the present petition and proceedings, and that out of the trust-estate," &c.

The respondents reclaimed, and argued;—The application of the trustees for the appointment of a judicial factor preliminary to resignation was competent only under the 10th section of the Trusts Act, 1867,[3] and that section provided only for the case of a sole trustee. Besides, the marriage-contract contained a limited power of resignation, and the 19th section[4] of the Act of 1867 declared that the statutory powers were only to have effect subject to the limitations of the deed.

The petitioners argued;—The power of resignation was conferred on trustees in unqualified terms by the statute of 1861.[5] That power was

---

[1] 30 and 31 Vict. c. 97.

[2] Sec. 10,—"If any trustee entitled to resign his office is at the time sole trustee, he shall not be entitled to resign until, with the consent of the beneficiaries under the trust of full age and capable of acting at the time, he shall have assumed new trustees, who shall have declared their acceptance of office, or he may apply to the Court stating his wish to resign and praying for the appointment of new trustees or of a judicial factor to administer the trust, and the Court, after intimation to the beneficiaries under the trust, or such of them as the Court may direct, shall thereafter either appoint a judicial factor, or on the application of the beneficiaries or any of them may appoint trustees, in the same manner as is provided under the 12th section of this Act; and after such appointment, either of judicial factor or of trustees, the petitioning trustee will be entitled to resign; and any retiring trustee or trustees who may have already retired shall be bound when required, and at the expense of the trust, to execute all deeds necessary for divesting them of trust property, conveying the same to the trustees or trustee or judicial factor acting in the execution of the trust."

[3] Quoted supra, note 2.

[4] Quoted in the Lord President's opinion.

[5] 24 and 25 Vict. c. 84, sec. 1,—"All trusts constituted by virtue of any

No. 24.

Nov. 4, 1874.

Maxwell's Trustees v. Maxwell.

not taken away by the statute of 1867, and the trustees now sought to exercise it in the manner most convenient for the administration of the trust.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This petition is presented by the whole accepting and acting trustees under the marriage-contract of the reclaimers. The object is to enable them all to resign their office; and the mode in which this is proposed to be done seems very reasonable in itself, if it is consistent with the statutes. Being all desirous to resign they are anxious that no embarrassment should be thereby caused in the administration of the trust. They therefore propose the appointment of a judicial factor as a preliminary step, and they have been willing to give every facility for the appointment of new trustees.

The question is, whether the proceeding is justified by the statutes of 1861 and 1867.

Two objections have been taken. First, it is said that the trust-deed contains a clause which prevents the application of the clauses in the statutes. Secondly, it is maintained that there is no authority for a plurality of trustees taking the steps which the petitioners have done for the appointment of a judicial factor, but that only a single remaining trustee can competently avail himself of this form of procedure.

1. The clause in the marriage-contract was framed long before the passing of the first statute, and of course with reference to the existing law, under which no trustee had power to resign. The clause enabled any trustee to resign, subject to the condition that the other trustees agreed to his resignation. But the Act of 1861 afterwards in unqualified terms gave to any gratuitous trustee the power to resign his office unless the contrary be expressed in the deed. If the matter stood there the case would seem to be very plain. But it is said that by the 19th section of the Act of 1867 a limitation is added to the words "unless the contrary be expressed" in the previous statute. The section is in these terms:—"Nothing in this Act contained shall be construed as innovating, revoking, or restricting any express powers or directions given to trustees acting under any trust-deed, or shall affect the decisions of any question which may at the passing of this Act be the subject of a depending action, and none of the powers and incidents by this Act conferred or annexed to the office of trustee shall take effect or be exercised if it is declared in the trust-deeds that they shall not take effect; and when there is no such declaration, then if any variations or limitations of any of the powers or incidents by the Act conferred or annexed are contained in such trust-deed, such powers or incidents shall take effect or be exercised only subject to such variations or limitations."

Now, I observe, first, that this enactment refers entirely to the powers conferred by the Act of 1867 itself; therefore it does not, directly at least, repeal or alter the powers given by the Act of 1861, but, even supposing it were intended to modify the provisions of that statute, I should still hold without any doubt that there is nothing in the clause applicable to the present case which can restrict the right of the trustees to resign. The only part of the section which could possibly be thought to have that effect are the last words. But deed or local Act of Parliament, under which gratuitous trustees are nominated, shall be held to include the following provisions unless the contrary is expressed; that is to say, power to any trustee so nominated to resign the office of trustee; . . ."

---

No. 24.
Nov. 4, 1874.
Maxwell's Trustees v. Maxwell.

the clause in the contract contains no variations or limitations of powers conferred either by the Act of 1867 or the Act of 1861. There is a limited power of resignation given. There is no prohibition against resigning or against resigning in any particular way. There is no prohibition at all, nothing but power or allowance. The truster left it to the common law to prevent resigning in any other way, except in the circumstances in which it was expressly permitted. But the common law being altered no longer prevents the resignation of the trustees under all circumstances. Any hypothetical inference as to the intentions of the truster can never prevent the application of the statute. It is clearly a case in which the statute was intended to apply.

2. It is said that the only authority which the trustees can have for presenting this petition is the 10th section of the Act of 1867. That appears to me to be a mistake. The petition is perfectly competent under the Act of 1861. That statute prescribes no particular form, but gives the right to resign in very general terms. Power to any trustee means power to every trustee, and, consequently, to the whole. If that be so, in what form ought a body of trustees, who all want to resign, to proceed? It would be extremely improper and inconsistent with their duty if they were de plano to execute a deed of resignation and hand it to the beneficiaries, leaving the trust without administration. If the beneficiaries are able to act, and are reasonable, there can be no difficulty in nominating new trustees. But supposing they are not, there must be some mode of proceeding, and one consistent with leaving some person to administer the trust. What better course could be followed than to present a petition for the appointment of a judicial factor or of new trustees as a preliminary step?

In my opinion the petitioners require no aid from the 10th section, and, indeed, it was not intended to apply to a case of this kind. It is a prohibitory provision, not an empowering one. The powers are given in the preceding clauses. But a sole acting trustee may not so resign. That section is not applicable, and is not required.

It must be kept in view that the statutory right of resigning was created by the Act of 1861, not by that of 1867. The latter only introduces alterations or conditions, which are imposed on parties situated in a particular way, and it is not to be read as applicable to others.

I think this petition is a proper and competent step, and the best mode of proceeding which could have been adopted consistently with keeping up a trust administration.

LORD DEAS.—I am very clear that there is nothing in the first objection. The fact that a limited power of resignation was conferred by the trust-deed could not possibly prevent the application of the subsequent enactment which conferred an unlimited power of resignation.

As to the second objection, if the matter had stood on the Act of 1861 I confess I should have thought it very doubtful. But whatever difficulty might have arisen under the Act of 1861, I think that difficulty is removed by the subsequent statute. And taking the one as supplementary to the other, I have no hesitation in concurring with the Lord Ordinary.

LORD ARDMILLAN and LORD MURE concurred with the Lord President.

THE COURT altered the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor by inserting the words "and decern" after the words before extract, and quoad ultra adhered, and allowed additional expenses to the petitioners out of the trust-estate. No. 24.

Nov. 4, 1874. Maxwell's Trustees v. Maxwell.

MACKENZIE & BLACK, W.S.—J. C. & A. STEUART, W.S.—Agents.

GEORGE SIMPSON AND OTHERS, Complainers.—M'Kechnie. No. 25.
GEORGE TAYLOR, Respondent.—Asher.

Nov. 4, 1874. Simpson v. Taylor.

Bill—Suspension.—In a note of suspension of a charge on a bill for £100 it was averred that when the bill became due the debtor had paid £30, and granted a bill for £70; that the second bill had been fraudulently altered to £75 by the respondent in order to conceal that it was a partial renewal of the first; that the complainer had paid the £75 to avoid litigation; and that the charger was now fraudulently seeking to enforce payment of the first bill. The £75 bill was produced, and was ex facie altered. Held (rev. judgment of Lord Ormidale) that the complainer was entitled to have the note passed on caution.

Bill-Chamber. 1ST DIVISION. Ld. Ormidale. M.

THIS was a suspension brought by George Simpson, George Simpson junior, and George Wood, of a charge on a bill for £100 drawn by one M'William upon and accepted by the complainers. The bill was given to M'William as the price of cattle sold by him to the complainer, George Simpson senior, and was endorsed by him to the charger and respondent, George Taylor.

The substance of the complainers' averments was as follows:—When the bill was about to fall due they arranged with M'William that they should give him a new bill for £70, and pay him £30 in cash, with £2 of discount. This was done, but the £100 bill was not delivered up to them. The respondent and M'William acting in concert altered the £70 bill to £75, and also altered its date, for the purpose of making it appear that it was not a partial renewal of the bill for £100 but for a different debt. The complainers paid the £75 bill to avoid litigation. M'William had left the country.

The respondent, on the other hand, denied the alleged transaction for renewing the £100 bill, and stated that the £75 bill was quite a separate transaction.

The £75 bill was ex facie vitiated both in the date and the sum.

The Lord Ordinary (Ormidale) refused the note.

The complainers reclaimed.

The Lord Probationer (Curriehill) gave his opinion that the note should be passed on caution.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—We have had the benefit of the opinion of the Lord Probationer in this case, and I concur with his Lordship in thinking that the note should be passed on caution.

It is not disputed that the bill was granted for value as the price of cattle purchased in January 1874, and it was endorsed by the seller of the cattle to the respondent. It is admitted by the respondent that he wrote the body of the bill, and therefore he had probably some acquaintance with the transaction. That would not be of importance in the ordinary case of a bill granted for value. But the allegation of the complainer is that, when the bill was about to fall due a payment of £30 in cash was made, and a bill for £70 substituted for the £100 bill; but that, notwithstanding this arrangement, the £100 bill was not delivered up, and, moreover, that the £70 bill was fraudulently vitiated, both in the date and the sum. If that stood on bare averment I do not know that much could have been made of it. But it is of considerable importance that on the face of the second bill it is obviously vitiated, both in the date and the sum. This bill was originally nothing but the date and the sum. The body was afterwards filled in. But these are the very things that are vitiated. The respondent does not admit the vitiation. He maintains on record that the bill was originally for £75, and bore the date which it now bears. It is difficult to believe that, and it is a circumstance of the greatest suspicion that the vitiation was made and is now denied. It is an awkward circumstance, as regards the complainer, that when the £75 bill became due he paid it. If he had brought a suspension of that bill the case would have been much easier than it is. Still I think we are justified in passing this note for the purpose of investigating the facts.

No. 25.
Nov. 4, 1874.
Simpson v. Taylor.

LORDS DEAS, ARDMILLAN, and MURE concurred.

THE note was passed on caution.

THOMAS CARMICHAEL, S.S.C.—ALEXANDER MORISON, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 26.
Nov. 9, 1874.
Frood v. Earl of Stair, &c.

REV. BRUCE FROOD, Minister of Glenluce, Pursuer.—Brown.
EARL OF STAIR AND OTHERS, Defenders.—D.-F. Clark—Blair.

Teinds—Augmentation—Decimæ inclusæ.—In a process of augmentation wherein the heritors opposed the augmentation, on the ground that the teinds were exhausted, process sisted to enable the minister to bring a declarator to try the validity of a decimæ inclusæ right founded on by the heritors, it not being clear upon the face of the documents produced whether the right was well founded or not.

Observed that the Court will adopt the same procedure, as a general rule, in cases where the existence of teind, available for augmentation, is denied by the heritors upon grounds which require investigation.

TEIND COURT.
Teind Clerk.

THIS was a summons of augmentation, modification, and locality, at the instance of the minister of Glenluce against the heritors.

The Earl of Stair and other heritors opposed any augmentation being granted, on the ground that the teinds were exhausted.

The teinds had in fact been dealt with as exhausted, and in 1812 the stipend was augmented to £150 under the Small Stipends Acts.

The Court, on 23d February 1874, appointed the pursuer to condescend upon the free teind which he alleged to exist in the parish.

The minister lodged a condescendence, in which he averred that the teinds of certain lands belonging to the Earl of Stair, Sir John C. D. Hay, and Mr Young, fell to be localled upon for stipend.

The proprietors of these lands lodged answers, in which they averred that they held the lands cum decimis inclusis et nunquam antea separatis, and produced a charter, dated 17th April 1572, bearing to be granted by the commendator of Glenluce in favour of Gilbert, Earl of Cassillis, of certain lands, including those condescended on by the minister, cum decimis garbalibus earundem inclusis antea nunquam separatis, and a crown-charter of confirmation with a similar clause, dated 12th March 1573. They also averred that the decimæ inclusæ right had been given effect to in the last process of locality in 1811.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—When the case of the minister for an augmentation was stated to us in February last we appointed him to condescend on the free

No. 26.

Nov. 9, 1874. Frood v. Earl of Stair, &c.

teind which he alleged to exist in the parish. We have now before us the condescendence for the minister and answers for the heritors. The heritors, Lord Stair and Sir John Hay, state that they hold their lands cum decimis inclusis et nunquam antea separatis, and therefore are not liable in stipend. No titles have been lodged earlier than a charter dated 1572, which bears to have been granted by the commendator of Glenluce. We could not affirm the validity of this decimæ inclusæ right without some farther historical information on the subject. But this charter undoubtedly bears prima facie that the lands and teinds are held together, and had never been separated.

In these circumstances the question occurs, what is the proper procedure to adopt? I think all your Lordships upon the last teind day were of opinion that it was desirable that we should consider this matter, with a view, if possible, to laying down some general rule for our future guidance in such cases. In the case of Banchory Devenick[1] the Court adopted a course, which none of us would now, I think, be inclined to repeat. An augmentation was granted, and a remit made to the Lord Ordinary to prepare a locality, but under the reservation that the modification should depend on its being shewn to the Lord Ordinary that there existed a fund for the purpose. The subsequent stages of the Banchory Devenick case shew that a good deal of difficulty was introduced into the case in consequence of the terms of the interlocutor granting augmentation.

Probably the best guide is to be found in two cases reported in the 5th volume of Macpherson. The first is the case of Orr v. Earl of Glasgow,[2] in which an augmentation was opposed by the heritors on the ground that the teinds were valued and exhausted. The process was sisted to enable the minister to bring an action to try the validity of the decree of valuation founded on by the heritors. Lord President Colonsay stated very distinctly the grounds of expediency for adopting this course. Although I observe that my concurrence was given with some reluctance, I nevertheless did concur; and I have since seen reason to think that the concurrence was right, and the reluctance less well founded. The same course was repeated, as a note to the report bears[3] on 16th January 1867 in an application for augmentation by the minister of Stracathro and Dunlappie.

I should be disposed to say that this was the proper general rule, especially when the state of possession is in favour of the heritors. I think there have been other cases in which we have indicated the same opinion, but which are not reported, in consequence, I suppose, of the reporters considering that the rule was settled by the case of Orr v. Earl of Glasgow.

It must not, however, be supposed that in every case in which heritors state objections to an augmentation founded on valuations or decimæ inclusæ rights, the process must be stopped, and the minister compelled to raise the question by a declarator. A decree of valuation or a charter cum decimis inclusis may be open to such obvious objections on the face of it that it would not be right to stop the augmentation. A good example is to be found in the case of the Minister of Yester v. Marquis of Tweeddale.[4] The Marquis lodged a charter, bearing to be cum decimis inclusis, but the Court disregarded the objection, for [1] July 1, 1863, 1 Macph. 1014, 35 Scot. Jur. 586.

[2] Dec. 19, 1866, 5 Macph. 195, 39 Scot. Jur. 95.
[3] 5 Macph. 197, 39 Scot. Jur. 96.
[4] March 13, 1867, 5 Macph. 592, 39 Scot. Jur. 298.

No. 26.
Nov. 9, 1874.
Frood v. Earl of Stair, &c.

this good reason, that the charter, though it contained the words cum decimis inclusis, wanted the equally essential words et nunquam antea separatis. In a similar case we should follow the same course. But it is a different thing to disregard an objection, and to proceed to adjudicate upon it in this Court. There may be some doubt whether we have jurisdiction to try such questions, and at all events our judgment would be very unsatisfactory, for it would not be binding on the titular or the other heritors. The plain rule is that when there is a case to try of this description the process of augmentation should be sisted to give the minister an opportunity of trying the question in the ordinary way by declarator in the Court of Session.

In this case, as I said before, the right of the heritors is by no means clear on the face of the charter which they have lodged. It is neither clear that they have a good right, nor clear that they have not. It is probable that very considerable historical investigation may be required before the question is determined.

LORDS DEAS, ARDMILLAN, MURE, and CRAIGHILL concurred.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced :—"Having considered the record, condescendence, and answers for the parties, sist procedure to give the minister an opportunity to bring a process of declarator to try the question between him and the respondents."

JAMES GOW, S.S.C.—HUNTER, BLAIR, & COWAN, W.S.—Agents.

No. 27.
Nov. 10, 1874.
Buchanan v. Stewart.

JAMES BUCHANAN AND OTHERS (Trustees of the Fourth Provident Property Investment Company), Pursuers.—D.-F. Clark—Balfour.
WILLIAM STEWART (Wilkie's Trustee), Defender.—Scott.

Recompense—Meliorations—Bona Fides—Bankrupt—Trustee—Heritable Creditor.—Held that a trustee on a sequestrated estate, who had, at his own hand, completed certain unfinished buildings belonging to the bankrupt, and retained possession of the same for two years, was not entitled to recompense from a creditor holding a heritable security over the buildings, in respect that it could not be shewn in the circumstances that the creditor had been lucratus, or that the trustee had not made the expenditure with a view to increase the reversion.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Gifford.
I.

JAMES WILKIE, late builder in Leith, obtained advances from a building society named the "Fourth Provident Property Investment Company," in order to complete certain houses which he was erecting in Leith. In July 1868 he granted to the company a disposition of the subjects ex facie absolute, but really in security of the advances made to him. In December 1868 Wilkie's estates were sequestrated, and Mr William Stewart elected trustee thereon. At the date of the sequestration Wilkie had erected the buildings, but not completed them. The trustee entered into possession of the subjects, finished the houses, and drew the rents.

The present action was raised on 7th July 1870 by the trustees of the Fourth Provident Property Investment Company against Wilkie and Stewart. The conclusions of the summons were for declarator, "that the Fourth Provident Property Investment Company, and the pursuers as trustees foresaid, were creditors of the said James Wilkie at the date of his sequestration on 18th December 1868, and still are such creditors, in respect of advances in loan made by the said company to the said James Wilkie, as a member or shareholder of the said company, and lat-

No. 27.
Nov. 10, 1874.
Buchanan v. Stewart.

terly in respect of interest and penalties, and that the said company and the pursuers, as creditors of the said James Wilkie, and feudally vested in All and Whole" the subjects mentioned above, "were and are entitled to sell the said subjects, and out of the price which may be realised by such sale to repay the amount of the said advances, amounting to the sum of £685, 11s. 9d. as at 18th December 1868," with interest and penalties, for decree of removal from the said subjects against Stewart, and for count and reckoning against Stewart as trustee, and individually, in respect of his intromissions with the rents and profits.

Stewart defended the action, and stated a variety of defences.

He claimed, in settling with the pursuers, to be credited with a sum of about £300 expended by himself on the completion of the buildings, and also with a sum of £55 incurred by him in unsuccessful attempts to sell the property; and pleaded that the pursuers were not entitled to remove him without payment of these sums.

Mr Stewart's averments in regard to the completion of the buildings were as follows:—(Stat. 8.) "At the second statutory meeting of the creditors under the sequestration, held on 1st February 1869, the trustee was authorised by the meeting to get the pursuers to advance the funds still necessary for the completion of the three blocks on the security of the property itself, so as to render the property tenantable and saleable for the benefit of all concerned, and specially of the pursuers, who were the holders of the security over it." (Stat. 9.) "The trustee accordingly, in or about the beginning of February 1869, applied to Mr John Robertson, S.S.C., law-agent, and to Mr Cuthbert, manager of the Fourth Provident Investment Company, for said advance. These parties, with whom the trustee had all along dealt, as acting for and representing the pursuers, and who did act for and represent the pursuers in regard to said subjects, represented to the trustee that there would be no difficulty in obtaining an advance from the pursuers to the extent of £200, and promised, and gave the trustee distinctly to understand, that on his proceeding to complete the said blocks of buildings the said sum would be paid and advanced by the company; and further, that any additional sum required for completing the pavement would be paid out of the rents of the subjects. These representations and promises and arrangement were made in or about the beginning of February 1869." (Stat. 10.) "The trustee accordingly, on the faith of this promise and arrangement being carried out by the pursuers, at once proceeded with the completion of the subjects, and incurred accounts to the various tradesmen employed by him, amounting, exclusive of interest, to £301, 8s. 7d., by which additional saleable value was given to said subjects to a much larger extent. The pursuers, and their agent and manager foresaid, were aware of, and acquiesced in, these proceedings of the trustee, and also of the footing on which they were carried on, and it was only after the work was nearly completed, and the said accounts had been incurred, that the said manager wrote the trustee, on 24th April 1869, that the company declined to make the advance. This defender has in consequence been under the necessity of paying the said accounts himself, and he has required the pursuers to repay to him said accounts in terms of the arrangement, and also in respect of the additional value put upon the property, before he gives up possession of the subjects; but the pursuers insist on entering into possession of the property and drawing the rents, and selling, without recognising said claim on the part of the trustee, or paying him any portion of the sums so advanced by him."

Some correspondence was produced between Mr Stewart and those

No. 27.
Nov. 10, 1874.
Buchanan v. Stewart.

acting for the Fourth Provident Investment Company, which, Mr Stewart averred, was supplemented by personal interviews. The correspondence was not very distinct, and did not shew any authority from the company to complete the buildings.

After lengthened procedure, in the course of which the Court repelled the defences, in so far as directed against the validity of the pursuers' title or their right to sell, and remitted to Mr F. H. Carter, C.A., to inquire and report as to the amount of rents uplifted by the trustee, and the amount expended by him in completing the buildings, and in endeavouring to sell the subjects, the case was put out for debate to dispose of the remaining questions.

Argued for Stewart;—A relevant case of recompense had been stated. The law was thus expressed by Mr Bell, substantially in accordance with Stair and Erskine,[1]—"Where one has gained by the lawful act of another, done without any intention of donation, he is bound to recompense or indemnify that other to the extent of the gain." There was no question that it was a lawful act for the trustee to finish the buildings, and as little question that this was done without any intention of donation, and the defender undertook to prove that the pursuers had gained by his expenditure. He was at least entitled to a proof of his averments.

Argued for the pursuers;—The defender in effect sought to prove a loan against the company by parole evidence. The only cases in which the principle of recompense was recognised were—(1) the case of a negotiorum gestor, and (2) the case of a bona fide builder on another person's ground. Negotiorum gestio was legally impossible where the principal was upon the spot; and clearly this was not a case of a person building on another's ground in the belief that it was his own, for the trustee knew precisely what his rights and powers were under the bankruptcy statute. It was decided in the case of The Heirs of Selby v. Jollie,[2] that a person having a right of retention over a subject in security of debts owing to him by the proprietor was not liable for the claims of tradesmen for meliorations made upon it on the order of the proprietor.[3] The defender's averments, if proved, did not put his case higher than that of the tradesmen in that case, and therefore he should not be allowed a proof.

At advising,—

Lord Justice-Clerk.—We have had a long argument on the question whether Mr Stewart, the trustee on Wilkie's sequestrated estate, is entitled to allowance for sums expended in completing buildings which belonged to the bankrupt. Wilkie had obtained advances from an investment company called the "Fourth Provident Property Investment Company" for constructing these houses, over which the company held a security. He had previously obtained an advance from another company, the "Third Provident Property Investment Company," who held a preferable security. Wilkie had erected the buildings, but not finished them, when he became bankrupt. The debt of the Third Company was sufficiently secured, but the Fourth Company were in the position of postponed creditors. The trustee entered into possession of the subjects; and the question occurred, whether he was to finish the buildings, or sell them as they [1] Stair, i. 8, 6; Erskine, iii. 1, 11; Bell's Pr. sec. 538; Duchess of Lauderdale v. Steill, 1687, 2 Brown's Supp. 105.

[2] June 5, 1795, M. 13,438.

[3] See also More's Notes to Stair, pp. 54, 55, and cases there cited.

No. 27.
Nov. 10, 1874.
Buchanan v. Stewart.

stood. The creditors declined to furnish funds. The trustee then applied to the Fourth Company to advance money to complete the buildings. They did not give any distinct response. The result was that, without authority from the creditors, and certainly without authority from the Fourth Company, the trustee finished the buildings himself, in the expectation, no doubt, that the subsequent sale of the buildings would remove all difficulties by enabling all parties to be paid in full. The market, however, went down, and the present action was brought by the Fourth Company. We thought that by authorising a sale the dispute might be settled by the creation of funds sufficient to pay every one. This hope has been disappointed, and the only result is that the case has been protracted for two years. The only question that remains is whether Mr Stewart in settling with the Fourth Company is entitled to take credit for the sums expended by him in completing the buildings.

The case has been very well argued for him, but I am of opinion that he has failed to make out an essential element in his case. There may be a good deal of equity in his claim. I am far from saying that there are not cases where a party having, on a mistaken view of his title, improved subjects to the advantage of the real owner, the latter is bound to make restitution for the beneficial expenditure. Accordingly, if it were clear that the Fourth Company took benefit by Mr Stewart's expenditure, I should be inclined to consider his claim with more favour. But the foundation is wanting. There is no evidence that the Fourth Company have gained one farthing. There is no evidence that if they had entered into possession, which they were not allowed to do, they would not have paid themselves in full. The trustee chose to remain in possession, and excluded them. It is hopeless now to ascertain what could have been obtained for the buildings had they been sold at once. On that ground I am prepared to negative the claim by Mr Stewart. Payment to him is no condition of the right of the Fourth Company to get the subjects. I would reserve Mr Stewart's claim entire in regard to any balance of price which may arise from the sale of the subjects.

Lord Neaves.—I have arrived at the conclusion indicated by your Lordship. The doctrine of recompense is of great importance, and our authorities in regard to it are not altogether in a satisfactory state. The claim to recompense is an equitable claim, and our law is favourable to equitable claims. But the doctrine is overstated by Stair when he gives the benefit of the law of recompense to one who in mala fide builds on another's ground. This has not been ratified by later decisions. The sound rule is, that where a party, in error but in bona fide, has expended money, and another steps in and takes the benefit, equity requires, not that he shall be reimbursed, but that the other shall pay him in quantum lucratus. The plea of bona fides, it may be remarked, necessarily implies a bad title, for with a good title the question could not arise.

When we apply the law to individual cases great difficulty is often found. In the present case I do not see what the error was on the part of Mr Stewart. He knew what were his powers under the Bankruptcy Act, strong but limited. He knew that as trustee he was entitled to sell the property if he chose, but under this important limitation, that he could not sell it for less than the amount of the heritable creditors' debt. There certainly was a want of peremptoriness on the part of the Fourth Company in negativing Mr Stewart's proposal; but, on the other hand, there was laxity on his part in not getting explicit directions as to what he was to do.

No. 27.
Nov. 10, 1874.
Buchanan v. Stewart.

In regard to bona fides and recompense there is always the question whether it is possible that the person claiming recompense has been acting in suo, and not either in error or in bona fide. If he has a reversionary interest, it must be made very clear that he has not been acting with a view to increasing that reversion. It is not unreasonable to infer that the trustee here entered into a speculation in the hope of increasing the reversion that he thought would accrue to his constituents, and thus indirectly of benefiting himself. It is not clear that he trusted to be repaid by the Fourth Company out of the first end of the price, or whether the subjects were sold or not. If the price is sufficient, he may yet get back his money, but I think it impossible for him to maintain that it is a condition precedent to the company getting the subjects that they should pay him for the improvements which he says he has made.

LORD ORMIDALE.—I concur. In regard to the doctrine of recompense, as stated by Lord Stair, the Court must now, after the case of Barbour v. Halliday,[1] hold it as too broadly stated, as applied to meliorations by a mala fide possessor.

LORD GIFFORD had not heard the debate in the Inner-House.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—" . . . Find that the pursuers, as trustees of the Fourth Provident Society, are not bound, in administering and realising their security, to pay the amount expended by the defender William Stewart, as trustee on Wilkie's sequestrated estate, in completing the buildings libelled, reserving the effect of any claim on his part for repayment thereof against the price of the said subjects when sold, and against the other creditors and the estate of the bankrupt Wilkie: Farther decern against the said William Stewart, defender, in terms of the conclusions for removing and for payment of the sum of £90, 15s 11½d., being the balance of rents received by him, as reported by the accountant, Mr Carter; reserve any question in regard to the expense of the attempted sales of the property until the same shall come to be sold: Find the pursuers entitled to expenses," &c

J. & R. A. ROBERTSON, S.S.C.—JAMES BARTON, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 28.
Nov. 12, 1874.
Russell v. Russell.
1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Craighill.
M.

MRS SARAH RUSSELL AND HUSBAND, Petitioners.—R. V. Campbell.
THOMAS RUSSELL AND ANOTHER, Respondents.—MacLean.

Process—Reclaiming Note—Court of Session Act, 1868—31 and 32 Vict., c. 100, sec. 28.—Held that when the last day for lodging a reclaiming note under the Court of Session Act of 1868 fell upon a Sunday, it was timeously lodged upon the Monday.

MORTON, NEILSON, & SMART, W.S.—J. & R. D. ROSS, W.S.—Agents.

[1] July 3, 1840, 2 D. 1279, 12 Scot. Jur. 602.

No. 29.

Nov. 13, 1874.
Cunningham
v. Lee.

PETER CUNNINGHAM, Appellant.—Asher—Mackintosh.
J. B. W. LEE, Respondent.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Campbell Smith.
ROBERT WEIR (Kirk's Trustee), Compearer.—Guthrie Smith—H. J. Moncreiff.

Agent and Principal.—A law-agent bought shares in his own name on the employment of a person who neither paid for the shares nor would give instructions for reselling them on the settling day. The agent, after giving notice that he would sell the shares, carried them over in his own name through his London brokers, and sometime afterwards sold them without loss. He then claimed the difference between the price at which he had purchased the shares for his principal and the market price on the settling day. The claim was disallowed, on the ground that the claimant could not, while acting as agent for the owner of the shares, become the purchaser thereof, and that no loss had accrued upon the transaction.

1st DIVISION.
Lord Young.
M.

IN the sequestration of James Kirk, grocer, Edinburgh, Mr J. B. W. Lee, S.S.C., lodged a claim for £1632, 5s. as the balance of certain transactions in buying and selling stocks. The trustee admitted the claim to the extent of £1100, to which amount Lee had consented to restrict his claim.

One of the creditors, Peter Cunningham, appealed against this deliverance.

The Lord Ordinary allowed a proof, from which the following facts appeared:—Mr Lee, who had a long course of dealing in stocks and shares with the bankrupt and other persons for whom he bought shares in his own name through his London brokers, and having authority from Kirk to buy for him, on 29th October 1873, sent a letter to Mr Kirk intimating that he had bought in London, for Mr Kirk, £17,000 North British at £67, 16s. 3d., £11,528, 2s. 6d. for settlement in London on 14th November current.

On 12th November 1873 Mr Lee wrote to Mr Kirk the following letters:—"Dear Sir,—My London brokers, through whom I purchased your £17,000 British, £2000 Caledonian, 100 Eries, and 50 Erie preferences, for settlement this account, require me to have written instructions before they sell for the present account and purchase for next account. You failed to send me these yesterday, and unless I can telegraph to-day before 12 o'clock they may be sold out. Please to give the bearer written instructions, and call for me before 12 o'clock without fail.—Yours, &c." "Dear Sir,—After you left to-day at about 11 o'clock, I waited anxiously for your promised return before 12 o'clock, so that I might telegraph instructions as to the stock which I purchased for you in London, for settlement on 14th current. As you neither furnished me with the name into which you wished the stock transferred, nor gave me instructions within business hours to-day, the stock was sold in London, and is closed in accordance with the rules of the London Stock Exchange in such cases. The £17,000 North British was sold at 58¾ per share, the £2000 Caledonian," &c. . . . "I send you annexed an account-current between us to this date, shewing a balance against you of £1619, 9s. 7d., which please settle to-morrow, as I must remit it to London to-morrow afternoon. I purchased stocks to the same amount for the next account, but as I had not your instructions, I cannot hold that I purchased them on your account. If, however, you settle up the balance due to-morrow, and give me written instructions, I will invoice a similar amount of stock to you for the new account at the new prices. Let me hear from you to-morrow morning.—Yours, &c."

Mr Lee deponed—"My transactions with M'Anally and Inglis" (his

No. 29.
Nov. 13, 1874.
Cunningham v. Lee.

London brokers) "were conducted chiefly by telegraph. My bargain with them was, that if I did not telegraph to the contrary, they were to carry over for me, and in this case the stock was carried over on 12th November, according to that standing arrangement, I not having telegraphed to the contrary. Besides sending Kirk a sold note, I wrote him on the 12th that the stock was sold in London and closed. The account between him and me was thus entirely at an end, and on that footing I proceeded to deal with the stock, selling it on and after 21st November. The expense of carrying over was above £80, and that was paid by me. The prices rose after the middle of November, and the loss that would have taken place if the stock had been sold out on 14th November was somewhat diminished. If the stock had continued to fall, the loss would have fallen on me. I was liable to the London brokers. My belief was, that from and after 12th November I ceased to have any contract with Kirk. I was willing, if he paid me the differences, and relieved me of my liability, to hold the stock for him. I wrote him repeatedly to that effect, but the offer was not accepted."

Mr Lindsay, an accountant, who examined Mr Lee's books, deponed—"The price paid by Mr Lee for the £17,000 North British stock bought by him for the bankrupt on 28th October was £11,528, 2s. 6d. The amount realised by Mr Lee for the first £17,000 North British stock sold by him after 24th November was £11,482, 10s., shewing a loss of £45, 12s. 6d. The sum realised by him for the first £17,000 sold after 28th November was £12,215, shewing a profit of £686, 17s. 6d. on the price paid on 28th October."

On 27th November Kirk was sequestrated. Lee claimed the balance which would have been due to him if he had sold the shares on the settling day.

The Lord Ordinary, after the proof, pronounced an interlocutor disposing of other questions, and with reference to Lee's claim "recalls the deliverance of the trustee on the claim of J. B. W. Lee: Finds that the said J. B. W. Lee is not entitled to a ranking in the sequestration to any extent, and remits to the trustee to reject the claim in toto," &c.*

---

* "NOTE.—I do not think this is a legitimate claim to any extent. Mr Lee's position with reference to the transactions referred to was peculiar. He did not act as a broker, but as a sort of agent, who, while speculating in the share market on his own account through the instrumentality of a broker in London whom he employed, associated others (his clients or customers) in his speculations to such an extent as they desired or agreed to. The purchases and sales were in his own name, and were made for him by the London broker, his customers or clients being interested through him to the extent agreed on. In October 1873 he was speculating in the purchase of North British Railway stock, and the bankrupt agreed with him to join to the extent of £17,000 of that stock, and a purchase of that amount was on 28th October notified by him to the bankrupt as made on his account, for settlement on 14th November. The account of Lee's purchases, and the extent to which he was speculating for himself, or people other than the bankrupt, does not appear. The market fell, and so the particular speculation was for the time unfortunate. But Lee's broker, in pursuance of general instructions to that effect, on 12th November (called carry-over day), carried over, by an arrangement familiar on the Stock Exchange, all Lee's purchases, including that made on account of the bankrupt, till next settling day, which was on 28th November. On the same day (12th November) Lee applied to the bankrupt to provide him with the means of meeting the loss on his purchase, or arrange for carrying over; and receiving no reply, intimated to him that he was held liable for the loss. This loss is the subject of the claim in the sequestration. But, as already stated, the purchase

No. 29.

Nov. 13, 1874
Cunningham
v. Lee.

Mr Lee reclaimed, and argued;—Lee was the seller and Kirk the buyer. When Kirk refused to implement his bargain Lee was entitled to hold him liable for the price of the stocks as at the settling day. Lee took the whole risk of the stock, and was therefore entitled to any profit which might arise from the stock rising in the market. The transaction was closed on the 12th of November when the loss was ascertained. He had a right to sell out, and the bankrupt had no interest to inquire whether he actually sold out or kept the stock in his own name.

The respondent answered;—There was no sale by Lee on the settling day. A carrying over contract is not a sale, because the purchaser and the seller are the same. Lee had not proved that he had sustained a loss. He was acting as the broker of Kirk, and was bound to communicate to him any profit he might make.[1] being in Lee's name, was in fact carried over by his broker, acting on standing instructions. In truth, Lee acted exactly as if the purchase had been, in respect of interest, as it was ostensibly, his own, and carried it over with his other purchases till December, when he finally sold out so far as the bankrupt's purchase (or interest in Lee's purchases) extended, not only without loss, but with a gain of about £400. There were also speculations in other stocks or shares, but these standing in the same position as that in the North British Railway stock, to which I have adverted, were not made the subject of separate argument, and need not be particularly noticed.

---

"The claim is certainly of an unfavourable character. The transactions were in reality mere gambling for differences, according to the rise or fall of the share market; and I venture to doubt the propriety of this Court aiding a claim in bankruptcy founded on such transactions, and for that purpose considering what would have been the rights and duties of the parties respectively had the purchases been real. Had the bankrupt employed Lee to purchase on his account £17,000 of North British Railway stock for delivery on 14th November, Lee would no doubt have been entitled to demand the price, in return for the stock purchased by him on such employment. But the reality being mere speculation, with no intention of receiving any stock, but only of paying or receiving the amount of rise or fall, and Lee having himself carried on the speculation till he terminated it fortunately with a gain realised within a few weeks, I cannot allow him a ranking for the loss which would have resulted had it been terminated on 12th or 13th November. It is true that his gain was a fortunate accident, but still it puts him in this position, that he is seeking, not to save himself from loss, but to make a still further gain to the extent of the ranking which he demands. Had he taken up the stock on 14th November, it is not clear that there would have been any loss to the sequestrated estate, for the stock rose in the market. This was the legitimate course if reality of transaction be assumed. Lee very naturally shrank from it as involving too much risk, and preferred to carry over, and so carry on the speculation on his own account. But having taken this course, and made, and not lost, money by it, I am unable to think that he is in a position to demand a ranking on the view that it would have been a losing speculation had it been closed on 12th November, and that the eventual gain is a separate matter, to the whole benefit of which he is entitled, plus a dividend on the theoretical loss as at 12th November. I quite understand the argument on which the claim is maintained, but it has not overcome my repugnance to follow it to the conclusion contended for. The argument is not illogical, but is, in my opinion, outweighed by the considerations on the other side to which I have adverted.

"I therefore reject this claim."

[1] Paterson on the Stock Exchange (1870), 35; Cox on Joint Stock Companies (1870), pp. 56 and 57; Gourlay's Trs. v. Kerr, Feb. 20, 1856, 18 D. 619, 28 Scot. Jur. 260,—Dec. 6, 1856, 19 D. 135, 29 Scot. Jur. 64,—June 6, 1857, 19 D. 789, 29 Scot. Jur. 365; Gillett v. Peppercorne, July 25, 1840, 3 Beavan, p. 78; Rothschild v. Brookman, 1831, 5 Bligh's New Reports, p. 165; Brookman v. Roths-

No. 29. At advising,—

Nov. 13, 1874. Cunningham v. Lee.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question arises out of the sequestration of James Kirk, grocer and wine merchant, Edinburgh, and a claim on the sequestrated estate made by the reclaimer Lee for a balance of upwards of £1600, on an account current between him and Kirk. The account contains a variety of transactions in stocks and shares, for Mr Lee, who is a solicitor in Edinburgh, seems to have done a good deal in the way of Stock Exchange business. In 1873 he was empowered by Kirk to carry through a transaction on his behalf, and out of that transaction the present claim has arisen. The particular shares or stocks in question were bought by Lee for Kirk on 29th October 1873. Lee announced this purchase to Kirk in the following terms:—

"Dear Sir,—I enclose my account current with you up to this date, shewing a balance in your favour, after you deliver £10,000 British, of £6653, 12s. 11d.

"I yesterday purchased for you in London £17,000 North British, at 67·16/2, ... £11,528 2 6

Commission on £7000 at 1/16, . . . 4 7 6

2000 Caledonians at 96·8/9, ... 1928 15 0

No commission charged.

100 Eries at 39¼ and 1/ cont, ... 888 2 6

50 Erie Preferences at 56 and 1/5, say 56 dollars and 1/3 con., ... 632 2 6 for settlement in London on 14th November current, for which you will hold this to be the contract, as also the contract for the sales made yesterday for you, as stated in the account,—Yours," &c.

£14,982 10 0

This was accordingly taken as a contract between Lee and Kirk, and thus Lee bought for Kirk these stocks for settlement on the 14th November following. In short, this was what is called a time bargain, and necessarily a speculative bargain. The Lord Ordinary suggests whether this was not a gaming and wagering transaction within the meaning of the Act 8 and 9 Vict. c. 100. But it is settled by the decision in the case of Foulds v. Thomson, June 10, 1857 (19 D. 803, also reported in 29 Scot. Jur. 372), that a transaction of this sort is neither gaming nor wagering in terms of the statute, nor at common law. Therefore Lee's claim cannot be objected to on these grounds. But there were many other circumstances occurring after this which it is necessary to examine in order to see exactly what Mr Lee did.

On the 12th of November he wrote to Kirk thus:—"Dear Sir,—My London brokers, through whom I purchased your £17,000 British, £2000 Caledonian, 100 Eries, and 50 Erie Preferences, for settlement this account, require me to have written instructions before they sell for the present account, and purchase for next account. You failed to send me these yesterday, and unless I can telegraph to-day before 12 o'clock they may be sold out. Please to give the bearer written instructions, and call for me before 12 o'clock without fail. —Yours," &c.

From this it appears that Kirk had conceived the intention, or what Lee understood to be the intention, not to take delivery of the shares on the settling child, July 16, 1829, 3 Simon, 153; Booth v. Fielding and Parkinson, June 21, 1866, 1 Weekly Notes, p. 245.

---

No. 29.
Nov. 13, 1874.
Cunningham v. Lee.

day, the 14th of November, but to carry over till next settling day, and so Lee desired to have written instructions to do so. Kirk, however, took no notice of Lee's request. In this he acted very unreasonably, and placed Lee in a position of considerable embarrassment. The question is, what in these circumstances Lee did, and what he ought to have done? There was a great deal of argument upon the kind of relation which existed between Lee and Kirk. On one side it is maintained that he acted as a broker, and on the other that he acted as an agent. I do not think that a decision of this point is absolutely necessary to the settlement of the question before us. But the relation between them was undoubtedly that of principal and agent, and I should be inclined to say that Lee occupied the position of a factor rather than of a broker. Certain distinctions between the offices of broker and factor lead me to this conclusion. Thus a broker buys and sells, not in his own name, but in the name of his principal, whereas a factor buys in his own name. Again, a broker has no possession of the subject, no control over it, no power of disposal. The factor has such powers and a consequent lien over the subjects. In these respects Lee was rather a factor than a broker, and it is not necessary more precisely to determine the relation between the two. It is sufficient that Lee was agent.

Now, as already said, Lee was left without instructions. He says that he sold on 12th November, and that is the only matter in dispute on record. The appellant says in the 3d article of his condescendence—"Between 28th October and 12th November 1873 these shares fell considerably in value. On the latter date Mr Lee made entries in the bankrupt's account as if the shares had been then sold on his behalf, and this brought out a deficit on the account corresponding to the fall in the value of the shares. It is for this deficit that he claimed as a creditor in the sequestration. But, in point of fact, the shares were not sold by Mr Lee on 12th November, as indicated in the account produced with his claims. They were retained by him for some weeks till they rose to the price at which they had been purchased, when they were realised without any loss resulting on them at all."

This is a matter of fact which has been cleared up completely by the proof, both parole and written. On 12th November Lee certainly did write to Kirk that in consequence of having received no instructions the stocks had been sold and the account closed. But it is obvious that neither were the stocks sold nor the account closed, for some days after Lee offered to Kirk or his agents to carry over the shares after all to next settling day. That offer was not accepted, and Lee says he again sold the shares and so closed the account. But what Lee calls a sale is a very different thing. What he actually did was in effect to take the shares and the speculation himself, and to claim the loss as upon a sale on settling day. This was not a sale, but a speculation on his own account, in the hope that the shares would rise before another settling day. It is unnecessary to go into the technical details of this matter, but the result is, that instead of selling the stocks, Lee took them himself, and from that time the shares in the broker's books stood in his name as owner. Was he entitled to do this?

In circumstances of this sort, when a principal will not advance funds or give instructions, either a broker or a factor is entitled to sell, to take the price he receives in order to cover his loss, and to charge his principal for any balance which may remain. But, instead of selling, is the agent, be he broker or factor, entitled to appropriate the subjects to himself? That, also, is very well settled. No agent can buy the property of his principal in any case, except when he is

No. 29.
Nov. 13, 1874.
Cunningham v. Lee.

specially authorised to do so. But here there was no authority or consent. Lee obviously took the course which he did in the belief he was entitled to do so. He seems to have acted in perfect good faith, and with great forbearance towards Kirk. But still, upon the question whether he was entitled to do what he did, I am of opinion that he was not. His actings were quite against the settled rule of law.

On that ground Lee's claim falls to be rejected, and it is a matter of indifference what became of the shares after he took them. For he cannot say that £1600 are due to him on the sale of shares which he did not sell, but retained. It is, however, satisfactory to know that the loss which he sustained was ultimately very small or nothing at all.

I am therefore of opinion that we should adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD DEAS.—I do not think it is necessary to determine in what precise capacity Mr Lee was acting. He designs himself a Solicitor before the Supreme Courts. He also describes himself as a broker. It is not easy to understand what that implies. He was not a member of the Stock Exchange, or of any other body except the Society of Solicitors. If he was acting as a broker his position would be all the more unfavourable. He was, at all events, acting as an agent, and that is the view I am disposed to take of his position. Now, when an agent is empowered to buy in his own name for behoof of his client, the client is bound to relieve him when the settling day comes. If the client fails or refuses to relieve him of the price, or if, as in this case, the client will neither say nor do anything at all, I think the agent (not being a stockbroker, whose position may be different) might fairly be entitled to say,—"I am liable for the price, and if not timeously relieved I will retain the shares for my own behoof, and take the chance of profit or loss." I am not satisfied that this would be buying from his client. Even an understanding to the effect I have suggested might have been plausibly urged. But the misfortune is, that Mr Lee neither took this course, nor did he sell out as he might have done and debit his client with the loss. What he did was to carry over the shares in his own name, and sell them afterwards at a profit which he proposes to keep, and at same time to charge his client with a sum equal to the loss which would have been incurred if the shares had been sold on the settling day. I am clearly of opinion that Mr Lee is not entitled to do that.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—The question raised in the appeal by the reclaimer, Mr Lee, is of some importance to the parties in point of amount, and of great importance to the law in principle. It is not necessary to repeat the explanation of the facts out of which the legal question has arisen. Your Lordship has sufficiently explained them. On these facts the Lord Ordinary has decided that Mr Lee is not entitled to be ranked as a creditor in the sequestration of Kirk; and he has accordingly remitted to the trustee to reject Mr Lee's claim. I am of opinion that the decision of the Lord Ordinary is right.

I do not think it important to consider whether Mr Lee acted as a broker or only as an agent or a factor. It appears from the record that Mr Lee considered himself to be acting as a broker, and he alleges that he was employed by Kirk to act for him in the capacity of a broker. He also alleges that the business which he so transacted for Kirk was to be conducted, and was conducted, in accordance with the rules of the London Stock Exchange. But whether it may be considered that he acted as a broker or not, he certainly acted as agent; and it is clear beyond dispute that the transactions on the London Stock Exchange, out of which this dispute has arisen, were parts of a more extensive speculation by Mr Lee, and were conducted by Mr Lee through the medium of London stockbrokers, employed and directed by him, and not employed by, or in any way brought in contact with Mr Kirk. Lee, as acting for Kirk, had purchased North British stock for Kirk, not as an investment, but as a speculation, and when the time for taking up and paying for the stock arrived Kirk did not send the money or give instructions, and the London brokers, acting under the direction of Lee, proceeded to dispose of the stock by his orders, and for his benefit. I do not doubt that Lee, on Kirk's failure to remit the funds, was entitled to dispose of the stock in the market. He was entitled to sell the stock to another. Kirk had used him ill in not providing him with funds, or giving him instructions; and a sale by Lee for his protection, if made bona fide to a third party, would not have been otherwise than lawful. But there was no sale to a third party. In point of fact, Mr Lee became himself the purchaser of the stock, and after a stock-jobbing procedure, called carrying over, had been completed in regard to this stock and other stocks held by Lee, a sale ultimately took place, I think, in December, the result of which was not a loss, but a gain to Mr Lee of about £400. The claim now made is for the loss which would have resulted from an actual sale on the 12th or 13th of November, the price of that time having been low. The sum claimed is £1623, 5s.

No. 29.
Nov. 13, 1874.
Cunningham v. Lee.

In any view of the case I could not sustain this claim. At the close of the whole transaction there was no loss. Mr Lee is not seeking reimbursement of a loss; but, having ultimately been a gainer, he is suing for payment of a sum which would have been lost if the transaction had terminated by sale on Kirk's failure to remit funds on the 12th or 13th of November. That Lee was the purchaser of the shares at that time, and the holder of the shares after that time, is clear, and he having so purchased and so held the shares, I am disposed to agree with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that he is not entitled to demand from Kirk, or his estate, the sum here claimed, which is a theoretical or hypothetical loss as on 12th November. He cannot recover the loss which he avoided, and at the same time keep the gain which he made.

But, separately, and on a broader ground, I fully concur with your Lordship in opinion that Mr Lee being agent for Kirk,—agent in this speculative transaction,—could not lawfully purchase for himself the stock which he sold as agent for Kirk. He represented Kirk, and as Kirk's agent he sold to himself the stock which he held for Kirk. My mind is not disturbed by the Dean of Faculty's ingenious introduction of the "jobbers" on the London Exchange. We have nothing to do with them. They are the mere instruments by which the machinery of stock-jobbing speculation is worked. I am clearly of opinion that he was not entitled so to act as to transfer the shares to himself. It is well settled, both in England and in Scotland, that an agent cannot purchase what he is employed to sell, nor sell what he is employed to purchase. If directed and empowered to sell for his client, he cannot be himself the purchaser. If directed and empowered to purchase for his client he cannot purchase from himself. On this point it were easy to quote authorities in support of a principle which must commend itself to our minds. One of the most striking cases is that of Brookman v. Rothschild, 5 Bligh's Reports, new series, p. 165, where the rule was enforced

No. 30.
Nov. 13, 1874.
Cunningham v. Lee.

notwithstanding the good faith of the proceeding. I may also mention the case of Gillett v. Peppercorne, decided by Lord Langdale, 3 Beavan, 78, and the case of Crowe v. Ballard, 3 Bro., Ch. C., p. 119. See also Sugden on Vendor and Purchaser, vol. 2, p. 887; Addison on Contracts, p. 72.

If, therefore, Lee, being employed to sell certain shares, had purchased these shares for himself, I should have had no doubt that he acted unlawfully, whether he be considered as an agent or as a stockbroker.

But if, being agent, he sold as a step in the process of carrying over and thus continuing the speculation, I think he cannot be permitted to separate the carrying over into two parts, the one being a sale by himself as agent to some jobber for himself as an individual, and the next a retransmission or recovery of the shares back from the jobber to himself, to be held on by him to his own ultimate gain, and then to take the date of the sale to himself and sue his employer as for a loss at that date. Such a proceeding by an agent, whether stockbroker or not, was, in my opinion, illegal. It necessarily involved the purchase by himself from his client,—or rather by himself as an individual from himself as an agent,—a purchase which terminated in a resulting gain to himself. Such a transaction is, in my view, contrary to law.

On this separate ground, even more clearly than on the ground stated by the Lord Ordinary, I am of opinion that Mr Lee's claim has been rightly rejected.

When I say that Mr Lee's conduct in this transaction was illegal, I do not mean to impute or suggest any fraud or intentional unfairness on his part. But in these transactions on the Stock Exchange, where such speculation on time bargains, though not gaming and wagering within the meaning of the statute, do certainly tend to gambling, it is essential to protect, and to enforce firmly, the rules of law and equity which regulate the relations between principal and agent. I feel, therefore, no hesitation in rejecting this claim.

LORD MURE concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

MORTON, NEILSON, & SMART, W.S.—J. B. W. LEE, S.S.C.—DAVID HUNTER, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 30.
Nov. 13, 1874.
Berwick, &c.

DAVID BERWICK AND OTHERS, Petitioners.—T. B. Johnston.

Trust—Powers of Trustees—Nobile Officium.—Held that a petition (not under the Trust Acts) by testamentary trustees for powers not given by the trust-deed was incompetent.

Tutors-Nominate.—Observed that, in the case of tutors-nominate, the Court have occasionally granted powers which they would not give to trustees.

1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Curriehill.

THIS was a petition by David Berwick, David Edie, and Walter Walker, original and assumed trustees of the deceased Walter Walker of Kingask, near Cupar-Fife. The petition stated that the late Walter Walker conveyed all his heritable and moveable property to the petitioner, David Berwick, and other trustees.

The purposes of the trust were, inter alia,—(1) Payment of debts. (2) Payment of the free yearly proceeds, after meeting the said debts and obligations, to the truster's wife. (6) The trustees were empowered in certain circumstances to sell and dispose of the truster's lands and estate of Kingask, and in the event of such sale to pay to the truster's eldest son, or invest for his behoof, the sum of £2000 sterling. (7) In the event of such sale the trustees were directed to retain and invest the residue, and after the death of the truster's widow to divide the residue equally among his whole children then in life, share and share alike, the lawful issue of any dying before the said event succeeding to their parents' share equally.

No. 30.

Nov. 13, 1874.
Berwick, &c.

8. In the event of it appearing to the trustees that the lands and estate of Kingask ought not to be sold, and that the truster's debts, obligations, and burdens can be adequately met without selling the said estate, the trustees were directed to convey the said estate to the truster's eldest son, and his heirs and assignees, either on the youngest child arriving at the age of twenty-one years, or on the death or second marriage of the truster's wife, or at any other period that the trustees might consider expedient.

By the trust-disposition and settlement the trustees were nominated and appointed executors to the truster, and also tutors and curators to such of his children as should be in pupillarity or minority.

The petitioner, Mr Berwick, was left sole surviving and acting trustee, and on 10th January 1873 he assumed the petitioners, Mr Edie and Mr Walter Walker, to be trustees along with him.

At the time of his death the truster was, and had been for some years, in the natural possession and occupation of the lands of Kingask, which constituted his whole heritable estate. These were in his lifetime entered in the county valuation-roll as of the annual value of £425. His personal estate was insufficient to meet his debts and obligations, and the lands of Kingask were heavily burdened.

By letters dated 10th and 14th June 1865 Mr Walker's trustees let the farm and lands of Kingask to Mr Thomas D. Cunningham, Newbigging of Blebo, for nineteen years from Martinmas 1865, at the rent of £550 per annum for the first six years of the lease, and £600 per annum for the remaining period.

The petitioners stated,—"Mr Cunningham has informed the petitioners that it is impossible for him to pay the increased rent of £600, or any longer to carry on the farm at the present rent; that he has invested his whole means in stocking the farm; that a very considerable portion of the money so invested has already been lost; and that, as he is losing money every year, he will very shortly be left without any means at all, unless he is allowed to leave the farm, or his rent be very considerably reduced. This, he says, arises from two causes: mainly because, first, he had over-estimated the agricultural value of the land, and, second, that farm-servants' wages and other expenses of labour have since the time of his offer been very greatly increased. The reduction of rent indicated by Mr Cunningham is £100 per annum under the maximum rent of £600.

"The petitioners differ from Mr Cunningham as to the annual value of the land, but otherwise they believe his statements to be true. They find it utterly impossible to grant him the reduction of rent which he requires. The free revenue of the trust-estate, after paying interest on debt, annuity, and public and parochial burdens, does not exceed £150 per annum, out of which the trustees have to support and educate five children, so that the reduction of rent proposed by Mr Cunningham would virtually leave these children without sufficient means of subsistence. The petitioners believe that, either by taking the farm into their own hands, or by selling it, they will be able at least to maintain, probably considerably to increase, the income of the trust, and they have therefore resolved, subject to the approval of the Court, to allow Mr Cunningham to leave the farm at Martinmas 1875.

"The petitioners have no power under the trust-deed to accept renunciation of leases, and they deem the present application to be therefore necessary."

No. 30.

Nov. 13, 1874.
Berwick, &c.

The prayer of the petition was "to authorise and empower the petitioners to accept from the said Thomas D. Cunningham, a renunciation of his lease of the farm and lands of Kingask belonging to the petitioners as trustees foresaid as at the term of Martinmas 1875 as if it had come to its natural termination, and to allow the said Thomas D. Cunningham to flit and remove from the said farm at the said term, he always paying or finding security for payment of the whole rents due for the possession up to said term, and adjusting with the petitioners the course of cropping for crop and year 1875."

Lord Curriehill reported the case to the Court, and referred to the cases Kinloch and Others, Dec. 7, 1859, 22 D. 174 (32 Scot. Jur. 73), and Turner, March 1, 1862, 24 D. 694 (34 Scot. Jur. 347).

Lord President.—I think it important to notice that this is not an application by tutors-nominate, but by trustees. One of the petitioners is tutor-nominate, but it is in his capacity as trustee that he presents this application along with the other trustees. In the case of tutors-nominate the Court have occasionally granted higher powers than they would give to trustees. Neither is this a case under the Trust Acts. The powers of trustees are defined by the trust-deed, and the Court will give no higher power. The trustees are not entitled to come to the Court for advice. If they have not the power given them by the deed it is not competent for us to give it them. I think, therefore, that the petition should be dismissed as incompetent.

Lord Deas.—The petitioners are the accepting and acting trustees under the mortis causa deed of settlement of the late Walter Walker, of Kingask. The trust-estate consists substantially of the lands or farm of Kingask, which the trustees acting for the time being let in 1865 to the present tenant, Mr Cunningham for nineteen years at a rent of £550 per annum for the first six years, and £600 per annum thereafter. They state that Mr Cunningham represents himself as totally unable to pay the rent of £600; that he is yearly losing the only means he has, and unless he either gets a reduction of £100 a-year, or is allowed to renounce the lease, he will shortly be unable to pay any rent at all. The petitioners state that they believe this to be true, but that they consider the lands worth the full rent, which might be got from a tenant of greater capital and skill, and alternatively, that they could sell the lands at a price which would considerably increase the income of the trust, which is all required for the trust-purposes. In these circumstances, they ask the authority of the Court to accept a renunciation of the lease. I see no reason whatever to doubt that the petitioners take a judicious view of what is for the interests of the trust-estate. But it is for them to exercise their own discretion in that matter. If they do so rightly they will be safe. But it is a pure question of management, in which we cannot aid them, and I think we must refuse the petition as incompetent.

Lord Ardmillan and Lord Mure concurred.

Lord Curriehill pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary having considered the petition, and heard counsel for the petitioners, and thereafter reported the same to the Lords of the First Division, as advised by their Lordships, finds the petition incompetent, dismisses the same, and decerns."

Frasers, Stodart, & Mackenzie, W.S., Agents.

MRS SARAH RUSSELL AND HUSBAND, Petitioners.—R. V. Campbell.
THOMAS RUSSELL AND ANOTHER, Respondents.—D.-F. Clark—MacLean.

No. 31.
Nov. 14, 1874.
Russell v. Russell.

Partnership—Judicial Factor.—A woman, who was a partner in a business, married, and so ceased to be a partner. She then presented an application to the Court to appoint a judicial factor, with power to wind up the copartnery. Held that the dissolution of the partnership was not a sufficient reason for the appointment of a factor.

Process—Judicial Factor—Special Powers.—Observed that it is not the practice of the Court to grant special powers under the petition for appointment of a judicial factor.

1ST DIVISION. Ld. Craighill. M.

THIS was a petition at the instance of Mrs Sarah Russell, with concurrence of her husband, for the sequestration of the estates of a wine and spirit business, in which the petitioner had up to the date of her marriage in 1873 been a partner along with her sister Margaret Russell, and her brother Thomas Russell, and for the appointment of a judicial factor, with power to wind up the copartnery.

The petitioners averred that "since her marriage the petitioner Mrs Russell has repeatedly made application to the said Thomas Russell, respondent, for a statement of his intromissions and division of the profits arising out of the said business, and the parties have had several meetings to endeavour to adjust matters, but latterly Thomas Russell has refused either to give the petitioners access to the business-books of the partnership, or to supply them with a statement of accounts. The petitioners thereupon requested that the business should be wound up, and that their interest therein should be paid out; but the said Thomas Russell, respondent, refuses to make any payment whatever to the petitioners, either in name of profit arising out of the business, or on account of the petitioner Mrs Russell's share of the goodwill and stock of the copartnery. The petitioners have thus had no share whatever in the business since their marriage, and the business is being carried on by the respondents without regard to the petitioners' rights and interests."

Thomas Russell and Margaret Russell lodged answers, in which they stated that they were willing to hold count and reckoning with the petitioners, and that there was no necessity for judicial management.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sequestrates the estates of the copartnery carried on in the name of Thomas Russell, wine and spirit merchant, No. 18 Adelphi Street, Glasgow, and nominates and appoints George Macfarlane, chartered accountant, Glasgow, to be judicial factor on the estates of the said copartnery, with the powers specially prayed for, and with the usual powers, he always finding caution before extract, and decerns."

The respondents reclaimed.[1]

LORD PRESIDENT.—The partnership here was dissolved in 1873 by the marriage of one of the partners. There is no doubt what are the rights of the parties, and if they are not acknowledged they can be given effect to by an ordinary action. Since the dissolution of the partnership the business has been carried on by Thomas Russell and his unmarried sister. The married sister says that she is entitled to have the whole business sold and wound up. But

[1] Young v. Collins, March 14, 1853, 1 Macq. 385, 15 D. 35, 25 Scot. Jur. 329; M'Kersies v. Mitchell, June 25, 1872, 10 Macph. 861, 44 Scot. Jur. 487; Grieve v. Cunningham, Dec. 17, 1869, 8 Macph. 317, 42 Scot. Jur. 140.

No. 31.
Nov. 14, 1874.
Russell v. Russell.

what is asked is that a judicial factor should be appointed who will take charge of the business, and oust Thomas Russell and his sister. The effect would be to put an end to the business. Now, this is not a course which the Court sanctions, unless under very special circumstances.

The dissolution of a business by the marriage of a female partner has the same effect as if it had been dissolved by the death of a partner. The female partner drops out of the firm just as if she were dead, because she is incapacitated from continuing. She cannot continue in the business without her husband, and she cannot bring him in. The law on this point is well stated in the case of Young v. Collins, February 17, 1852 (14 D. 540, 1 Macq. 385). The Second Division thought that there were specialties which prevented the application of the general rule. The House of Lords affirmed the general rule that when a partnership comes to an end by the death of a partner, the surviving partners are entitled to wind up the business. I am therefore clearly of opinion that we should refuse the petition.

It is right to observe that I could not under any circumstances have agreed to allow the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary to stand. It is not our practice to grant special powers under an application for the appointment of a judicial factor. If the factor, after inquiry, comes to be of opinion that special powers are required, he must come and apply to the Court in a separate petition.

Lord Deas.—I concur with your Lordship that special powers ought not to be granted at the time of appointing a judicial factor, and that it is not the practice to do so. It is not till the factor has entered upon the management that he can judge whether he requires special powers, and it then becomes his duty to take the responsibility of making whatever application he thinks necessary.

On the merits of this petition I am entirely of the opinion expressed by your Lordship. The fact that the dissolution of the partnership took place by the marriage of one of the partners rather tells against the application than otherwise. The lady dissolved the partnership by her own voluntary act. She might have called the other partners to account at any time, and there is nothing to prevent her doing so now. But there is nothing stated to justify our superseding the partners, at present carrying on the business, by appointing a judicial factor.

Lord Ardmillan and Lord Mure concurred.

The Court pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the said interlocutor; refuse the petition, and decern: Find the petitioners liable in expenses," &c.

Morton, Neilson, & Smart, W.S.—J. & R. D. Ross, W.S.—Agents.

No. 32.
Nov. 14, 1874.
Steuart v. Peddie.

Andrew Steuart, Pursuer.—R. V. Campbell.
John Peddie Senr., Defender.—Asher.
Mrs Jane Thomson or Peddie, Defender.
John Peddie Junr., Defender.

Lease—Hypothec—Intromitter, Liability of.—The tenant of a farm died in January, leaving a pupil son, who was entitled to take up the lease, and a widow who procured herself decerned executrix-dative to her husband, and carried on the farm for behoof of her son. With the advice of P, her father-in-law, th

No. 32.

Nov. 14, 1874.

Steuart v. Peddie.

widow sold the whole crop and stock, except the turnips in the ground, by the end of October, partly by herself, and partly through P in her name, who received the price of part of the crop and handed it to her. A few days before the crop was removed P received a letter from the landlord's factor asking whether he was to hold him responsible for the rent, to which no answer was given. Held that by his conduct in regard to the subjects of the landlord's hypothec, P had rendered himself, jointly and severally with the widow, liable for the whole year's rent (diss. Lord Gifford, who held that in the absence of proof of any fraudulent conspiracy to defeat the landlord's right, the liability of P was limited to the extent of his actual intromissions).

2D DIVISION. Lord Young. R.

THIS was an action raised on 18th March 1874 by Mr Steuart of Auchlunkhart against John Peddie senr., farmer, Brawlands, John Peddie junr., and his tutors and curators, if he any had, and Mrs Jane Thomson or Peddie, being respectively the father, the son and heir, and the widow of Alexander Peddie, late tenant of the farm of Delmore belonging to the pursuer, concluding against the defenders for payment of the rent of the farm of Delmore for crop and year 1873.

The farm of Delmore was let by the pursuer for nineteen years from Martinmas 1870 to Alexander Peddie, at a yearly rent (chiefly grain), which amounted, at the fiars prices for 1873, to about £130, payable at Martinmas and Whitsunday after the separation of the crop. Alexander Peddie died intestate in January 1873, leaving a son, the defender, John Peddie junr., a boy of seven or eight years of age. In May 1873 his widow was decerned executrix-dative to her husband.

The ground of action set forth against Mr Peddie senr. and Mrs Peddie was that they had possessed and managed the farm from Whitsunday 1873, and disposed of the crop of that year and other effects subject to the landlord's hypothec.

Defences were lodged for John Peddie senr. and joint defences for Mrs Peddie and the pupil.

A proof was led, which established the following facts:—After the death of Alexander Peddie, whose affairs were embarrassed, Mrs Peddie took upon herself the management of the farm for her pupil son, and sowed and reaped the crop of 1873.

On 27th October 1874 Mr Charles Kelman, Mr Steuart's factor, having learned that Mr Peddie senior, who was a large creditor on his son's estate, was taking an active part in the management of the farm of Delmore, wrote the following letter to him:—"Keith, 27th October 1873.—Dear Sir,—Mr Steuart has observed of late the shameful treatment of the farm of Delmore, at which he is very much displeased. He requests me to inquire, in the first place, whether I may depend on you for payment of the ordinary on or within a day or two after the 11th Novr. . . . . CHARLES KELMAN." To this letter Mr Peddie returned no answer. By this time he had sold, for the widow and in her name, a great part of the crop, which, however, had not been delivered to the purchasers, nor the price paid. Upon receipt of the factor's letter Mr Peddie had a number of carts brought to the farm, and the whole crop was removed from the farm on 31st October 1873. In the early part of November he received the price of the crop, which had been sold by him, amounting, according to his own evidence, to £89, and handed it to the widow. In addition to this, Mrs Peddie herself sold crop to the value of £24. The stock upon the farm was also sold about the same time.

Mr Peddie stated in his evidence;—"I knew that sales of stock were made from the farm about the same time that the sales of crop were made. When pressing bills came in the widow came to me about them, and I said the best way would be to go to market with the stock and pay off these pressing bills, which she did." There was no evidence that he took any active part in the sale of the stock. He further deponed that he advised the widow to leave the turnips upon the farm, which, with the dung and the machinery of the threshing mill, and certain sums claimed for meliorations by the tenant's representatives, he thought would be sufficient to pay the rent. "Examined by the Court.—(Q.) You advised the widow about selling the crop and selling the stock? (A.) Yes. (Q.) And you helped her to the extent you have mentioned in selling the crop? (A.) Yes. (Q.) You advised her to leave the turnips and the dung upon the farm, because you thought that would be necessary, in addition to the value of the improvements of the buildings, to meet the landlord's claim for rent? (A.) Yes, and the machinery of the threshing mill. (Q.) That was your reason for giving that advice, and her reason for acting on it? (A.) Yes. (Q.) Then both of you considered how much it would be necessary to leave in order to meet the landlord's claim? (A.) Yes. (Q.) You considered and arranged that between you? (A.) Yes. (Q.) If you had considered it necessary to leave more crops than the turnips to meet the landlord's claims would you have done it? (A.) Yes. (Q.) How did you intend any deficiency to be met if there turned out to be a deficiency? (A.) We never thought of that; I thought there would be more than enough. (Q.) But thinking of it now, how do you think it is to be met? Who is to pay it? (A.) I don't know."

No. 32.
Nov. 14, 1874.
Steuart v. Peddie.

The widow left the farm on 1st November, and on the same day Mr Kelman visited the farm, and found nothing but a few turkeys, which were gone when he returned a few days after. About nine acres of turnips were left in the ground, but no fodder was left on the farm.

No sequestration was taken out by the landlord, but on 26th January 1874 the deceased Alexander Peddie's estate was sequestrated under the Bankruptcy Act.

The Lord Ordinary, on 25th June 1874, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Decerns against the defenders, John Peddie, farmer, Brawlands, and Mrs Jane Thomson or Peddie, conjunctly and severally, in terms of the conclusions of the summons, and finds them liable in expenses: Assoilzies the defender, John Peddie, son and heir of the deceased Alexander Peddie, from the said conclusions." *

---

* "OPINION.—It is, in my opinion, satisfactorily established that upon the death, in January 1873, of Alexander Peddie, the tenant under the lease of the farm of Delmore, the possession of the farm was continued by his widow (the defender, Mrs Jane Peddie) till October 1873, when she removed. The infant defender (John Peddie, son of the deceased Alexander) was entitled to the current lease as heir, but, being an infant, was incapable of acting. In continuing the possession of the farm, the widow acted on the advice and with the assistance of the father of her deceased husband, the defender, John Peddie (Brawlands). On his advice, and with his active assistance, the crop of 1873 was sown, reaped, sold, and delivered to the purchasers. Considering the infancy of the heir, their conduct was quite proper, provided they were ready and willing to pay the rent for the crop which they so sowed, reaped, sold, and removed. In my opinion, their conduct subjected them in liability to the landlord therefor. I cannot distinguish between them, for, while neither had a title to the lease, both actively intromitted with the land and its produce on the title of the infant heir, to whom no legal or available obligation attached in consequence of their conduct. Having regard to the reality of the thing, I attach no importance to the circumstance that the intromissions were in the name of the widow, and regard both defenders as real intromitters with the land and its produce for the year and crop the rent of which is demanded.

"With respect to the turnip crop left on the ground, and the manure, thresh-

No. 32.

Nov. 14, 1874. Steuart v. Peddie.

Mr and Mrs Peddie reclaimed, but the latter withdrew her reclaiming note.

Argued for Mr Peddie senior;—Mr Peddie's liability was rested on two grounds, viz.,—(1) Active interference on his part in removing the crop; and (2) advice given by him. (1) His conduct could only involve liability if he was aiding in an illicit act. He was giving his assistance in an act of administration, which was legal on the part of the widow, as executrix of her husband, and as acting for her son. He was acting merely as her hand. There was no suggestion that he appropriated any part of the price received by him. (2) The advice given by him did not infer liability. It could not seriously be contended that any man who gave a tenant advice as to the management of his farm rendered himself liable for the rent.

Further, in any view Mr Peddie's liability could not be extended beyond the amount of his intromissions. The opposite view would lead to the result that any man who intromitted with a bushel of grain subject to the landlord's hypothec rendered himself liable for the whole year's rent.

Argued for the pursuer;—Intromission with hypothecated subjects involved liability for the rents.[1] There was sufficient evidence of a joint arrangement between Mr Peddie and the widow to displenish the farm. They were versantes in illicito, and each must be liable for the full rent.

At advising,—

LORD ORMIDALE.—The present action was brought by Mr Steuart, the landlord, against the defenders, for payment of the rent for crop and year 1873, and the ground it is laid upon, or at any rate the ground of liability ultimately relied on as against the widow and her father-in-law, the reclaimer, John Peddie, is that, by their wrongous conduct in regard to the subject of his hypothec, they have rendered themselves liable to him for the rent. The Lord Ordinary has given effect to this contention as against the widow, and her father-in-law, Mr Peddie. The widow has acquiesced in the Lord Ordinary's judgment, and withdrawn a reclaiming note which she had at first presented against it. Mr Peddie, her father-in-law, has reclaimed, and we have had a full and anxious discussion upon his reclaiming note. We have now to say whether the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary ought to be adhered to or altered, and this question depends on the view that is taken of the proof and of the facts established by it.

The widow, who has been examined as a witness, makes the following statement:—"Cross-examined by pursuer's counsel.—He (Mr Peddie senior) and I arranged that the white crop of 1873 was to be sold, and the stock. I left the farm on 1st November. (Q.) What put it into your head to sell off all the ing mill, and ameliorations, I am of opinion that no answer is thus afforded to the action. The landlord is entitled to payment of his rent from the intromitters with the land and its produce, and is not bound to take it in turnips, dung, &c. Bona fide purchasers for value are protected by the recent Act against the liability which formerly attached to them as intromitters with crop or stock, but the protection does not extend to such intromitters as the defenders.

---

"The infant heir has been assoilzied, for, I think, obvious reasons.

"I ought, perhaps, to observe, though it is obvious, that, as executrix, the widow had no concern with the farm or with the crop of 1873, and that the decree is not against her in the capacity of executrix."

[1] Erskine, ii. 6, 59; Hunter on Landlord and Tenant, ii. 373; Bell on Leases, p. 29; Lord Salton v. Club, June 25, 1704, M. 1821 and 6224; Dun v. Dun, March 31, 1624, M. 6217.

No. 32.
Nov. 14, 1874.
Steuart v. Peddie.

stock and crop within four or five days? (A.) I was advised by my friends to sell it off. (Q.) Was it not because you were afraid that if you did not the landlord would sequestrate for the rent? (A.) No; I was not afraid of the landlord, but I thought it would be better to sell off the crop than leave it on the ground, as a neighbouring farmer had done, and it was all destroyed with vermin. (Q.) Were you not shewn a letter from Mr Kelman to your father-in-law a day or two before all these things were sold, asking whether the rent would be duly paid at Martinmas? (A.) Yes. (Q.) Had that letter anything to do with your selling off the crop in that way? (A.) I don't recollect."

That letter is of great importance. Mr Kelman, the landlord's factor, by whom it was written, had apparently heard that Peddie was interfering a good deal with the management of the farm, and he puts him on his guard, asking him whether he is to hold him responsible for the rent. That letter was written on 27th October 1873, and we must infer that it was received either on that day or the following. Peddie ought to have answered that letter one way or other, but he never answered it at all. The crop was of course under hypothec to the landlord for the year's rent. The stock was also hypothecated, although so far as it was left by the deceased tenant it belonged in property to his widow and son. Now, in place of taking a hint from Mr Kelman's letter that it was his duty to have regard to the landlord's rent, what does Peddie do? The delivery or removal of the crop had not yet taken place. But, in total disregard of the landlord's rights, in two or three days after receipt of Mr Kelman's letter delivery and removal of the crop was made to the various parties to whom it had been sold. That was done in a very hurried manner, for there were twenty carts on the farm on the same day, viz. the 31st October, for the purpose. A few days after, still without answering Mr Kelman's letter, Peddie obtained payment of a considerable part of the price of the crop, and, without making any provision for the landlord's rent, handed over the money he so received to the widow. The result is that the landlord has not down to the present moment been paid a farthing of the rent for the year 1873, and has, at the same time, been deprived of all recourse for payment upon the crop and stock.

As regards Mr Peddie it appears to me that his conduct in reference to the crop is sufficient to subject him in liability. It is clear from the proof that he actively assisted the widow in getting the crop sold and removed from the farm, and disposing of the price thereof to the prejudice of the landlord. A passage in Peddie's own testimony is very instructive on this point. When asked how he intended to meet the landlord's claims, if there turned out any deficiency of things left on the farm, he says,—"We never thought of that. I thought there would be more than enough. (Q.) But thinking of it now, how do you think it is to be met? Who is to pay it? (A.) I don't know." Mr Kelman again states that when he went to the farm on 1st November 1873 there was nothing on it but some turkeys, and in a few days after he found the turkeys gone.

The question here arises, assuming that Peddie is answerable for the landlord's rent to the extent at least of the value of the crop which he actively assisted in disposing of and getting removed from the farm, how far will that go? Whether only to the extent to which it is proved that he intermeddled, or for the full rent? Here it is important to keep in view his own statement. From that it appears that he actually sold crop to the extent of about £89, and that the widow sold about £24 more. According also to his own testimony, the whole matter was arranged between him and the widow. Both of these parties are therefore liable jointly and severally to the extent of £114 at least, leaving only about £16 to make up the whole rent. But I do not think on the proof it must be held that £114 was the full price which either was or might have been got for the crop. The sale was evidently a very hurried matter, and it may not unfairly be assumed that, if it had been more regularly, openly, and deliberately gone about, larger prices would have been obtained. Besides, it must be borne in mind that the defenders were wrongdoers. I do not think therefore that we can take their own statement of the value of the crop sold and realised by them, especially if there is other evidence that the crop was more valuable. We have that in Mr Kelman's evidence:—"(Q.) Was there plenty of stock and crop on the farm before the removing to pay the rent? (A.) There was plenty of crop at any rate." There are thus grounds, I think, for entitling the Court to infer that the crop alone, independently of the stock, was sufficient to meet the whole rent. And if so, that is, without going further, sufficient to support the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

No. 32.

Nov. 14, 1874.
Steuart v. Peddie.

But I am not satisfied that Peddie should not be made answerable, if that were necessary, for the stock also. The widow in her evidence draws no distinction, in this respect, between the crop and stock. She says,—"He (Peddie) and I arranged that the white crop of 1873 was to be sold, and the stock." The assistance of Peddie is also stated by her to have been just the same with regard to the stock as with regard to the crop. But Peddie has given no account of the stock. If it were necessary, therefore, to eke out his liability by shewing that besides crop he also aided in disposing of and realising the stock, I think this has been sufficiently done.

For the reasons now stated, I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor ought to be adhered to.

LORD GIFFORD.—I differ from Lord Ormidale only as to the extent of the liability of the defender, John Peddie.

It has been established that the defender, John Peddie senior, sold the crop to the extent of about £89, got the price, and knowing that the landlord's rent was unpaid, and having the agent's letter in his pocket, he nevertheless handed the money to the widow, who applied the money to her own purposes, leaving the landlord unpaid. This undoubtedly makes Mr Peddie liable to the extent of his intromission. The price he received was a surrogatum for the crop, which was subject to the landlord's hypothec.

But I am not inclined to make Mr Peddie liable for sums which he did not receive, or for crop or stock with which he did not actually intermeddle. I think there is a most material difference between active intromission and mere advice. The pursuer's case really comes to this, that in respect of the advice given by Mr Peddie there is imposed upon him a penal liability for the whole rent. If there had been a fraudulent conspiracy to defraud the landlord's right in which he had joined he would justly have been made liable for the whole rent. But the Lord Ordinary does not base his judgment upon fraud, and I do not understand that any plea of fraud is maintained by the pursuer. No such case has been made out. The question is whether Mr Peddie is liable for the value of the crop and stock which he did not sell, but which was sold by the widow, who had a title as executrix to sell the stock at least. If it had been made out that he sold the crop at an

No. 32.
Nov. 14, 1874.
Steuart v. Peddie.

undervalue in order to defeat the landlord's hypothec, the case would have assumed a different aspect. But that has not been attempted to be proved, nor is there any evidence or any suggestion that the defender, John Peddie, ever received more than the £89. Supposing that after having got the £89, which he received as the price of the corn sold by him, he had said in answer to the landlord's letter "There is all I have got," and had paid it over to the landlord and interfered no further, could he have been made liable for any more? No one has been brought to say that he sold any part of the stock or any other crop than that which produced the £89. Taking, then, his evidence as true, and his acting to have been in bona fide, are there any grounds for making him liable for more than he got? It is not a case of vitious intromission. It is intromission with goods subject to hypothec, which is no doubt a ground of liability, but only to the extent of the intromission. Formerly, purchasers of hypothecated crop were liable to the landlord to the extent of their intromissions. Now they are protected by statute if they are in bona fide. The statute does not apply to Mr Peddie, because he is not a purchaser. But could it be said that if he had sold a single cartload he would have been liable for the whole rent? I think not, assuming that there was no fraud; for if fraud were proved the landlord would not be put to prove too nicely the extent of intromission. I think, therefore, so far as the crop is concerned, £89 is the measure of the defender's liability.

If it is necessary to bring in the stock to increase Mr Peddie's liability I have still more difficulty. I do not think that he actively interfered in regard to the stock. The stock was the widow's property, or at least she had the full control over it, as executrix of her husband, and, as such, she herself disposed of it, no doubt after advising with her father-in-law. All that the widow says is,—"He and I arranged that the white crop of 1873 was to be sold, and the stock." "Arranged" is a very vague expression, and is quite consistent with Mr Peddie's own statement, and does not necessarily infer any legal liability. I admit that Mr Peddie's conduct probably caused loss to the landlord, but I have difficulty in holding him liable beyond the extent of his actual intromission.

Lord Neaves.—This is a case of nicety and importance. The defender says, "I was never anything but an adviser. I am no more liable than a man who gives an opinion of counsel, or a servant who carries out his master's orders,"—and this was argued as applicable both as to the stock and crop. Both of your Lordships are of opinion that this defence will not stand in regard to the crop sold by the defender. The question is, whether, as it cannot stand as to the crop, it can be sustained as regards the stock.

I have come to be clearly of opinion that in the whole circumstances the defender is liable for the full rent. He was not a mere third party, taking no part but expressing an opinion. Nor was he a person merely doing what he was bid. He was an adviser; but he was also an active assistant and promoter of the proceedings which he advised, certainly most active as regards the crop. He sold the crop, and took the price away from the landlord. There he was doing wrong, for the landlord, in virtue of his hypothec, is a quasi-proprietor of the crop. He was most active in accomplishing that result for the widow, who would probably never have thought of it had it not been for him.

It may be remarked that the crop of 1873 did not fall under the widow's administration as executrix. Further, it would appear that the late tenant, Alexander Peddie, was not possessed of any capital, and that his father, the de

No. 32.
Nov. 14, 1874.
Steuart v. Peddie.

fender, was a large creditor on his estate. His active assistance and interference may have been with the object of saving something out of the fire for himself.

After he had begun to intromit with the crop he received a letter from the landlord's agent addressed to himself, and asking him in effect,—"You are acting as if this were your affair. Are you prepared to pay the rent?" If this letter had been answered one way or other it would have influenced the landlord's conduct. If the defender had denied all liability, a sequestration would have been taken out immediately. He does not answer the letter, and in the meantime is actively engaged in influencing the widow's conduct as to what was to be done with the remaining subjects. It is plain that he approved of the selling of the stock, because he says he calculated that there was enough on the farm to pay the rent in turnips yet in the ground, and in meliorations on houses. Nothing can be more candid, but, at the same time, more fatal to his case than his answers to the Lord Ordinary's questions. A more plain admission that he was the person upon whose decision depended what was to be done could not be conceived. He implies that, either from his power as a creditor or his natural influence as father-in-law, his advice was conclusive.

All this appears to me to give great weight to what the Lord Ordinary says in his note, that his conduct was quite proper provided he was ready and willing to pay the rent. But if he acted with the intention of pulling his own neck out of the collar and leaving the landlord in suspense, his conduct was so disingenuous as to make him liable for the whole rent.

In short, the view which I take of the case is, that his conduct in regard to the subjects of the hypothec was an unum quid, and that it places him precisely in the same situation as if he had undertaken the liability which that conduct naturally inferred.

Without saying that every advice implies liability, there is sufficient to make the defender liable for the whole rent. The term "vitious intromission" may not be applicable to his conduct, for that properly applies to interference with the goods of a deceased person, but it was interference with the subjects of the hypothec to the prejudice of that right by a person who ought not to have so acted.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK was absent.

THE COURT adhered.

MAITLAND & LYON, W.S.—ALEXANDER MORISON, S.S.C.—GEORGE ANDREW, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 33.
Nov. 19, 1874.
Baird v. Mount.

ALEXANDER BAIRD, Pursuer.—Guthrie Smith—Mackintosh.
WILLIAM BRUCE MOUNT, Defender.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—J. P. B. Robertson.

Lease—Miscropping—Additional Rent—Receipt—Discharge.—Held that a landlord was barred from recovering additional rent for miscropping, which, by the lease, was payable at the same terms as the ordinary rents, in respect that the ordinary rents had been paid and settled, and receipts granted by him without reservation of further claim.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Gifford.
M.

THIS action was raised on 21st April 1874 by Alexander Baird of Ury against Mr William Bruce Mount, tenant of the farm of Castleton of Eassie. The defender held the farm under an assignation to a lease which expired at Martinmas 1873. This lease, after special stipulations as to cropping, bore that in case the tenant should deviate from the course of cropping prescribed he should "pay to the proprietor an additional rent of £5 for every imperial acre which shall be cropped differently from the rotation above laid down, during any year other than the last year of this lease; and if

No. 33.
Nov. 19, 1874.
Baird v. Mount.

the deviation shall take place during the last year of the lease, then the additional rent shall be at the rate of £10 for each imperial acre cropped differently from the rotation above provided, for, and that over and above the rent stipulated for the whole lands as aforesaid; and the said additional rent shall not be considered penal, or be subject to modification, but shall in each case be deemed the actual agreed on rent or value to be paid by the tenant for the benefit to be derived from the deviation; and even though there be consent by the proprietor or his factor to the departure from the rotation, the additional rent shall nevertheless be paid, nothing liberating the tenant but the written consent of the proprietor or his factor, agreeing in explicit words to the departure without payment of extra rent; and the additional rent shall in all cases be payable at the same terms as the ordinary rent before stipulated as aforesaid, commencing the first term's payment of such additional rent at the first of these terms after reaping the crop of the year in which a departure shall take place; and it shall continue to be paid year by year so long as the deviation shall subsist."

The pursuer alleged that the defender had deviated from the regulations as to cropping during the three last years of his lease, 1871, 1872, and 1873, and concluded for "(1) the sum of £45 sterling, which became payable in equal moieties at the terms of Candlemas and Lammas in the year 1872; (2) the sum of £180 sterling, which became payable in equal moieties at the terms of Candlemas and Lammas in the year 1873; and (3) the sum of £120 sterling, payable in equal moieties at the terms of Candlemas and Lammas in the year 1874, with the legal interest of each moiety of each of the said sums from the term at which it became or shall become payable as above set forth until payment."

The defender alleged that the mode in which he had cropped the ground was more beneficial than the mode prescribed in the lease. He further founded upon half-yearly receipts granted by the landlord for the rents of crops 1871 and 1872, and maintained that the landlord was barred from recovering anything more than the sums already paid. The receipts were thus expressed:—"Estates of Ury, Inshes, and Drumkilbo. Account of rent, &c., due by Mr William B. Mount, Castleton, at the term of Candlemas 1872:—

"To first half of rent, crop 1871, . . .	£446	15	1
"To fire insurance charges, ...	1	6	0
"Received payment,	£448	1	1

"D. & P. Dickson,
"Factors for the Proprietor."

Similar receipts were granted at Lammas 1872, and at Candlemas and Lammas 1873.

The defender pleaded;—2. The pursuer is barred from insisting in the present claim by mora, taciturnity, and acquiescence. 3. The pursuer cannot insist in the present action, in respect (1) he discharged the defender by the receipts granted, and his other actings; and (2) he approved of and acquiesced in the cultivation now complained of.

A proof was led, and thereafter the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Assoilzies the defender from the conclusions of the action, and decerns: Finds the defender entitled to expenses, and remits," &c.*

* "NOTE.—The question in this case is whether the pursuer is entitled to exact, and the defender bound to pay, penal but pactional extra rent, in respect the defender has 'deviated from the mode of cropping described and agreed upon' in the lease between the parties. The case involves several points of some difficulty and nicety.

No. 33.

Nov. 19, 1874. Baird v. Mount.

The pursuer reclaimed.

The defender admitted that he was bound to pay the landlord the stipulated extra rent for the ground which had been improperly cropped during the last year of the lease. He maintained, however, that any claim for the other two years was barred by the receipts granted by the landlord. He founded on the case of Hunter v. Broadwood, Feb. 2, 1854, 16 D. 441, 26 Scot. Jur. 295, and argued that the present

---

"The Lord Ordinary was favoured with an able and instructive argument as to how far pactional rent of a penal nature, such as that stipulated for in the present lease, was subject to equitable modification by the Court; and how far there was room for the equitable interposition of the Court to restrict the pursuer's claim. The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that, if the pursuer can clearly establish the contravention or miscropping, the Court has no power to restrict the liquidated or pactional damages which the parties themselves have fixed and ascertained under the name of additional rent. This doctrine seems to be quite established by a long series of decisions, both in this country and in England. (See the cases collected in Hunter on 'Landlord and Tenant,' vol. ii. p. 265, 3d editn. One of the leading cases is Miller v. Lord Gwydir, 26th May 1824, affd. H. L., 3d March 1826, 2 W. & S. 52; but there are many other cases to the same effect.) The principle is, that where the parties themselves have agreed upon and liquidated the damages, the Court cannot interfere to modify, for this would be setting aside the deliberate bargain of the parties themselves. The terms of the lease in the present case are exceedingly explicit, that the penal rent shall not be subject to modification, and although, notwithstanding such a clause, the inherent equitable power of the Court may not be excluded, and exceptional cases for interference may arise, the present does not seem one which can be made an exception from the general rule. (See Forrest and Barr v. Henderson, 26th Nov. 1869, 8 Macph. p. 187.)

"But while the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the pactional rent is not subject to modification by the Court, if it can be shewn that it has been really incurred, he feels that it is a demand of a highly penal nature, and great strictness must be applied in considering whether it has been really incurred or not. The whole proper rent stipulated in the lease has been paid. It was hardly pretended on the part of the pursuer that the defect in the amount of grass of a particular age, of which alone he complains, had led to injury anything like the penal rent claimed, and no attempt was made to prove actual damage from deficiency of grass. In short, it was conceded, at least in argument, that if the tenant was found liable it would be an exceedingly hard case; and no attempt was made to shew that the pursuer's demand was to any extent founded in equity. In such circumstances, and where the landlord's severe demand is founded on the precise words of the lease, he cannot complain if a strict interpretation is applied to that lease in ascertaining whether it supports his plea. In short, while the Court will not modify the penal rent, they will equitably consider whether penal rent at all has been incurred. Certainly on this last point equity is not excluded, but imperatively called for.

"Now, on considering the whole structure and terms of the lease, and applying them to the facts established in evidence, the Lord Ordinary has come to be of opinion, though not without difficulty, that the pursuer has failed in sufficiently establishing 'miscropping' in the fair sense of the lease, or that the defender has 'deviated from the mode of cropping above described and agreed on.'

. . . . . .

"There is some force in the defender's plea, founded on the discharges for rent. No doubt, the landlord's mere silence, or not stating objection, would not be enough; but, seeing that the penal rent is due year by year, and was not reserved when the ordinary rent was received and discharged, each discharge may fairly imply a passing from the penal claim. This defence was expressly sustained in Hunter v. Broadwood, 2d Feb. 1854, 16 D. 441; but, perhaps, there were specialties which may found a distinction. On the whole, the Lord Ordinary thinks that the landlord has failed to make good his claim."

No. 33.

Nov. 19, 1874.
Baird v. Mount.

case was stronger, as the receipts were formal receipts, whereas in Hunter v. Broadwood there were only payments initialed in a pass-book.

Argued for the pursuer;—A receipt was not an admission of the rights of the parties, but merely an acknowledgment of the payment of money. The landlord at the time he granted the receipts was ignorant that there had been miscropping, and was not barred, by granting the receipts, from making his claim, when he discovered that his tenant owed him the money. The tenant was not entitled to deviate without the written consent of the landlord, and so the landlord was entitled to assume that he was cultivating the farm according to the lease, until he came and asked his consent to deviate.

Lord President.—In this action the landlord claims additional rent for the three years, 1871, 1872, 1873, which were the last three years of the lease, and he does so on the ground that in each of them a mode of cropping was pursued which entitles him to make that claim. What he is suing for is not damages, but liquid rent, and the clause under which he sues is very stringent. It provides "that during the last three years of the lease there shall never be more than two-fifth parts of the whole lands let in crops of corn, nor less than two-fifth parts thereof in one or two year old grass, one-fifth at least being two years old, the remaining fifth part of the farm being to be in green crop, to which, and to the sowing down to grass corn crop, the whole manure made from the preceding crop shall be applied." And then, further, the tenant is bound, if he miscrops or violates the provision which I have just read, "not only immediately to restore such part of the lands as may be so miscropped to the rotation and course of cropping applicable thereto under this lease, but likewise to pay to the proprietor an additional rent of £5 for every imperial acre which shall be cropped differently from the rotation above laid down, during any year other than the last year of this lease: and if the deviation shall take place during the last year of the lease, then the additional rent shall be at the rate of £10 for each imperial acre cropped differently from the rotation above provided for, and that over and above the rent stipulated for the whole lands as aforesaid; and the said additional rent shall not be considered penal or be subject to modification, but shall in each case be deemed the actual agreed-on rent or value to be paid by the tenant for the benefit to be derived from the deviation; and even though there be consent by the proprietor or his factor to the departure from the rotation, the additional rent shall nevertheless be paid, nothing liberating the tenant but the written consent of the proprietor or his factor agreeing in explicit words to the departure without payment of extra rent."

This clause is very stringent, and it makes it quite clear that the payment demanded is rent, and nothing else. Now, for all the years except the last the rent has been paid and received in full; that is quite plain from the excerpts from the books which are before us; and it seems to me impossible, after the case of Hunter v. Broadwood, to hold that the landlord's claim for those years is not barred. With regard to the last year, it is practically conceded that there has been miscropping, and that the additional rent is due. In 1873 there was somewhat more grass than the required minimum, but the proportion of old grass to the whole was too small. Now, if it could have been shewn that this was an inevitable consequence of the tenant's rotation, and that that rotation was not illegal in terms of the lease, there might have been some justification for the tenant; but that is not the case. The simple fact is, that he breaks up the grass in order to put money into his own pocket by means of a corn crop. That is a clear case of violation of the lease, and it is impossible not to hold that the additional rent is due. I am therefore disposed to say that the tenant is liable for the miscropping of the last year, but not for the other years, on the ground that the rent for those years has been settled.

LORD DEAS.—I agree with your Lordship that the granting and acceptance of those receipts for the particular years' rents exclude the claim of the landlord for additional rent for these years. There can be no doubt that the additional rent stipulated for is pactional rent, and the effect is that it is not subject to modification as penal rent would be. But it differs from the regular rent in being payable in respect of deviation from the rules laid down in the lease. Unless the deviation occurs the additional rent is not due. In sustaining a claim for such additional rent it is necessary to see that this is not done in a way oppressive to the tenant. Suppose that the deviation had been beneficial to the landlord the pactional rent would have been due all the same. If then the landlord had allowed the deviation to go on for a number of years, knowing it to be beneficial, it would be hard to allow him to come forward at the end of the chapter, and exact the additional rent for these years. We cannot make a distinction between such a case and a case of injury to the landlord, and it therefore becomes necessary to deal with the claim on some general principle. It is quite reasonable that a landlord who has every opportunity of seeing and knowing what is going on on an agricultural farm should not be allowed to go back on the receipts he has granted for the full rent of a particular crop and year. It does not follow that the same principle would apply to a mineral lease, where the landlord has not the same opportunity of observation. But in this case I am of opinion with your Lordship that the claim for additional rent for the two first years is barred by the receipts granted by the landlord.

As to the last year I will only say that I think the tenant has been well advised in conceding that the landlord has a claim for that year.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—This estate is managed by a factor who had every opportunity of seeing how the farm was being cultivated. In that position the tenant is said to have incurred liability for pactional additional rent. The rent of each year is included in the receipt for each payment. If the pactional additional rent was payable along with the ordinary rent, and was due at the same time, it was necessarily then payable. Even if there was no authority on the point I should have no doubt that the receipt for the rent of the year discharged the whole rent then payable, whether pactional or ordinary. But the case of Hunter is an authority on the point. It is a decision pronounced under circumstances not more favourable to the tenant. Therefore I am of opinion that since the pactional rent is due and payable at the same time as the ordinary rent a receipt for the year's rent is a discharge of the whole.

The pursuer's counsel attempted to explain the receipts by saying that the factor intended to reserve the claim for pactional rent, and he referred to letters by the factor in August 1872 and February 1873 as shewing that the factor did so intend. But he must have forgotten that the factor when examined on oath stated that he did not know, till three months before he was examined, that there was any deviation from the terms of the lease. Now, as he was examined on 10th June 1874,—he first knew of the deviation about 10th March 1874,—

No. 33.
Nov. 19, 1874.
Baird v. Mount.

and did not know of it or mean to refer to it in August 1872, or in February 1873, the explanation cannot be accepted, and the receipts are without reservation. I have therefore no doubt that the landlord's claim for pactional rent for 1871 and 1872 is excluded by the receipts.

In regard to the last year of the lease I agree with your Lordship.

LORD MURE.—I concur with your Lordships. It appears to me upon the evidence that the tenant deliberately miscropped in the last year of his lease, and that his counsel have exercised a wise discretion in giving up that part of the case. But I am equally clear that, under the authority of the case of Hunter, the tenant is free from all claim for additional rent during the former years. The half year's receipts are for the whole rents for each of those years, and in none of them is there any reservation of any further claim; and I do not think that the letters which have been referred to, as shewing that intimation of the existence of some kind of claim was made, weaken the case of the tenant. The letter of the 8th of August 1872* is the one mainly relied on by the pursuer, and was evidently written about the time when one of the receipts was granted. If, therefore, it was then the pursuer's intention to claim the additional rent, the reservation ought to have been made in that and the subsequent receipts, and as that was not done the pursuer's claim for those years appears to me to be excluded.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall the said interlocutor: Find that the rents for the crops and years 1871 and 1872 were regularly paid and settled, and receipts granted therefor by the pursuer's factor in terms of the lease: Find that the pursuer is barred by such payment and settlement from now insisting in a claim for additional rent for the said years: Find that the defender violated the provisions of the lease by miscropping in the last year of the lease to the extent of twelve acres, at the rent of £10 per acre: Therefore decern against the defender for payment to the pursuer of £120 sterling, with interest at £5 per centum per annum on one-half thereof from Candlemas 1874 till payment, and with interest at said rate on the other half thereof from Lammas 1874 till payment: Quoad ultra assoilzie the defender."

HENRY & SHIRESS, S.S.C.—NEIL M. CAMPBELL, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 34.
Nov. 19, 1874.
Murray v. Countess of Rothes.

JOSEPH MURRAY, Pursuer.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Kinnear.
HENRIETTA ANDERSON MORSHEAD WALDEGRAVE LESLIE, Countess of Rothes, AND HUSBAND, Defenders.—D.-F. Clark—Adam.

Teinds—King's Annuity—Warrandice.—In 1632 the teinds of certain lands were sold by the titular to the heritor for a price, the heritor becoming bound to relieve the titular of the king's annuity of six per cent, and of all taxations to be imposed on the teinds, and of the stipend then payable,—the titular becoming bound to warrant the teinds free from all future augmentations. In 1644 the heritor redeemed the king's annuity, and about 1674 these annuities were relinquished by the Crown throughout the country. In 1812 the whole teinds were exhausted by augmentations, including the portion which, in 1632, was payable as king's annuity.

* In this letter the factor called the tenant's attention to the obligations in the lease, particularly as to the management of the land, keeping up of buildings, fences, &c. and added, "some of these have been undoubtedly neglected by you."

No. 34.

Nov. 19, 1874.
Murray v. Countess of Rothes.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Shand.

In a question between the representatives of the titular and the heritor, held (rev. judgment of Lord Shand) that the warrandice against augmentations of stipend extended to the whole teinds, including that portion which, in 1632, was payable as king's annuity.

IN 1632 John Aytoune of Aytoune, then proprietor of the lands of Glenduckie, in the parish of Flisk and county of Fife, with advice and consent of Andrew Aytoune of Logie, acquired right to the teinds of these lands from the Earl of Rothes, the titular, for payment of 2000 merks Scots. A contract of alienation and disposition was entered into by the parties, whereby the Earl of Rothes conveyed to John Aytoune the teinds of his lands of Glenduckie "to be haldin of our said sowerane Lord and his successors in frie blench for the yeirlie payment to his Matie and his successors of ane pennie usuall monie of this realme, togidder withe the annuitie dew to his Matie and his successors for the foirsaids teinds, personage and wiccarage, of the lands and utheres particularlie abone mentionat, according to the present valuatioune thairof." * . . . . . "And relevand, the said Nobill Erle and his abone writtine, lykas ye said Johne Aytoune and ye said Mr Andrew Aytoun, takand burden upoun him for ye said Johne Aytoune, bind and obleis them and thair foirsaids to releuve the said Noble Erle and his abone wreittine of the samen annueties and of all taxatiounes to be imposed upoune the teinds of the said parochin proportionablie and pro rata effeirand to the reat and quantetie of the foirsaids teinds of the lands and utheres particularlie abone mentionat, and pnt. waluation of the samen;" . . . . . "and in lyke maner the said Johne Aytoune and his foirsaids payand lykas the said John Aytoune, and the said Mr Andro Aytoune takand the burdein upoun him for the said Johne Aytoune, bind and obleis them and thair foifsaids to pay to the minister serving the cuir at the said Kirk of Flisk and his successors serving the cuir thairat, in pairt of payment of thair stipend for thair service of the cuir at the said Kirk, ane chalder wictuall of the qualiteis following, viz., thairof ten bollis aitis four bolls halff boll beir and sex firlottis quheit betwix the feist of Zuill and Candilmis, and fyftie merkis monie foirsaid at the terme of Whitsunday,"—(being the amount of stipend localled on the lands of Glenduckie at the date of the deed); . . . . "and to releiwe the said Noble Erle and his foirsaids of the foirsaid pairt of the said minister's stipend." . . . . . "Qlkis translatioune dispositioune and resignatioune rexive abone writtin the said Noble Erle binds and obleises him, his aires and successors qtsumewir, to warrand, acquyit, and defend to the said Johne Aytoune and his abone wreittin fra all factis and deids doine be the said Noble Erle or anie of his predicessors, or done or to be done be him, his aires or successors, or be qtsumewir persones prowydit or to be prowydit to the said Kirk of Flisk, personag and wiccarage, yrof." . . . . . "And lykewayes, the said Noble Erle binds and obleises him and his abone wreittin to warrand, freithe, reliewe and skaitheles keipe the said Johne Aytoune of that ilk and his foirsaids of the remanant of the said ministeres stipend remaining owir and abone the foirsaid chalder wictuall and fyftie merkis monie appoyntit to be payit be the said Johne Aytoune and his abone wreittin; and lykwayes of all utheres impositiones imposeit or to be imposeit upoun the teinds of the said parochin, ather for augmentatione of the said ministeres stipend or to anie vther use qtsumewir (except the annueteis and taxationes abone speit, of the foirsaids teinds of the particular lands abone mentionat,

* The lands were valued by decree of approbation, dated 17th February 1632, at fifteen chalders victual for stock and parsonage teind, and five merks for the vicarage teind.

No. 34.

Nov. 19, 1874. Murray v. Countess of Rothes.

appoyntit to be payit be the said Johne Aytoun and his abone wreittin in maner abone expremit), and of all cost, skaithe, dampnaige, and expenses, and interes that the said Johne Aytoune and his successors and utheres foirsaids sall happin to sustein and incur throw thair not thankfull and tymous releiff yrof."

By the Act 1633, c. 15, it was provided that the king's annuity out of the teinds should be disposable according to His Majesty's pleasure, and, accordingly, on 7th May 1642, King Charles I. made a grant of it to John Earl of Loudon, with power and warrant to him to sell and dispose of it. In terms of this grant the Earl of Loudon, in 1644, sold to John Aytoune of Aytoune the king's annuity, payable out of his lands of Glenduckie, for payment of £300 Scots, and payment of the annuity out of these lands thereafter ceased. The exaction of the king's annuity was voluntarily departed from throughout Scotland generally towards the close of the seventeenth century.

In 1723 Patrick Murray, the pursuer's ancestor, bought the lands of Glenduckie and the teinds thereof from Ayton of Ayton.

As stipulated in the deed of 1632 John Aytoune and his successors paid the proportion of stipend to the minister of Flisk localled on the teinds of the lands of Glenduckie. No augmentation of stipend was granted to the minister of Flisk till 1763. But in 1763, in 1794, and 1812, augmentations were granted, the latter of which exhausted the teind of the parish.

Murray of Glenduckie, founding on the deed of 1632, claimed relief from the Earl of Rothes of the amount of augmented stipend modified in 1763 and localled upon Glenduckie in 1764. The Earl, in 1767, redeemed this claim by a payment of £112 sterling. Murray's claim of relief of augmentation of stipend under the augmentations of 1794 and 1812 was settled after mutual actions and a long accounting by payment in 1834 of £289, 15s. 11d. by the Countess of Rothes to Mr Murray in full of all claims up to that date.

From 1834 to 1871 the Countess of Rothes made regular payment of the various sums of augmented stipend, but in 1872 she refused to make further payment on the same footing, alleging that the previous payments in relief from 1812 onwards were made in error, and in ignorance that credit had not been given to her and her predecessors for the amount of the king's annuity.

She stated that in any view she was only bound to relieve the pursuer of the amount of the valued teind under deduction of the king's annuity, which amounted to six per cent of the value of the teind.

This action was raised on the clause of warrandice in the deed of 1632 to recover the amount of stipend localled upon the lands of Glenduckie, over and above what was payable under the decree of locality of 19th December 1764.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) By the contract of alienation and disposition above mentioned, the Earl of Rothes, granter thereof, and his heirs and successors, became bound and liable in payment of relief as now concluded for. (5) The defender and her predecessors having by repeated acts recognised and acknowledged their liability under the said obligation to the pursuer and his predecessors are now barred from disputing the same.

The defender pleaded;—(1) This case ought to be sisted until the amount of stipend truly payable out of the said valued teind is legally ascertained and adjusted. (2) The defender is only bound to relieve the pursuer of the amount of stipend alleged to have been paid by him, under deduction of the amount of the king's annuity.

No. 34.

Nov. 19, 1874.
Murray v. Countess of Rothes.

The Lord Ordinary, on 17th August 1874, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Repels the first plea in law for the defenders, sustains the second plea stated by them, and appoints the cause to be enrolled for further procedure, if necessary: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses." *

* "NOTE.—The defender, the Countess of Rothes, has since 1872 disputed her liability to relieve the pursuer to the full extent demanded, maintaining that, in so far as the augmentation of 1812 has created a charge on that part of the teinds formerly payable as king's annuity, the pursuer is bound to bear the burden himself. The present action has been raised to try this question, and the pursuer's grounds of action are—(1) that by the contract of 1632, and (2) by the contract and long usage on it, the defenders are bound to relieve him of the whole augmentation of 1812, including that part which exhausts the amount formerly payable out of the teinds as king's annuity.

"It may be here mentioned that in 1644 the pursuer's predecessor, John Aytoune, the heritor of the lands, bought up the claim for the king's annuity by a transaction with his Majesty's commissioner, John Earl of Loudon; for a payment of £300 Scots he obtained a conveyance and discharge of all claim for the king's annuity payable from the teinds of various lands belonging to him, including the lands of Glenduckie, from the year 1630, and in all time coming. It appears to me that this transaction, to which the titular was no party, and in which I think he had no interest, cannot in any way affect the question raised in this case; and I am of opinion, on the merits of that question, that the pursuer is not entitled to relief to the extent he asks, but that the defenders are right in their contention that the pursuer must himself bear the burden of the augmentation of 1812 to the extent of the amount formerly payable as king's annuity.

"An account of the origin and history of the king's annuity payable out of teinds is given by Sir John Connell in his Treatise on Tithes, vol. i., p. 265, et seq., and p. 313, under reference to the Acts and documents there mentioned, some of which are printed in the appendix. It is sufficient here to say that the revocation by Charles I. of the grants in favour of Lords of Erection was enforced to the effect of the king's insisting on receiving an annuity out of all teinds liable to the burden of supporting the clergy, excepting the part then actually paid to the ministers in name of stipend for serving the cure, and to colleges, hospitals, and other pious uses. The Act 1633, cap. 15, ratifies the Acts of the commissioners of 1627 and 1631, fixing the amount of the annuity at six per cent on the amount of the teind liable to augmentation of stipend; and the right was enforced at least until 1674, if not to a later date, as appears from the memorial amongst the Blair-Drummond MSS., dated in 1688, forming No. 76 of the appendix to Sir John Connell's work, from which document it also appears that about one-half of the heritors liable in the annuity took advantage of the opportunity given to them of purchasing the king's right, and getting the annuity conveyed to them and the claim discharged. From the decree of the commissioners, dated in 1632 (the date of the agreement in question), forming No. 74 of the appendix just mentioned, it appears to have been determined that so long as the heritor paid his valued teind to the titular the king's annuity was payable by the titular, but that after the heritor bought his teinds he became liable in payment of the annuity as one of the burdens to which they were liable.

"The annuity was thus a burden on the teinds, and payable out of the teinds for the heritor who had acquired right to them; and the obligation undertaken by the heritor in the agreement of 1632, by which the present case is to be determined, was so far in accordance with the ordinary rule.

"The heritor is only entitled to relief from the titular of future burdens on the teinds, in so far as the obligation has been expressly undertaken by the titular in granting the conveyance, and the clause of warrandice contains the obligation of relief, which is said to impose the liability sought to be declared and enforced. That clause follows various other clauses, providing that the heritor shall pay, inter alia, the king's annuity and the existing stipend, and

No. 34.

Nov. 19, 1874.

Murray v. Countess of Rothes.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—The king's annuity was never intended to interfere or compete with the minister's stipend. It originated the obligation on the titular is to warrant, free, relieve, and skaithless keep the heritor 'of ye remanent of ye said minister's stipend,' over and above the stipend then payable, and of all other impositions on the teinds, either for augmentation of stipend, or for any other use whatever, 'except ye annuities and taxations above specified,' being the king's annuity, and the stipend then payable. The clause of warrandice thus, in terms, excepts these two burdens on the teinds. It extends merely to the remainder of the teinds after these burdens have been deducted, and it is only reasonable to assume that the price paid for the teinds was estimated on the footing that the titular's obligation could not, in any event, be extended beyond that of warranting the remainder of the teinds, as thus defined, to be free from future burden.

"If this be the true construction of the clause just noticed, or the true meaning of the transaction which forms the subject of the agreement, as that transaction is to be ascertained from the deed as a whole, there is, I think, an end of the pursuer's claim to the relief demanded, for he is here claiming relief, not on account of burdens imposed on the remainder of the teind, after deducting the king's annuity, but of a burden imposed on that part of the teind formerly payable as annuity, and which was, when so payable, a burden on the heritor without any claim of relief. Taking the case as if the liability for annuity had not been brought up, and assuming that shortly after the date of the agreement the minister's stipend had been augmented so as to exhaust the whole teind, including the amount payable as annuity, I cannot see any good reason for the heritor demanding relief of the whole augmentation without crediting the amount of the annuity. The clause of warrandice applies, I think, in express terms to the remainder only of the teind after deducting the amount of the annuity. It expressly excepts the annuity, and if the minister, in place of the king, came to have right to that part of the teind, this was a change only in the creditor, to whom the heritor must make the payment for which he alone was liable, and for which he had no claim of relief. It did not enlarge the heritor's obligation, for he had just to pay to the minister what he was formerly bound to pay to the king; and I think it would have been against both the letter and the spirit of the agreement of 1632, and unjust to the titular, that his obligation should be enlarged, and the liability of the heritor diminished, from the mere circumstance that the king's annuity was no longer payable as such, but as stipend to the minister.

"It was not maintained in the argument for the pursuer that the heritor could have been at any time compelled to pay more than the full amount of his teind. If the whole teind was allocated to the minister it is not said that the annuity also would have been payable; either the annuity must have ceased, or the stipend must have been restricted by the extent of the annuity, for the owner of the teinds could not be required to pay any part of his teind twice over. Had the king's annuity been of the nature of a fine, or a premium paid by the heritor, in order that he might obtain an indisputable title to his teinds, the case would have been different, and the whole teind might have been liable to stipend notwithstanding payment of the annuity; but the annuity was really part of the teind.

"I am not aware of any direct authority on the question, whether after the Act 1633, c. 15, the benefice had a valid claim to the whole teind, preferable to the king's annuity, so that future augmentations would supersede and extinguish the annuity. The memorial already referred to (Connell, II., Appendix, p. 234) contains a statement that the king's annuity was, unlike the rest of the teind, free of future burdens. If the question had been raised, however, I think that it must have been held, in accordance with the general principles stated by the majority of the Judges in the case of Prestonkirk, February 1808 (Connell, II. Appendix, p. 313), that the teinds must, if necessary, be wholly applied for the benefit of the minister, and that the annuity must in that case cease; and this view is strongly confirmed by the circumstance that in the origin of the right i

No. 34.

Nov. 19, 1874.
Murray v. Countess of Rothes.

in the compromise which followed Charles First's attempt to resume the grants made to the Lords of Erection. It was enacted by 1633, c. 15, approving various Acts of the commissioners, "That his majestie and his successors shall have the constant rent and dutie following paid out of the teind bolls of victual, and out of the bodie of the rest of the teinds of the kingdome redacted in money" . . . . . "except the teind bolls and silver paid to ministers in name of stipend for serving the cure." . . . . . "And that, according to the true and just prices of the victual in ilk part of the country, compting for ilk hundred marks of the prices of the said victual being redacted in money six marks for his Majestie's annuitie." The king's annuity was therefore a burden on the Lords of Erection only, and not on the minister's stipend.[1]

But apart from this the claim of the minister for stipend is a para-

---

was limited only to that part of the teinds not at the time applicable to stipend or other pious uses.

"However this may be, and whether the king's claim or the minister's claim was preferable, it is, I think, clear that both could not exist so as to make the heritor liable for more than his whole teind. This being so, if the annuity was preferable, then the heritor should have resisted any part of the augmentation being localled on that part of his teind which was, or had been, liable to annuity, and his failure to do so cannot throw an additional burden on the titular. If, on the other hand, all right to the annuity would cease by the whole teind being allocated as stipend, the heritor must, I think, pay the amount of the annuity to the minister in place of the king, and I see no just reason for compelling the titular to relieve him of this, which was all along his burden.

"The heritor's purchase in 1644 of the right to the king's annuity cannot, I think, make any difference on the result. If the king's right, like the heritor's right, to his surplus teind, was liable to be extinguished by future augmentations for the benefit of the cure, as I think it was, the purchase of the annuity was the acquisition of what might turn out to be a temporary advantage only. The price given was probably estimated in that view, and the burden actually ceased from 1630 till 1812. In the same way the right to teinds was acquired by heritors at nine years' purchase only of their free teind, because of the liability of that teind to future burdens, and in most instances a temporary advantage only was gained, as future augmentations were from time to time the cause of an increasing charge, which in many instances has now exhausted the whole teind.

"Holding, as I do, on the grounds now explained, that there is no obligation on the titular, under the deed of 1632, to grant the relief asked, I am further of opinion that nothing has occurred in the actings of the parties which has imposed the obligation. There have been no judicial proceedings in which the question was ever raised for determination. It is true that in a settlement of the heritors' claims in 1834, embracing the period from 1812 to that date, the titular in error paid the whole augmented stipend, and omitted to deduct the annuity, and that the same error was repeated in the different settlements from 1834 till 1872. The defenders probably have no claim to repetition of the sums for which they should have claimed deduction at the time, but I see no grounds whatever which preclude them from requiring the mistake to be corrected in future, and from disputing the existence of any obligation on their part to relieve the pursuer to the full extent claimed. Long usage following on a contract, particularly a contract of old date, is often most important, as giving a contemporaneous exposition of the meaning of parties in a deed which is expressed in obscure and ambiguous terms. There is nothing of the kind here. The contract is not in any view ambiguous in its terms; and the usage is, comparatively speaking, recent. Such usage cannot, I think, create an obligation which did not previously exist."

[1] 1 Connell, 2d ed. pp. 265, et seq., and 313; and 2 Connell, Ap. No. 41, p. 85, No. 74, p. 228, and No. 76, p. 233.

No. 34.

Nov. 19, 1874. Murray v. Countess of Rothes.

mount claim in whosesoever hands the teinds are.[1] It was clear therefore (1) That the king's annuity did not affect the minister's stipend. (2) That its amount was to be ascertained by taking six per cent of the teind that remained over after paying the minister's stipend reduced to a money value. Accordingly, when the free teind was diminished by an augmentation being laid upon it, the subject burdened by the king's annuity was diminished, and consequently the annuity itself diminished. This process might go on, as it had done in the present case, until both the subject burdened and the annuity itself vanished.

But even if it were held that the king's annuity, so far as this case was concerned, was six per cent of the free teind, as at the date of the arrangement in 1632, still the parties to that arrangement acquired mutual rights and undertook mutual risks. The one acquired right to the teinds and undertook the burden of the king's annuity, and the risk of any other such tax that might be laid upon the teinds. He was entitled to the benefit of the king's annuity having been redeemed and relinquished. The other obtained a price paid down, and undertook the risk of augmentations of stipend. What had actually happened was fairly within that risk, and he must now accept the consequences. In any view, the defender having transacted on the footing that this was the true construction of the agreement, from 1812 to 1871, and having even done so judicially, it was now too late for him to come forward and plead that the construction was erroneous.

Argued for the respondent;—In 1632 Mr Aytoune undertook, in terms of the contract founded on, the existing burdens of stipend and of king's annuity. The Earl of Rothes undertook the burden of future augmentations of stipend. The question therefore was, what were, at that date, the existing burdens, on the one hand, and the possible augmentations, on the other. Mr Aytoune got the free teinds after deducting the existing stipend and the king's annuity. Of that the Earl of Rothes granted warrandice, but of no more. Mr Aytoune was entitled to redeem the king's annuity, but if he did so he took the risk of its ultimately being localled on in his hands for augmentation. He could not thereby increase the measure of the Earl's warranty, which remained as in 1632, the transaction between Mr Aytoune and the Crown being one to which he was no party, and which had no connection with that of 1632.[2] Moreover the king's annuity was not originally, or at the date of the contract of 1632, subject to stipend. Mr Aytoune only made it so by redeeming it. Had it remained king's annuity and the Crown's claim not been relinquished, as it was voluntarily about the end of the seventeenth century, it never could have been localled on for stipend. Like bishops' teind in the hands of the Crown, it was not affectable by the minister's right to stipend. It was, by 1633, c. 15, a constant rent or annuity not to go on diminishing as contended for by the pursuer, and there was no exception of future augmentations of stipend.[3]

At advising,—

Lord Justice-Clerk.—This case presents considerable difficulty. The question raised is whether, under the terms of the contract entered into in 1632 by [1] Wemyss v. Macqueen (Prestonkirk case), Mor. App. voce Stipend, No. 6, and H. of L., May 20, 1808, 5 Pat. 210; Mitchell v. Officers of State (Dingwall case), May 22, 1789, 3 Pat. 140; Milligan v. Wedderburn (Kirkdean case), July 8, 1784, 2 Pat. 621.

[2] Spottiswoode v. Ker Seymer, March 2, 1853, 15 D. 458, 25 Scot. Jur. 284.

[3] Stair, 2, 8, 35; 1 Connell, 271; and 2 Connell, App. No. 40, p. 77; Submission printed in 5 Thomson's Acts, 193.

No. 34.

Nov. 19, 1874.
Murray v. Countess of Rothes.

Lord Rothes on the one part, and Aytoune of Aytoune on the other, Lord Rothes became bound absolutely to relieve Mr Aytoune, the disponee, of all future augmentations of stipend to the minister. The Lord Ordinary has found in effect that the representative of Lord Rothes is not bound to relieve Mr Aytoune's successor of a part of the augmentation equivalent to the old king's annuity. In other words, he has found that the obligation to relieve only extends to ninety-four per cent of the teinds, which were conveyed to the disponee. The ground of judgment seems substantially to be this, that the disposition did not truly extend to give the disponee right to the six per cent of the teinds of which the king's annuity consisted, or at least that the obligation of warrandice did not extend beyond the other ninety-four per cent.

The nature of the deed of 1632, though complex in form, is simple enough in substance. Lord Rothes, as one of the Lords of Erection, held the teinds of the parish of Flisk. In 1611 he granted a tack of the teinds to Sir Alexander Seytoune, and the next day, for some unexplained reason, he took an assignation to himself of this tack from Sir Alexander. After narrating this tack and assignation, and assigning the tack so far as it included the teinds of the lands of Glenduckie, the deed then dispones to Mr Aytoune of Aytoune, the heritor, the whole teinds of these lands of Glenduckie. Then follow corresponding obligations of relief, the first on the part of the disponee in favour of the disponer, and the second on the part of the disponer in favour of the disponee. Upon the true construction of these obligations of relief the present question depends.

The disponee undertakes to relieve the disponer of the existing minister's stipend, of the king's annuity, and of all taxations to be imposed upon the teinds of the parish, proportionally to the existing valuation of the teinds of the lands so disponed. Now, the king's annuity was an exaction of six per cent on the teinds in the hands of the Lords of Erection, and had been accepted by King Charles I. as a compromise with them instead of altogether resuming the teinds granted out to them. It is quite clear that the annuity was not intended to prejudice in any case the minister's stipend. It was intended to be laid on the lay titulars only, and to affect only the part of the teinds remaining in their hands after payment of stipend. Negotiations were going on between the Crown and the titulars in 1632, which took the shape of the Act of Parliament in the following year which constituted or recognised the annuity. Accordingly it is manifest that it was with a view to these proceedings that the disponer in this deed stipulated for relief of the annuity of six per cent, and of any other taxation which might afterwards be imposed on the titular as Crown donatary.

On the other hand, the disponer comes under an obligation to relieve the disponee of all subsequent imposition on the teinds for augmentation of the minister's stipend, or other uses, except the annuity and taxations above mentioned. Now, that obligation is unlimited in extent, with the exception referred to. The state of facts which followed on this disposition was, that the disponee enjoyed his own teinds under burden only of the minister's stipend, as localled at the date of the disposition and of the king's annuity. I doubt whether the king's annuity was very generally exacted. But it seems to have been paid by Aytoune, and to have been redeemed or purchased up by him in 1644, and about 1674 to have fallen into general desuetude. From 1644, and for more than a century and a half, Mr Aytoune and his successors had full right to these teinds, under burden only of the minister's stipend as it stood at 1632, and had been relieved by the representative of the disponer of the augmentations awarded from time to time. But in 1812 the minister obtained an augmentation which exhausted not only the ninety-four per cent of the teind, but the whole teind. From that time forward for sixty years the Countess of Rothes or her predecessors have relieved the proprietors of Glenduckie of the whole amount of the augmentation. But in 1872 it was suggested that the minister had no right to draw stipend out of the six per cent which represented the king's annuity, or at any rate that Mr Murray, Aytoune's successor, was not entitled to be relieved of the proportion of augmentation which was composed of this six per cent.

No. 34.

Nov. 19, 1874.
Murray v. Countess of Rothes.

The first point was very faintly maintained, and I am quite satisfied that the contrary assumption is the true one, namely, that the minister is entitled to exhaust the whole teind by augmentation, notwithstanding the king's annuity.

The second question presents the only real difficulty in the case, Did the obligation of relief in the deed extend to the whole teind, including the proportion which, if the annuity had continued to be exacted, would have gone to the king? Now, I think a considerable amount of confusion has crept into the argument in this case, from not properly distinguishing between the obligation by Aytoune to relieve Lord Rothes of king's annuity, and the obligation by Lord Rothes to relieve Aytoune of augmentation.

It is quite clear that the first obligation never came into play, for no demand was ever made against the Earl of Rothes or his successors for king's annuity. They were never distressed for it, and therefore had no opportunity for having recourse upon Aytoune and his successors under their obligation of relief. But with regard to the second obligation of relief, I take the words to mean what they plainly bear, "I am to relieve you of any claim on the part of the minister to augmentation of stipend, but not of any claim on the part of the Crown." Now, does the claim here made fall under the designation of a claim on the part of the minister for augmentation of stipend, or of a claim on the part of the Crown? Clearly, I think, of the former. The argument was ingeniously put to us that the heritor never obtained right from the titular to the six per cent of the teinds representing the king's annuity; that this six per cent did not enter into the transaction between them; that if the heritor is now in right of it, it is because he has purchased it from the Crown; and therefore that the titular's obligation of relief does not extend to the last six per cent of the teind. I cannot accept this argument as sound. There is nothing either in the words or the spirit of the agreement which imports any limitation. It is impossible to read the agreement but as a complete conveyance of the whole teind, and the clause in question as other than an absolute and unreserved obligation to relieve the heritor of augmentations of stipend. I am therefore for altering the judgment of the Lord Ordinary.

Lords Neaves, Ormidale, and Gifford concurred.

The Court pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall said interlocutor, and decern in terms of the conclusions of the summons, in so far as regards the obligation of relief," &c.

Murray & Falconer, W.S.—Tods, Murray, & Jamieson, W.S.—Agents.

PROCTOR AND SONS, Pursuers and Respondents.—Asher.
JOHN COWAN, Defender and Appellant.—Rhind.

No. 34/a.

Nov. 20, 1874.
Cowan v. Proctor.

Process—Fee-Fund Dues—Appeal—Joint Minute.—Before an appeal from the Sheriff-court had been heard the parties compromised the case by a joint minute. Held that the minute was not to be regarded as a first step for the respondent in the sense of the Act 1 and 2 Vict. c. 118, regulating fee-fund dues, and that a 2s. 6d. stamp was sufficient.

THIS was an appeal from the Sheriff-court of Forfarshire of a final judgment under the Court of Session Act, 1868. The appellant duly boxed and lodged a print of the appeal, record, and proof, and affixed thereon stamps denoting 15s. Each of the parties afterwards printed, boxed, and lodged an appendix, on each of which a 2s. 6d. stamp only was affixed. Before the case was heard the parties, having compromised the case, lodged a MS. joint minute consenting to decree, which was signed by counsel for both the parties, and tendered to the Clerk of Court, with a fee-fund stamp of 2s. 6d. thereon, which minute he declined to receive as not sufficiently stamped, in respect that it was a first step for the respondent, for which the fee was 12s. 6d.*

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Forfarshire. M.

The Court held that the joint minute could not be regarded as a first step for the respondent in the sense of the schedule of the Act 1 and 2 Vict. c. 118, and that a 2s. 6d. stamp, was sufficient.

MACLACHLAN & RODGER, W.S.—WILLIAM OFFICER, S.S.C.—Agents.

WILLIAM MACKIE, Pursuer and Respondent.—Paterson.
DAVID RIDDELL, Defender and Appellant.—Mackintosh.

No. 35.

Nov. 20, 1874.
Mackie v. Riddell.

Compensation—Liquid and Illiquid—Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, 19 and 20 Vict. c. 60, sec. 5—Express warranty.—In an action for payment of the price of goods the defender admitted the debt, but pleaded compensation in respect of a counter claim of damages arising out of a separate transaction, which was disputed by the pursuer. Held that the defender was not entitled to plead compensation in respect of the illiquid claim of damages.

Sale—Express warranty—Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856.—Observed (per Lord President), that the Mercantile Law Amendment Act requires warranty to be express, and to prove an express warranty it is not enough for witnesses to say that the goods were warranted. They must specify the terms in which the warranty was granted.

THIS was an action brought in the Sheriff-court of Stirling and Dumbarton shires by William Mackie against David Riddell, concluding for payment "of the sum of £30, 15s., being the price of three stots sold by the pursuer to the defender on or about the 1st day of February 1873."

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Stirling and Dumbarton. M.

The defender did not dispute his liability for the price. He averred that the pursuer, on 15th September 1872, sold to him, for £52, 10s., a two-year-old filly, and warranted it as sound, and that the animal having turned out to be unsound he received from the pursuer authority to dispose of it to the best advantage, and he, the pursuer, would "stand" the greater part of the loss sustained; and that, at the time the stots were

* The Act 1 and 2 Vict. c. 118 (schedule of fees), sets forth, as the fees payable for proceedings in the Inner-House, inter alia, "Original petitions, and petitions and complaints, or any other writ or step by which a cause is originated, as also answers thereto or other first step for a respondent or other party, each paper, printed, 15s., written, 12s. 6d."

No. 35.
Nov. 20, 1874.
Mackie v. Riddell.

purchased by him from the pursuer, it was agreed that he should be allowed to retain the said loss sustained by him at the payment of the price of the same.

The defender further averred that he had resold the filly, sustaining a loss of £12, 10s., and pleaded compensation to that amount, offering to pay the balance of the sum concluded for, amounting to £18, 5s.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) In the circumstances above set forth, the defender is not entitled to plead compensation; and his statement of facts and pleas in law being irrelevant, unfounded in fact, and untenable in law, ought to be repelled. Separatim, (2) No warranty having been given with said filly, the defender has no claim against the pursuer for repetition of the price, or any portion thereof.

The Sheriff-substitute (Steele) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Allows the pursuer a proof of his averments prout de jure, and the defender a counter proof, including therein a proof of the defender's averments."

The Sheriff (Blackburn), on appeal, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recalls the interlocutor appealed against, and, before answer, allows the defender a proof of his averments, and to the pursuer a conjunct probation."

A proof was then led before the Sheriff-substitute. The evidence chiefly related to the sale of the filly by the pursuer to the defender, and to the question of its soundness or unsoundness. The pursuer and the defender were the only persons present at the sale, and their evidence was contradictory.

The Sheriff-substitute pronounced an interlocutor on the proof, which, after detailed findings, concluded—"Decerns against the defender in terms of the conclusions of the summons, but under deduction of the said sum of £12, 10s., with corresponding interest thereon: Finds the pursuer liable in expenses."

On appeal the Sheriff pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the defender has failed to prove that at the time of the sale of the filly, in September 1872, the pursuer granted an express warranty of her soundness, or that at that time she was unsound: Finds that, in February 1873, the defender purchased from the pursuer the stots libelled, at the price of £30, 15s.: Therefore recalls the interlocutor appealed against, and decerns against the defender for the said sum of £30, 15s., together with interest thereon as libelled: Finds the pursuer entitled to expenses," &c.*

The defender appealed.[1]

LORD PRESIDENT.—This action has been brought to recover "the sum of £30, 15s., being the price of three stots sold by the pursuer to the defender on or

---

* "NOTE.—A purchaser intending to rely on an express warranty, must either have it in writing, or take care to have evidence sufficient to prove the fact and terms of the warranty.

"In this case the only two persons present when the warranty is said to have been given are at variance on the fact; and while, on the one hand, there are some points on which the Sheriff-substitute strongly founds in his note, which may lead to the belief that the defender was conscious that the filly was unsound when he sold her, and that he had warranted her, there is, on the other hand, the fact that the defender did not, as averred in his defence, at the time of the purchase of the stots, stipulate that he was to be allowed to retain the loss sustained by him on the filly out of the price of the stots. On the contrary, it is proved that he did not make any such stipulation, and abstained from making any such claim until he had got possession of the stots from the pursuer."

[1] Scottish North-Eastern Railway v. Napier, March 10, 1859, 21 D. 700, 31 Scot. Jur. 350; M'Leay v. Rose, July 8, 1826, 4 S. 812 (N. E. 819).

No. 35.

Nov. 20, 1874.
Mackie v. Riddell.

about 1st February 1873, and taken delivery of by him on or about the 11th of said month." The sale and delivery are admitted, and it is further admitted that the defender has not made payment, and therefore that the pursuer's demand is well founded. But the defender pleads compensation arising out of a claim of damages. The amount of damages claimed is £12, 10s. The pursuer adds this additional plea—"1. In the circumstances above set forth the defender is not entitled to plead compensation." In my opinion the Sheriff-substitute ought at once to have sustained this plea. The pursuer's claim being admitted, and the defender's counter claim being entirely illiquid and requiring to be constituted in an ordinary action, there can be no compensation between two such claims. The case of the North-Eastern Railway is on all fours with the present. The law was placed in that case on a satisfactory footing. Therefore I am of opinion that everything that was done in the Sheriff-court since the record was closed is irregular, and must be swept away.

But as the parties are here it will only be kind to them to state my opinion on the question of warranty. I am clearly of opinion that warranty has not been proved, and it is quite plain that it never can be proved, because the only persons present were the pursuer and defender, and they are at variance on the facts. The observation of the Sheriff, with which he begins his note, is a very good one, and I entirely agree with him—"A purchaser intending to rely on an express warranty must either have it in writing or take care to have evidence sufficient to prove the terms of the warranty." The Mercantile Law Amendment Act requires an express warranty, and to prove an express warranty it is not enough for witnesses to say that the goods were warranted. They must specify the terms in which the warranty was granted. Therefore the claim must fail on its own merits if it were before us.

LORD DEAS.—The claim on which this action is founded is not what is called a liquid claim in the correct sense in which bonds, bills, and leases constitute liquid claims. But it is admitted on record that the three stots libelled were sold and delivered to the defender in the action, at the price of £30, 15s., and that the price has not been paid. The defender avers that on a previous occasion the pursuer had sold him a filly at the price of £52, 10s., which was paid; that the filly turned out to be unsound, and was sold at a loss of £12, 10s., which the pursuer, on the occasion of the sale of the stots, agreed to allow the defender to retain from the price, leaving a balance of £18, 5s., which the defender had all along been willing to pay. This agreement was the only thing relevant to be proved in defence of the action. I am of opinion that the agreement has not been proved, and that being so we have just an admitted claim of debt on the one side and an illiquid claim of damages on the other. This leaves the case on all fours with the case of the North-Eastern Railway v. Napier.

I may add, however, so as not to encourage further litigation, that if we were to go into the rest of the proof I should agree with your Lordship that there was clearly nothing at the sale of the filly which amounted to a warranty of soundness.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I agree with your Lordship on the first point. In the case of the Scottish North-Eastern Railway v. Napier your Lordship observed—"The defence, therefore, was entirely based on the counter claim, and the pursuers replied by this plea, that the account libelled being admitted, while the alleged counter claim, arising on a previous transaction between the parties, was matter of dispute, the defender could not plead the latter as a set off against the pursuer's liquid ground of debt. I think this plea is well founded." I am of the same opinion. The only way the defender tries to escape from paying his debt is by stating a counter claim,—"The defender received authority from him to dispose of the said filly to the best advantage, and he, the pursuer, would 'stand' the greater part of the loss sustained; and at the time the stots were purchased by the defender from the pursuer he was to be allowed to retain the said loss sustained by him at the payment of the price of the same." The statement would require to be more definite and specific if effect were to be given to it, and if insisted in would require to have been proved. But in any view of it, compensation against an admitted debt cannot be pleaded.

No. 35.
Nov. 20, 1874.
Mackie v. Riddell.

I should have rather more difficulty on the other part of the case if we had materials for deciding it. But we have not. It is doubtful if warranty or the unsoundness of the horse has been proved; and I cannot help thinking that, if well founded, the statements might have been proved. This, however, was not the case of a horse which had been tried and proved, but of a young two-year-old filly, in regard to which warranty is not very common, or easily presumed. The buyer generally takes at his own risk. It would have been all the more necessary to have had the warranty distinctly proved. But really the buyer must prove warranty, and he has not done so.

Lord Mure concurred.

The Court pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff of date 21st August 1873, and all the subsequent interlocutors in the cause: Find that on the 1st February 1873 the pursuer (respondent) sold to the defender (appellant) three stots at the price of £30, 15s.: Find that the defender received delivery of the said stots on the 11th of the same month: Find that the defender has failed to pay the price of the said stots: Find that the claim on which the defender pleads compensation, being illiquid, cannot be set off against the pursuer's admitted claim: Therefore repel the defences, and decern against the defender in terms of the conclusion of the summons: Find the pursuer entitled to expenses both in the Sheriff-court and this Court; allow accounts thereof to be given in," &c.

J. & A. Peddie, W.S.—Gifford & Simpson, W.S.—Agents.

No. 36.
Nov. 21, 1874.
Park v. Watson, &c.

John Park, Pursuer, Nominal Raiser.—Keir.
Alexander B. Watson and Another, Defenders, Respondents.—Reid.
John Henderson Milne, Defender and Real Raiser.—Reid.
James Cruickshank, Defender and Appellant.—Mackintosh.

Process—Multiplepoinding.—The outgoing tenant of a farm allowed the incoming tenant to reap his crop, under an agreement by which the incoming tenant bound himself to pay the value of the crop to the landlord, the balance, after payment of rent, to be paid by the landlord to the outgoing tenant. A creditor of the outgoing tenant having arrested the funds in the hands of the incoming tenant, a multiplepoinding was raised by the landlord in the name of the incoming tenant. Objection to the competency of the multiplepoinding, on the ground that there was no double distress, repelled.

No. 36.

Nov. 21, 1874.
Park v. Watson, &c.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of Aberdeen.
M.

THIS action of multiplepoinding was raised by John H. Milne of Craigellie, proprietor of the farm of Tillykeira, Aberdeenshire (real raiser), in name of John Park, incoming tenant of said farm (nominal raiser), against (1) Mr Milne himself, the real raiser, (2) the outgoing tenants, Alexander B. Watson and Mrs Sophia Watson, (3) James Cruickshank, a creditor of the outgoing tenant, who had used arrestments in the hands of the incoming tenant.

The summons set forth as the fund in medio £140, 6s. 7½d., being the price of the waygoing crop, "in terms of agreement between the outgoing and incoming tenants."

This agreement (inter alia) bore,—"It is further agreed that the incoming tenant pay over the price of the said crop to the proprietor, Mr Milne of Craigellie, or his factor, say 15s. per quarter to account at Martinmas 1873, and the rest when the fiars are struck, the said proprietor or his factor being bound to pay over the same to the outgoing tenants above named, after deducting the rent due for crop 1873."

The defender Cruickshank lodged a minute of defence, in which he pleaded that the action was incompetent, in respect that there was no double distress.

The defenders Watsons also lodged defences in which they stated,—"The action was incompetent, and ought to be dismissed, in respect there was no double distress or competing interests, and that no evidence has been produced by the real raiser of such double distress or of competing interests; that the fund arrested was specially set apart for payment to the real raiser under minute of agreement, . . . and was not attachable by arrestment; and that the landlord's claim, in any event, is a preferable claim, which goes to diminish the fund, and not to demand a share of it, and the only other claim being that of James Cruickshank, one of the defenders, there is in the circumstances no double distress."

The Sheriff-substitute (Comrie Thomson) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that there is no double distress, and that there are no competing interests on the fund in medio: Dismisses the action: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses from the real raiser; allows accounts," &c.*

The real raiser appealed.

The Sheriff (Guthrie Smith) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Affirms the interlocutor appealed against, and decerns, but varies the finding as to expenses as follows,—Finds no expenses due to or by the arrester Cruickshank, but finds the other claimants entitled to expenses from the real raiser, of which allows an account," &c.†

---

* "NOTE.—The Sheriff-substitute refers to the cases of Bell v. Hill, 18th November 1837,[1] and Mitchell v. Strachan, 18th November 1869,[2] as the authorities on which the above judgment proceeds."

† "NOTE.—The Sheriff regrets to be obliged to throw out this action on a technical ground, but it is impossible to resist the objection stated to the competency of the process by the claimants A. B. Watson and Mrs Watson. In 1873 these persons were leaving the farm of Tillykeira. The crop on the lands was their property, and by agreement, dated 5th August 1873, they assigned it over to Park, the incoming tenant, on condition that he should pay the value thereof to the proprietor Mr Milne, or his factor, who again was taken bound to pay over the same to the granters of the deed, after deducting the rent due for crop 1873. Mr Park thus held the crop as trustee for the landlord, and the subsequent arrestment used in his hands by Cruickshank as a creditor of the Watsons attached nothing. Nor does the circumstance that the landlord, after getting the money and paying himself, will hold the reversion for behoof of the Watsons, or any person in their right, constitute double distress. In no view, [1] 16 S. 81, 10 Scot. Jur. 85. [2] 8 Macph. 154, 42 Scot. Jur. 67.

No. 36.
Nov. 21, 1874.
Park v. Watson, &c.

The defender Cruickshank appealed, and argued;—The Sheriff had gone on the merits in deciding the competency. He assumed that under the agreement the landlord was the sole creditor of the fund. This was dealing with the merits, which he was not entitled to do in a question of competency.[1]

LORD PRESIDENT.—The point we have to decide is whether the multiplepoinding is competent. The Sheriff-substitute and the Sheriff have found that it is not competent, because there are not different claimants of the fund. The fund in medio is just the price of the waygoing crop when it becomes due. A debtor of the outgoing tenant has arrested this fund in the hands of the incoming tenant, and claims to have his debt paid out of it. On the other hand, the landlord claims to have his rent paid out of the fund. Now, it is difficult to understand what double distress is if this is not. One of the defenders claims the whole fund, and another claims a part. The landlord's claim is based on an agreement between the outgoing and incoming tenant. Two questions are raised by the agreement, 1st, whether the landlord can found on the agreement, and 2d, whether the agreement is binding at all. It is a pity any such question should ever have been raised, and if the parties were reasonable they might easily settle the question between them. But the way in which the Sheriff deals with the question of competency is by assuming that the arrestment creates no nexus, and thus by assuming that the judgment in the competition will be one way, he arrives at the conclusion that there is no double distress. I think that his judgment is wrong, and that we ought to send the case back to the Sheriff-court.

LORD DEAS, LORD ARDMILLAN, and LORD MURE concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutors of the Sheriff-substitute of date 22d May, and of the Sheriff of date 2d July 1874: Repel the objections to the competency of the action, and remit to the Sheriff to proceed further in the cause: Find the respondent, John Henderson Milne, entitled to expenses in this Court; allow an account," &c.

DAVID H. WILSON, S.S.C.—DAVID MILNE, S.S.C.—MORTON, NEILSON, & SMART W.S.—Agents.

No. 37.
Nov. 21, 1874.
Walker v. Stronach.

GEORGE WALKER AND OTHERS (Original Trustees of the late James Giles), First Parties.—Dickson.
ALEXANDER STRONACH Junior AND ANOTHER (Assumed Trustees of the late James Giles), Second Parties.—Lee.

Pupil—Tutor-nominate.—A father conferred on the trustees under his trust-disposition and settlement a power to assume new trustees, and appointed his trustees "named or to be named or assumed, and the survivors and survivor of them," tutors to his pupil children. Held that the appointment of assumed trustees as tutors was invalid.

---

therefore, is there anything to warrant a multiplepoinding, and the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute dismissing the action is right. No expenses have been given to the arrester, because his arrestment, although obliging the real raiser to call him as a party, is utterly inept, and, properly speaking, he has no locus standi in the case at all."

[1] Mitchell v. Strachan, Nov. 18, 1869, 8 Macph. 154, 42 Scot. Jur. 67; Scott and Bonar v. Drysdale, May 22, 1827, 5 S. 689, (N. E.) 643; M'Target v. M'Target, May 12, 1829, 7 S. 591, 1 Scot. Jur. 167; Miller v. Ure, June 23, 1838, 16 S. 1204, 10 Scot. Jur. 519.

No. 37.
Nov. 21, 1874.
Walker v. Stronach.
2D DIVISION. I.

THE late James Giles, R.S.A., died at Aberdeen on 6th October 1870, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement whereby he conveyed in trust his whole property to Alexander Bruce, S.S.C., George Walker, North of Scotland Bank, Aberdeen, James Bruce, W.S., and Alexander Ellis, architect, Aberdeen, "and the survivors or survivor of them, or of such of them as shall accept, and to such other person or persons as I may hereafter name and appoint by any writing under my hand, as trustees, and to the assignees of my said trustees either named or to be named or assumed." The deed also contained this nomination of tutors and curators to the truster's children,—"I hereby nominate and appoint my said trustees named or to be named or assumed, and the survivors and survivor of them, tutors and curators, or tutor and curator, of such children of my present marriage as may be alive at my death, and also to be my sole executors or executor, and only intromittors with my moveable means and estate." Mr Giles left two children in pupillarity, one born in February 1867, and the other in October 1868.

Upon Mr Giles' death all the trustees nominated by him accepted office, and proceeded to act in the administration of the trust-estate. On the death of one of their number, Alexander Bruce, in 1872, the surviving trustees assumed Alexander Stronach junior and Henry John Gibson as trustees under Mr Giles' trust-disposition and settlement.

The surviving original trustees and the assumed trustees thereafter acted as trustees under the trust-disposition and settlement. But a question arose whether the assumed trustees became, as such, tutors of the pupil children of the truster, along with the original trustees. Accordingly this special case was presented to the Court.

George Walker, James Bruce, and Alexander Ellis as surviving original trustees were the parties of the first part, and Alexander Stronach junior and Henry John Gibson were the parties of the second part.

The judgment of the Court was asked on the questions, whether the parties of the first part were the sole tutors of the truster's pupil children, or whether the parties of the second part were tutors along with the parties of the first part.

Argued for the first parties;—A father was permitted by the law of Scotland, which in this matter was founded on the civil law, to nominate tutors to his children, not as an extension of the patria potestas after his death, but because he was presumed to be best qualified for making the selection. To allow a father to appoint an uncertain person would therefore be a departure from this principle. The attempt made by the truster in this deed was not to appoint tutors by designation though not nominatim, which might be allowable, but to delegate the power of nomination.[1]

Argued for the second parties;—It had never been decided that a father could not appoint tutors in the manner adopted in this case. In practice such appointments had frequently passed unquestioned, owing to the manifest expediency of having the power of administration of a father's estate and the guardianship of his children in the same hands. The father had very clearly indicated what his wish was in this matter, viz., to continue the guardianship of his trustees as a body over his children, though from death it should be necessary to replace some of the original by assumed trustees. Such was no stretch of the father's patria potestas, which laid upon him the duty as well as the power of continuing his guardianship over his pupil children after his death through tutors

[1] Dig. 26, 2, 20; 1698, c. 8; Stair, 1, 6, 6; Ersk. 1, 7, 3.

No. 37. Nov. 21, 1874. Walker v. Stronach.

appointed; and to give effect to the father's intention in the present case, was only to follow the principle governing the law in this matter.[1]

At advising,—

LORD NEAVES.—This case raises a question of very considerable importance. There is not much authority to be found on the point, but it is very material to attend to this, that no case can be pointed to in the whole range of legal practice and experience in which a tutor-nominate has been allowed to be appointed to pupil children by any person, not being the father himself. It is a very delicate act to select after a father's death a person who shall be guardian of the person and administrator of the affairs of his pupil children. If the father before his death has exercised his admitted power of selection, the law recognises the tutor so nominated. It may be that he need not designate him by name so long as he designates him by description so as to distinguish him individually from all others, for it would not be sufficient for the father to appoint the holder of a particular office at the time of his death. But we have no example of a tutor nominated by any one else than the father being admitted to the office. Considering this fact, and looking to the origin and source of the office of tutory itself, I think we have enough to determine this present point. The father is empowered to name tutors to his pupil children. But he cannot delegate that power to a third party. A tutor named by a person to whom the father has delegated his power of nomination would not be a tutor nominated by the father, and would want the very characteristic which in the eye of the law forms the qualification of the father's nominee, namely, the father's personal selection. To whatever origin we may trace back the principles which guide our law and practice on this point it would be a matter of extreme delicacy to innovate in any way upon them. I accept the maxim of the Roman law, "tutor incertus dari non potest." It implies a delectus personæ residing in the father, and to be exercised by him, and him only. Now, these assumed trustees are not the father's selection; they are the selection of the surviving and acting original trustees. They may be well assumed as trustees, but a power to assume trustees does not make the assumed trustees assumed tutors. If there is an inconvenience in this I cannot help it; the remedy must be found in further legislation.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORDS ORMIDALE and GIFFORD concurred.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find that George Walker James Bruce, and Alexander Ellis, as surviving trustees nominated by James Giles, are sole tutors of Alexander Bruce Giles, and Mary Giles, the pupil children of the said James Giles, and find both parties to the special case entitled to payment of their expenses out of the estate, and decern."

BRUCE & KERR, W.S.—TODS, MURRAY & JAMIESON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 38. Nov. 24, 1874. Harrison v. Anderston Foundry Co.

HENRY HARRISON AND WILLIAM HARRISON, Suspenders.—D.-F. Clark—Asher—Mackintosh.

ANDERSTON FOUNDRY COMPANY, Respondents.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Balfour—R. V. Campbell.

Process—Jury Trial—Issues—Note of Particulars—Patent—Prior Invention—Prior Use.—In a suspension and interdict brought by the holder of a patent to [1] Stair, 1, 12, 13; Ersk. 1, 7, 2.

No. 38.
Nov. 24, 1874.
Harrison v. Anderston Foundry Co.

prevent infringement, the respondents alleged that the patent was invalid, in respect that the patentee was not the first and true inventor, and that the invention had been publicly known and used prior to the date of the patent, the respondents stating that an invention substantially the same had been described in seventeen prior patents, which were specified, and had been used by thirty different manufacturers.

Held that it was not necessary for the respondents to specify the passages in the specifications of the respective patents which they intended to found upon, or the dates of the alleged prior use.

Observed, that the record was the proper place for making the necessary allegations of prior use.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Young. B.

THIS was a note of suspension and interdict by William Harrison and Henry Harrison, of Blackburn against the Anderston Foundry Company, carrying on business at Anderston, near Glasgow.

The prayer was for interdict against the respondents infringing certain patents for weaving machinery held by the suspenders.

The respondents stated,—(Stat. 1) "Quintin Whyte and John Whyte, in whose favour the letters-patent libelled on were granted, were not the first and true inventors of the alleged invention described in the said letters-patent and specification, and the said invention was not first published in Great Britain by the said Quintin Whyte and John Whyte, or either of them. The said alleged invention was published, and was publicly known and used in Great Britain prior to the date of the said letters-patent." (Stat. 2) "Inventions or contrivances similar to, or substantially the same with, the alleged invention described in the letters-patent founded on by the complainers were described and disclosed in (1) letters-patent granted to John Watson, No. 11,498, dated 21st December 1846, and in the relative specification and drawings, dated 17th and enrolled 21st June 1847." Then follow sixteen other similar statements of prior patents. (Stat. 3) "The alleged invention specified and described in the letters-patent and specifications libelled on was publicly used in Great Britain prior to the date of the said letters-patent in the following amongst other instances, viz., Messrs Gilmour and Kerr's weaving factory, 95 Garngad Road, Glasgow." Then follow the names of twenty-nine different manufacturers in different parts of the country, but principally near Glasgow.

The respondents pleaded;—2. The alleged letters-patent founded on by the complainers are null and void or invalid, in respect—(1) The said Quintin Whyte and John Whyte were not the first and true inventors of the alleged invention described in the letters-patent and specification. (2) The alleged invention was publicly known prior to the date of the letters-patent. (3) The alleged invention was publicly used prior to the date of the letters-patent. (4) The said alleged invention is of no public utility.

The following issues and counter issues were proposed:—"It being admitted that Quintin Whyte and John Whyte, of the city of Glasgow, obtained the letters-patent, No. 6 of process, dated 29th October 1868, and sealed 19th March 1869, and filed the specification of which No. 7 of process is a certified printed copy, and that the said letters-patent were assigned to the pursuers by assignation dated 30th September 1871—Whether from the 29th October 1868 to the 19th September 1874, or during part of said period, and during the currency of the said letters-patent, the defenders did, at their works at Anderston, Glasgow, wrongfully and in contravention of the said letters-patent, use the invention described in the said letters-patent and specification? Or, 1, Whether the said Quintin Whyte and John Whyte are not the first and true inventors of the inven-

No. 38.

Nov. 24, 1874.
Harrison v. Anderston Foundry Co.

tion described in the said letters-patent and relative specification? 2, Whether the invention described in the said letters-patent and specification was publicly used in the United Kingdom prior to the date of the said letters-patent? 3, Whether the invention described in the said letters-patent and specification is not practically useful for the purposes therein set forth?"

The suspenders objected to the counter issues being granted.

The Lord Ordinary reported the issues and whole case.*

* "NOTE.—I have taken the exceptional course of reporting the case at this stage in the special circumstances, which I shall briefly explain, and with a view to promote the reasonable desire of the parties to have the case tried at the ensuing sittings of the First Division of the Court.

"The suspenders complain of an infringement of a patent, and seek by interdict to restrain the respondents from continuing the alleged infringement. The respondents impugn the validity of the patent, on the grounds,—1st, that the patentees are not the first and true inventors; 2d, prior use; and 3d, inutility. The issue proposed by the complainers is in common form, and was not objected to. The counter-issues proposed by the respondents are also in common form, and were not objected to in point of form or expression.

"But the complainers require (statement 7) from the respondents further specification than the record gives of their statements with respect to prior invention and use, and it is with reference to the proper mode of directing the respondents to comply with this desire (if it should be thought reasonable, as I think it is) that I have reported the case at this stage. The doubt is whether, when a party maintains such pleas as the counter issues proposed by the respondents are founded on, there is any other way of compelling him to give more specific information than by refusing his issues unless he shall amend his record? In short, whether it is competent, after the adjustment of issues, to order further specification for the reasonable information and guidance of the other party. From the position taken by the parties it was obvious that, in whatever way I decided the controversy between them, there would be a reclaiming note, and I therefore (with the assent of both, as I understood) report the matter, as the course whereby the judgment of the Court may be obtained with the least hindrance to the progress of the case.

"My own opinion is that the respondents are entitled to the issues which they propose; and that by allowing the issues the complainers are not precluded from applying to the Court for an order on the respondents to furnish them with such further specification as they (I think reasonably) require. Such an order has been made of consent; and I should, for my part, be prepared to decide that it may be made without consent, or in the face of opposition. Information so ordered to be furnished by one party to the other for his guidance may not be such as ought to be, or conveniently can be, set forth on record, and I should not be disposed to regard it as of exactly the same technical character. The rules of candour and good faith would of course be enforced, and indeed are unlikely to be violated. But, consistently with these, the party furnishing the information, whether voluntarily or in obedience to an order of Court, might, in my opinion, be properly allowed at the trial to go beyond it to such extent as the Judge thought fair and reasonable in the circumstances.

"The record is perhaps not the place to specify the particular passage of books or specifications intended to be relied on; and if a note of them should be furnished to the opposite party, I think no more ought to be required at the trial than a substantial observance of the good faith of such note, regarded as notice,—without precluding the party from founding on other passages similar in character subsequently discovered,—notice of which was not purposely withheld, and reference to which may be allowed without prejudice to the reasonable interests of the adversary. I venture to offer these remarks in support of the preference I should feel to the one mode of giving the information required rather than the other, and also with reference to the alarm which the respondents seemed to feel, that by giving the information required of them they would

No. 38.
Nov. 24, 1874.
Harrison v. Anderston Foundry Co.

The suspenders argued;—The respondents were not entitled to have their issues, because they had not given sufficient specification of prior publication, or prior use, in their statements, or, at all events, they were bound to furnish to the suspenders a note of the particulars which they intended to prove. The dates of the alleged prior use ought to have been given. On account of the large number of allegations of prior use and prior publication it would be impossible to prepare a case to disprove all.[1]

Argued for the respondents;—It had never been the practice to give the dates at which an alleged prior use took place.[2]

LORD PRESIDENT.—The point before us is whether we are to allow the first and second issues for the defenders. There is no question properly before us as to whether the pursuers are entitled to further information or notice, so as to make the record more specific. Indeed, I do not think that any other mode of stating what is to be proved is competent. In the case of Neilson v. Househill Co.,[3] there was a want of a proper notice of certain acts of prior use on the record, and that was afterwards attempted to be supplemented by the defenders lodging a note of particulars, in which they stated the particular acts of prior use. At the trial the presiding Judge refused to look at the note of particulars, because that was not the proper mode of stating the particulars. Exception was taken to the ruling, and the exception was disallowed by the Second Division of the Court, and their judgment was affirmed on appeal. It appears to me that any other mode of stating the prior use than on record is incompetent and inadmissible.

As to the first issue, the averment on record of the respondents is that "inventions or contrivances similar to, or substantially the same with the alleged invention described in the letters-patent founded on by the complainers, were described and disclosed in"—then follows a list of 17 other patents, all registered under the statute. The pursuer says this is not a sufficient averment, because it sets him to work through the whole of these documents. I do not think that the objection is good, or that the respondents are bound to particularise the lines in each specification on which they found. The patent is not to be understood except from reference to the whole specification. I think that the whole convenience at the trial is all one way, and that the inconvenience would be greater if the respondents were tied down to particular passages.

In former cases I have often seen prior patents referred to, but never heard be deprived of the benefit which they might take from the more minute and careful investigation and consideration of the case which will probably precede the trial.

---

"It may be, and probably is, quite possible so to amend the record as to keep the respondents reasonably safe, while giving all the information that can properly be required of them; and I do not forget Lord Campbell's commendation of our records, which he illustrated by reference to this very subject of notice in patent cases.

"Therefore, although, on the whole, I have the preference which I have ventured to express, I think it is precisely a subject which it is important to have settled one way or the other, without its very much signifying which."

[1] Glover and Baker Sewing Machine Co. v. Wilson, Weekly Notes, March 12, 1870; Sykes v. Wilson, Feb. 2, 1866, 4 Macph. 349, 38 Scot. Jur. 181.

[2] Jones v. Berger, Jan. 28, 1843, 12 L. J. (C. P.) 179; Morgan v. Fuller, April 28, 1866, Law Reports, 2 Equity, 297.

[3] March 6, 1843, 2 Bell's App. 1, 15 Scot. Jur. 524, June 8, 1843, 5 D. 1180.

No. 38. Nov. 24, 1874. Harrison v. Anderston Foundry Co.

of any demand being made for particular lines in the specifications which were to be referred to. The plausibility of the demand arises from the number of prior inventions here founded on. But that is not a sufficient reason. No doubt, it will give the pursuers, and any experts they may employ, more trouble in examining so many patents.

As to the averment of prior use, the number of instances is very considerable. They occur in Glasgow and in other towns, but principally in Glasgow. If so many people have been in the habit of using the invention I cannot doubt but the pursuers will have no difficulty in finding out what is the particular thing the respondents are to prove. If they go to half a dozen of those people they will easily learn the kind of use which is alleged. Of course, the use must be prior to the date of the letters-patent, but there is no reason otherwise for limiting the respondents as to the time.

LORD DEAS.—I concur in the views expressed by your Lordship.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I agree with the Lord Ordinary that the defenders are entitled to their issues. I think that the record is the proper place, and, indeed, the only proper place, for stating the particulars demanded in regard to prior use; but I think that the defenders have given as much specification as the pursuers were entitled to demand, and quite as much as the pursuers gave. A demand for more minute statement might, if sustained, operate unfairly. It might, indeed, become a snare to the defenders, because if they fixed one particular day, as the time of use, or one particular line of a specification, it might prevent them from proving use on the next day, or from founding on other lines in the specification. The mere multiplication of the number of prior patents, and the number of places where prior use is alleged, can really make no difference. If the defenders would not be bound to give the minute specification demanded in regard to one time, or one instance, where he only gave one example, I do not see why they should be called on to give more minute specification where they have alleged several times and several instances. Viewed apart from the number of instances of prior use, it cannot be said that there is any unfair withholding of information, and the mere number does not alter the question. I am therefore of opinion that the defenders are entitled to their issues, and that the demand for further and more specific information should not be granted.

LORD MURE concurred.

THE COURT approved of the issues as reported.

HAMILTON, KINNEAR, & BEATSON, W.S.—DAVIDSON & SYME, W.S.—Agents.

No. 39. Nov. 24, 1874. Shields v. North British Railway Co.

ROBERT SHIELDS, Pursuer.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Gloag.
THE NORTH BRITISH RAILWAY COMPANY, Defenders.—D.-F. Clark—Balfour.

Jury Trial—Proof—Personal Injury.—In an action of damages for personal injury after several medical witnesses had been examined as to the state of the pursuer and the injury he had sustained, the jury gave a verdict for the pursuer. In a motion for a new trial the defenders produced affidavits from persons who deponed that the pursuer's health had materially improved since the trial. The Court, without deciding on the competency, refused to grant a new trial, on the ground that the affidavits did not shew that the medical witnesses were substantially wrong in the evidence they gave at the trial.

No. 39.

Nov. 24, 1874.
Shields v. North British Railway Co.

1ST DIVISION. B.

ROBERT SHIELDS, draper in Falkirk, raised this action against the North British Railway Company, concluding for £5000 as damages for injuries sustained by him in a collision on the defenders' line of railway near Bonnybridge on 6th January 1874. An issue was tried before the Lord President and a jury at the July sittings, when a verdict was returned for the pursuer, assessing the damages at £3000.

The defenders obtained a rule on the pursuer to shew cause why the verdict should not be set aside. The grounds on which the defenders rested their motion were, 1st, that the damages were excessive, and, 2d, that the condition of the pursuer had materially changed for the better since the date of the trial, so much so as to shew that the medical witnesses had been wrong in their opinions. In order to support this second ground the defenders gave in affidavits.

Mr Hill, W.S., the agent of the defenders, deponed,—"That at the trial the pursuer was stated to be suffering from complete paralysis of the legs and left arm, by which these limbs were rendered powerless. That after the date of the said trial the pursuer resided at Helensburgh from the month of August until a recent date; and from inquiries which the deponent has made he is credibly informed, and believes, that a very great improvement in the health of the said Robert Shields has taken place. That for a short time after the said Robert Shields arrived at Helensburgh he seemed to be weak and comparatively helpless, and was moved about in the open air in a bath chair, drawn by members of his family. That after a time he seemed to improve in strength, and was able to walk about the doors with no other assistance than that of a walking-stick. For some time he was only observed to go out of doors in fine weather. That towards the end of September, and until a very recent date, the said Robert Shields has been walking about at a considerable distance from his house, unaccompanied, and with no other assistance than that of a walking-stick, and that without regard to the state of the weather. That during his visit to Helensburgh his left arm has regained its strength, and he now can use his left hand. That during the whole time of his stay at Helensburgh he has not been visited by any medical man. That from the information which the deponent has obtained relative to the history of Mr Shields since the trial he believes that it could now be clearly proved that the medical witnesses examined for Mr Shields at the trial were in error in believing that he would not recover. That there is now every probability that Mr Shields will recover, at all events to such an extent as to be able to resume and carry on his business, and that it is essential to the ends of justice that a new trial should be granted."

There were three other affidavits by persons residing in Helensburgh, who deponed to seeing a change for the better in the pursuer's health.

The pursuer produced certificates from the doctors who were examined at the trial. Professor Lister and Dr Watson stated as the result of their examination of the pursuer—"1. Mr Shields' general appearance has improved. 2. His powers of movement are increased. This is most marked in the left arm and hand. 3. The impairment of sensibility which affected the lower extremities, part of the trunk and left arm, has not undergone a commensurate degree of improvement.

"It is our opinion that the change which has taken place in Mr Shields' condition is only one of degree, that the paralytic condition is still in existence, and that any improvement which we have noticed does not justify us in concluding that Mr Shields is either now capable of attending to business, or likely ever to recover so as to enable him to do so."

No. 39.
Nov. 24, 1874.
Shields v. North British Railway Co.

LORD DEAS.—It is not necessary to decide whether, if the pursuer had now completely recovered from the accident, that would have been a competent ground for granting a new trial. If competent at all a very strong case would certainly be required, and I think that no such case has been established on the face of the affidavits produced by the railway company. It is a remarkable circumstance that they have produced no medical certificates. There was nothing to have prevented them from doing so. Dr Macleod was the only medical witness who distinctly negatived the view that the pursuer was suffering from true paralysis. He called it "hysterical" paralysis, meaning that there was no organic lesion, as the other medical gentlemen thought there was. We do not know what Dr Macleod now thinks, and are left with the certificates of the other medical men who were examined for the pursuer at the trial, and who think it unlikely that he will ever substantially recover. That there may be partial recovery I am not disposed to doubt. We have all known persons in whom the symptoms, to say the least of it, became greatly abated, and who ultimately died of some other complaint. The pursuer may have partially recovered in that sense, but there is nothing to shew that he has so far recovered as to be able to carry on business. There is, in short,—assuming the competency of the ground relied on,—no such change of circumstances as would justify us in interfering with the verdict.

The only other ground of objection is that the damages awarded by the jury are too large. Now, it is plain that this was a case of severe injury, which disabled the pursuer from carrying on his business. He was also entitled to some compensation for the suffering he endured. Taking all this into account, however, the damages are high. If I had been on the jury I would have been for giving less. But the excess is not so great as to entitle us to interfere. I therefore think that the rule should be discharged.

LORD ARDMILLAN and LORD MURE concurred.

LORD PRESIDENT.—If I had been making a verdict I think I should not have given £3000. But I agree in thinking that the excess is not so great as to be a reason for granting a new trial. I cannot pronounce this verdict so exorbitant as to warrant us in interfering.

The other ground on which the defenders found is somewhat novel. If the trial had taken place during session the verdict would have been applied a few days after the trial, and there would not have been time for the new circumstances to emerge. But the opportunity is just a piece of luck for the defenders. If the circumstances are sufficiently strong, I am not prepared to say that they may not be taken advantage of. The question is whether the circumstances are such as to make it essential to the justice of the case for us to interfere with the verdict. In dealing with this I am disposed to throw out of view the amount of damages.

It is said that the medical evidence has turned out to be untrustworthy. If it had appeared that the medical witnesses were altogether wrong in their diagnosis it would make a difference. But I think that they were substantially right. Notwithstanding the fact that the pursuer has partially recovered the use of his right arm and his power of walking, I do not think that he will ever get the better of his accident. The certificate of Professor Lister and Dr Watson is very cautiously expressed. They still say that though there is an abatement of the symptoms of paralysis there is not the slightest prospect of the man ever being able to conduct his business. These circumstances are, I think, insufficient to justify us in setting aside the verdict. No. 39.

Nov. 24, 1874. Shields v. North British Railway Co.

THE COURT discharged the rule.

GEORGE BURN, W.S.—HILL & FERGUSON, W.S.—Agents.

ALEXANDER SIMPSON AND OTHERS, Pursuers.—Scott—Brand. JOHN RAMSAY AND OTHERS, Defenders.—J. G. Smith—Balfour—M'Kechnie. No. 40.

Nov. 24, 1874. Simpson, &c. v. Ramsay, &c.

Friendly Society — Title to Sue. — By the Friendly Societies Act, 1855, secs. 18 and 19, the property of a friendly society established under it is vested in the trustees, who are authorised to sue or defend any action in any Court of law or equity concerning the property of the society. A branch or "court" of the Ancient Order of Foresters' Friendly Society was itself established as a friendly society under the Act—its rules providing for the election of its officers and for the administration of its affairs by the "court," subject to the laws of the Order. In consequence of the "court" having failed to comply with a decision of a superior judicatory, the Executive council of the Order, acting in accordance with their laws, suspended the "court," and subsequently granted a new "dispensation" in favour of a minority of its members, authorising them to assume the name and number of the suspended "court." The majority continued to meet as if there had been no suspension, and elected trustees, who raised an action against trustees elected under the new dispensation, to have it found that the pursuers had right to the custody of the money, securities, &c. belonging to the "court," and for delivery of the same. Held, after a proof, that the pursuers had not instructed a title to sue (diss. Lord Gifford, who held that while the Executive council could cut off the "court" from the Order, it could not disincorporate the "court" as a friendly society).

THIS action was raised by Alexander Simpson and two others, as trustees of Court Royal Archer, No. 1544, Ancient Order of Foresters' Friendly Society," in order to have it declared that they possessed that character, and as such were entitled to the custody of the monies, securities, and documents belonging to that society, and it concluded against John Ramsay and two others "alleging themselves, but erroneously, to be the trustees of the said friendly society" for delivery of those monies, securities, or documents, or, in the event of failure, for payment of £1500. 2D DIVISION. Lord Mure. I.

The pursuers set forth the dates of their appointments as trustees, and founded upon the 18th and 19th sections of the Friendly Societies Act, 1855, by which all the real and personal estate belonging to any friendly society is vested in the trustees, and the trustees are authorised to sue or defend any action in any Court of law or equity concerning the property of the society.

The defence consisted of a denial that the pursuers were the trustees of Court Royal Archer, No. 1544, Ancient Order of Foresters' Friendly Society, Greenock; and in their statement of facts the defenders entered into an explanation of certain proceedings, the result of which was, as they alleged, that they (the defenders) were the trustees of the society under the laws of the order.

The defenders pleaded;—No title to sue.

The Lord Ordinary allowed the parties a proof, from which the following facts appeared:—The Ancient Order of Foresters was a very numerous body, having a widespread ramification over the country, which conducted its business by means of "districts," each district containing a number of branches or "courts." Some "courts," however, were attached to the order without belonging to any district. Each court elected its officers, and generally managed its affairs, subject to the general laws of the order, by which an elaborate system of representative government and machinery for settling disputes that might occur in a court were provided.* The bye-laws of Court Royal Archer, No. 1544, which were certified by the registrar of friendly societies, and in which the society was designed as an auxiliary branch of the Greenock district of the Ancient Order of Foresters' Friendly Society, set out with the provision that the whole of the objects and rules of the court should be in conformity with and subject to the rules of the Greenock district branch, and the general laws of the Ancient Order of Foresters' Friendly Society. The rules of the Greenock district and the general laws of the order were also certified under the Friendly Societies Act. The court administered its own sick fund. Another fund, the funeral fund, was administered by the district, who collected the funeral money from the different courts, and paid out the funeral allowances when required.

No. 40. Nov. 24, 1874. Simpson, &c. v. Ramsay, &c.

The circumstances which led to the present action are thus stated by the Lord Ordinary in the note appended to his interlocutor of 24th April 1874:—"In the autumn of 1869 a dispute arose between the members of the society relative to the election of surgeon, which led to an appeal, on the part of the minority, to the 'arbitration committee,' being the first court of appeal constituted by the laws of the society. That appeal was dismissed by the arbitration committee, upon which an appeal was taken to the 'district arbitration committee' of the order, being the next court of appeal, and whose decision is, by rule 88, section 4, of the general laws of the order, declared to be binding until reversed or altered upon an appeal to the 'county arbitration committee.' Under this appeal to the district court the parties, now respectively represented by the pursuers and defenders, appear to have been fully heard, after which a decision was pronounced, reversing the decision of the 'arbitration committee,' finding that the party who had been elected surgeon had no legal right to the office, and appointing the decision to be complied with not later than the 18th of April 1870. This decision was pronounced on the 2d of April, and was not appealed against. But at a meeting of the society, held on the 15th of April, a motion to comply without qualification with the district arbitration committee's decision having been put, an amendment to comply with the decision 'by paying a fine of two pounds,' and reserving the right to appeal to the county arbitration court was put and carried.

"This resolution of the society to comply to a certain extent only, and under reservation of the right to appeal, having been communicated to the officials of the 'district arbitration committee,' was not considered by them to be a compliance with their decision; and a notice to that effect having been forwarded to the executive council of the order, they, on the 19th of May, in terms, it is said, of No. 44 of the general laws of the order,† suspended the society from all the rights, privileges, and

* The constitution of the order, so far as bearing on the present case, is fully explained in the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk.

† No. 44 of the general laws provides,—"That should any court in a district neglect or refuse to comply with a decision of the district meeting, or of the district arbitration committee, or with the rules of the district, for a longer period than allowed by such decisions or rules, or neglect to notify to the district officers their compliance therewith within the space of two days after their first meeting subsequent to receiving from the district secretary notice of

No. 40.

Nov. 24, 1874.
Simpson, &c.
v. Ramsay, &c.

benefits appertaining to the said district, and the Ancient Order of Foresters; and intimation of this suspension was duly made to the society on the 30th of May thereafter. Now, the effect of this, as contended for on the part of the defenders, was to deprive the whole members of the court suspended of the privileges of membership, and of their right and power to act as a court of the Ancient Order of Foresters, until the suspension was recalled; and it is distinctly shewn upon the evidence that it was while this suspension was in operation that the pursuers other than James Dewar were nominated trustees.

"Following upon this suspension, an application appears to have been made by some of those members of the society who had been all along willing to comply unqualifiedly with the decision of the district court to the executive council of the order for authority to carry on the society. Upon this a new dispensation was issued on the 31st of July 1870, authorising the defender, John Ramsay, and certain other parties, to hold a court of Ancient Foresters at Greenock, under the title of 'Court Royal Archer, No. 1544,'* and which, it is alleged, they have since accordingly done. And it further appears from the evidence that at the date of the suspension and new dispensation, the monies, securities, and documents, of which the pursuers seek to enforce recovery, were in the possession of the late John Love, one of the then trustees of the society, who, after the issuing of the new dispensation, was re-elected a trustee along with the defenders James Inglis and Alexander Miln, and that, since Mr Love's death, those securities and documents have been in the possession of the defenders.

"After the issuing of this new dispensation those of the society who took the same view of their rights and position as the pursuers continued to meet separately; and on the 16th of February 1871, at a meeting called for considering the question, a motion was unanimously carried to 'comply with the district arbitration committee's decision of 2d April 1870, and request that our suspension be raised according to law.' Upon this a certificate of compliance was immediately forwarded by the 'district officers' to the 'executive council,' requesting that the suspension might be raised, and the suspended members of 'Court Royal Archer, No. 1544,' restored to all the rights and privileges of the order; such decisions or breach of rules, notice of such neglect or refusal shall be forwarded to the executive council, signed by a majority of the district officers, with the district seal attached, when the executive council shall immediately forward to such court or courts their suspensions, sealed with the seal of the order. Such suspension to take effect from the date of the notice forwarded by the district. . . . . That any court, courts, or district, remaining under suspension for a period of eighteen calendar months, shall, at the expiration of such time, be expelled the order, and shall not again be reinstated, except by an application to, and the sanction of, a subsequent high court, notice of the intention of such application to be given to the executive council, in accordance with the 25th law."

---

* No. 80, sec. 1, of the general laws provides for the case of a loyal minority in a court which has been suspended or expelled for non-compliance with the decision of a court of appeal, one of the clauses being as follows:—"Or in the event of any members voting in the minority, as above, so desiring it, they shall be recognised by the executive council as the same court to which they formerly belonged, under a new dispensation bearing the same number, which the executive council shall have power to grant in such cases, and the granting of which renewed dispensation shall thereby abrogate and cancel all powers and authority conveyed in any dispensation which may have been granted bearing the same number."

No. 40.
Nov. 24, 1874.
Simpson, &c. v. Ramsay, &c.

and on the 21st of February a letter of reinstatement was issued by the executive council, and forwarded to the district officers, cancelling the suspension, and providing 'that Court 1544 comprising the minority previously reinstated, and the majority now reinstated, will be henceforth recognised as held under the dispensation granted by the executive council on the 20th July 1870.'

"Notwithstanding this reinstatement of the pursuers and those who acted with them, and official reunion of the various portions of the original society, the parties appear to have continued to meet separately, as they were not able to agree as to the precise terms upon which they were to meet together; and they have differed, among other things, as to which of them is entitled to the custody of the monies, books, and documents to which the present action relates."

The Lord Ordinary, on 24th April 1874, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the case, as disclosed in evidence, resolves into and depends upon questions as to which the jurisdiction of this Court is excluded: Therefore dismisses the action, and decerns: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses," &c.*

The pursuers reclaimed.

Argued for the pursuers;—They were willing to assume that the executive council had acted regularly, and that the effect of the suspension was to deprive Court Royal Archer of the privileges of Forestry, and cut it off from the order. But a most important question remained, whether the proceedings of the executive council had the effect of annihilating the court as a friendly society, and depriving it of the funds which its

---

* "NOTE.— . . . . . Looking at the whole matter, therefore, in a general point of view, the question thus raised as to the books and documents is a dispute between different portions of the society, for which the rules of the society do not appear to have prescribed any particular mode of settlement, and falls therefore, it is thought, within the provisions of the 41st section of the 18th and 19th Vict., cap. 63, by which an exclusive jurisdiction is conferred on Sheriffs of counties in such matters—Davie v. Colinton Friendly Society, Nov. 10, 1870, 9 Macph. 96.[1] And when the grounds upon which the proceedings relating to the suspension and new dispensation are challenged, as maintained in argument by the pursuers before the Lord Ordinary, are examined, they appear to him to raise points as to which the jurisdiction of this Court is also excluded. For the main questions raised were—1. Whether the deliverance of the district court of arbitration of the 2d of April 1870 was a sound deliverance; 2. Whether the district court was wrong in holding that the resolution of the 15th of April 1870 was not a proper compliance with their decision of the 2d of April; 3. Whether the suspension following upon the certificate of non-compliance was legal, and issued according to the rules of the society; 4. Whether the new dispensation was properly issued, and within the power of the executive committee to grant; and 5. Whether the mode in which the district officers were authorised to reinstate the pursuers was one which the pursuers were bound to comply with. Now, these propositions, with the exception perhaps of the first and second of them, appear to the Lord Ordinary to raise questions for the settlement of which no special provision is made by the rules of the society, and which, therefore, the Sheriff of the county is alone competent to deal with; while for the first of them a mode of final settlement appears to be prescribed by the rules, viz., an appeal to the 'county arbitration committee,' because, subject to such appeal, the decision of the district arbitration committee is declared to be binding—Rule 88, sec. 4.

"On these grounds, the Lord Ordinary has come to the conclusion that he has not jurisdiction to dispose of this case, and he has therefore dismissed the action."

[1] 43 Scot. Jur. 54.

No. 40.
Nov. 24, 1874.
Simpson, &c.
v. Ramsay, &c.

members had contributed. Assuming that the pursuers had been validly expelled the order, this was not a dispute between members of the order, but between members of the order and third parties, and therefore the jurisdiction of the Court of Session was not excluded. The amount of funds held by the various courts of the order was extremely large, and it would be a most serious thing to hold that a small body of men, sitting somewhere in England, could by a stroke of their pen deprive any court of its funds, and transfer them to another body,—it might be to a minority of the same court, or it might be to entire strangers. Such a power was not easily presumed. A difficulty was raised in consequence of the pursuers suing under the name and number of a court of the Ancient Order of Foresters, but it was merely verbal. It might be that the defenders were entitled to prevent the pursuers using that name and number, but they could not prevent them suing for their own property.

Argued for the defenders;—The plea of no title to sue was not a mere technical objection to the pursuers' designation. The property of Court Royal Archer, No. 1544, was vested in the trustees elected under the rules, with which the general laws of the order were expressly incorporated. Apart from the rules the pursuers could have no corporate character; they were merely three individuals; and when these rules were examined it was seen that the defenders, and not the pursuers, were the trustees elected under the rules.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In this case the Lord Ordinary has stated the facts on which the dispute turns so much in detail, and so clearly, that it will not be necessary for me to resume them at any length.

The question has arisen out of certain proceedings of a friendly society, which calls itself, or was called, Court Royal Archer, No. 1544, an auxiliary branch of the Greenock district of the Ancient Order of Free Foresters. The society itself is the Ancient Order of Foresters, a very large association, having a widespread ramification over the country, and conducting its business by districts, and these districts are subdivided into what are termed subordinate courts. The district with which the Court Royal Archer, No. 1544, was connected, was the Greenock district. The High Court of Foresters—the general body—are registered as a friendly society, and their rules, which go into great detail and provide for a very large organisation, are certified by the registrar of friendly societies. These rules, being the rules of the main body, are for objects sufficiently described in the first provision,—"The name of this society shall be the Ancient Order of Foresters' Friendly Society, having for its objects the establishment of branches or courts, as provided for in laws . . . , also the establishment of districts, as provided in laws . . . , with a view to the following:—That of the members by an initiation fee, and weekly, monthly, or quarterly contributions, securing a weekly allowance in sickness, and a sum at death for themselves, wives, and children, also endowments for wives and children of members. The sums to be received and allowed to be left to the option of the courts, as provided for in law . . . , and districts, as provided for in laws . . . ." Then it goes on—"to provide a fund for the support and protection of those members who vote in the minority of any court that may break up or secede from the order, and who may not be able to enter any other court; by the sale of dispensations, laws, &c., to provide a fund for paying the expenses of the general management; also for the purpose of providing widows' and orphans' funds for the relief of the widows and orphans of deceased members, &c."

No. 40. Nov. 24, 1874. Simpson, &c. v. Ramsay, &c.

Now, these are the objects of the general association, to be attained by the operation of the districts and the courts, which are the subordinate branches of the general association; and the first rule in regard to the constitution of the order is this,—"That this order shall consist of a high court, colonial high courts, district courts, and subordinate courts, each governed by its own officers." That is the general aspect of the association itself, and these rules, which provide, as I have said, for a large organisation and government, all depending upon the general body for their effect and operation, are certified by the registrar of friendly societies. The districts are provided for specially as well as the courts in the detailed rules of the general body, but they have also their separate rules, certified by the registrar.

The rules and regulations of the Greenock district to which this Court Royal Archer belongs are in process, and the first rule is this,—"That this district shall be called the Greenock district, which shall consist of an unlimited number of courts, having for its object the establishment of a fund for the interment of its members, &c., these objects to be carried out in strict conformity with and subject to the general rules of the Ancient Order of Foresters, as registered under the Friendly Societies Act."

Then again come the rules of Court Royal Archer, No. 1544, which is one of the courts belonging to the Greenock district. These rules also are certified by the registrar, and the first rule is this,—"That this court shall be called Court Royal Archer, No. 1544, and shall form an auxiliary branch of the Greenock district of the Ancient Order of Foresters' Friendly Society, and shall have for its object the raising of funds, &c. The whole of the objects and rules of this court shall be in conformity with and subject to the rules of the Greenock district branch and the general laws of the Ancient Order of Foresters' Friendly Society." So that this constitutes a very complete system of government, a complete constitution, by which the subordinate courts, which is the name they bear in the rules of the high court, are attached, first, to the district which has a jurisdiction over them, and again in the ultimate result to the high court.

Now, a dispute arose, which is fully detailed in the note of the Lord Ordinary and into which I do not intend to go at any length, in the year 1869, in this Court Royal Archer, No. 1544. It was a dispute about the appointment or election of a surgeon, who was one of the necessary officials to be elected under the rules. The dispute went from the court to the district authorities, and from the district authorities to the high court. The result was that the action of the majority of Court Royal Archer was overthrown, and they were ordered to reverse their decision and to act upon the opposite view. This they neglected to do, and accordingly they were, in terms of the rules, in May 1870, suspended as a court. And being so suspended, in July 1870 the general body under the provisions of the rules, gave a new dispensation in favour of the minority of Court Royal Archer, No. 1544, allowing them to assume both the number and the title which had formerly been assumed by the others, and substantially placing them on the footing on which the suspended court had been.

In 1872 Mr Love, who was one of the minority, and who at the time the suspension had possession of the whole books and papers and documents debt as the treasurer of Court Royal Archer, died. He had retained possessi

No. 40.

Nov. 24, 1874.
Simpson, &c.
v. Ramsay, &c.

of these documents during the whole of that period by the authority of the new dispensation, as the treasurer of the society under this designation. On his death these books and papers were handed by his widow to Mr Ramsay, who was elected to succeed Mr Love on the day of his death. Whether that was or was not a legal proceeding depends entirely on the amount of authority which Mr Love and the persons under the new dispensation were entitled to exercise. And that being done, the present pursuers brought this action to have it found and declared that the funds of Court Royal Archer, No. 1544, belonged to them, and to have the persons who have the custody of these books ordained to deliver them up to them.

The Lord Ordinary has decided that he has no jurisdiction to consider this matter, because, being a dispute between members of this friendly society, it falls under the jurisdiction clause which makes the Sheriff the ultimate tribunal by which these disputes are to be decided.

But from the way in which the case has been presented to us there is a preliminary question. If these members are not members of the friendly society, —if the parties are not members of the same friendly society within the meaning of the Act,—if they or either of them are not Ancient Foresters,—it would rather seem that this is not a dispute between members of the society, but between the society and third parties.

Now, it has been pleaded to us, on the part of the respondents in the reclaiming note, that the persons who now sue are not members of the association of Ancient Foresters at all; and on the other hand, it has been rather suggested on the part of the pursuers, in order to avoid this question of jurisdiction, that they do not claim to be members of the society of Ancient Foresters, but that they do claim to have a right to the funds and books and papers which are the object of the action. And, accordingly, we have thought it right to hear the parties fully on the first plea in law, viz. that the pursuers have no title to sue this action, and in the view that I take of the case it seems to me that it will become unnecessary to consider the question of jurisdiction which the Lord Ordinary has decided. I must say, at the same time, that in one aspect of the statement which is made for the pursuers I think the Lord Ordinary was quite warranted in taking the view that the question of jurisdiction properly arose, seeing that he might fairly read this record as presented on the part of the Court Royal Archer, No. 1544, and embracing a dispute between members of that body.

Now, the objection to the title is this: It is not an objection to the designation of the pursuers, or to the way in which the title is described, but the objection I take to be that the pursuers do not possess the title on which alone they can pretend to sue this action. In other words they are not "trustees of Court Royal Archer, No. 1544, an auxiliary court of the Greenock district of the Ancient Order of Foresters' Friendly Society." It is not that they describe themselves that inaccurately; it is that they do not possess that character.

Now, the first question is, is that sound in point of law? That depends entirely upon the effect, in the first place, of the suspension, and, in the second place, of the new dispensation which has been granted to the defenders. In regard to the suspension, I do not mean to go into the question whether it was legal or illegal,—for this reason, that I do not find that any relevant statement has been made to impeach the legality of the suspension itself. The court of appeal went legally and regularly to work in reversing the judgment of the

No. 40.
Nov. 24, 1874.
Simpson, &c. v. Ramsay, &c.

Court Royal Archer about the surgeon. There can be no doubt that they were ordered to retrace their steps. There can be no doubt that they declined to retrace their steps, and that they were properly and legally suspended under the general rules, and I did not hear, on the part of the pursuers, any ground suggested on which we could refuse to give effect to the suspension. On the contrary, I rather gathered that the pursuers were willing to take the argument on the footing that the suspension was in itself legal and regular. At all events, I have seen no reason to come to any other conclusion. And that being so, what is the effect of it? The effect of it is regulated by law 44, which provides, "that any court, courts, or district remaining under suspension for a period of eighteen calendar months shall, at the expiration of such time, be expelled the order," and that they shall not be reinstated excepting upon particular conditions. Therefore the pursuers of this action have been expelled the Order of Ancient Foresters, and the question is whether, if expelled the order of Ancient Foresters, they can state themselves as trustees of Court Royal Archer, No. 1544. Now, Court Royal Archer, No. 1544, is a friendly society, registered with rules certified by the registrar, providing that they shall be an auxiliary branch of the Ancient Order of Foresters, and that their whole proceedings shall be subject to the general rules of that body. I think that is the simplest of all questions. These trustees, as long as they were trustees under these rules in connection with that body, were by law vested in the whole funds and property of the Court Royal Archer. But the moment they ceased to be members of that general body they ceased to have any corporate capacity at all. And consequently the persons who sue this action have no right whatever to represent Court Royal Archer, a subordinate court of the Ancient Order of Foresters, seeing that they do not belong to the Ancient Order of Foresters, but have been expelled from that body. It seems to me that this is quite sufficient for the solution of this case, for these three persons have in truth been elected, as appears upon the record, since the suspension. I do not know whether it is since the expulsion or not, but it does not much signify. The main thing is, that their authority to sue as trustees, and as vested in the property of Court Royal Archer, depends entirely upon their position as a subordinate court of the Ancient Foresters, from which body, as I have said, they now stand expelled. These books and papers belong to Court Royal Archer, No. 1544, and can only be vested in the trustees legally elected, belonging to the ancient body of Foresters and members of the subordinate court No. 1544.

But then it was argued to us with very great ability,—and it is this question which gives the present case the great importance which unquestionably it possesses,—it was said, that may be quite true in regard to the organisation and in regard to the general constitution of the body; we are not entitled to appeal; we are not entitled to the benefit of the organisation; but we are entitled to those funds which were contributed by ourselves, and to that extent we are a separate association, entitled to sue and to vindicate our right to those funds. Now, I do not see any ground on which that can be maintained to the effect of this action. Setting aside for the present the very important fact that the funeral fund can only be administered through the general body, it would have required a very different action from the present to have established any such position. But I cannot see that the pursuers have any such position which they could possibly establish by any form of action. They have no right to represent a voluntary association; they have no existence whatever excepting

No. 40.

Nov. 24, 1874.
Simpson, &c.
v. Ramsay, &c.

as a subordinate court. These three pursuers have no persona standi, excepting under their set of rules which alone can make them trustees, and alone vest them with funds. It would, indeed, in any view, be a very singular way of giving effect to the general interests of contributors whom they profess to represent, to allow them,—who, apparently, now only represent the minority of the original subscribers,—to carry off these papers and funds in which truly a majority of the original members have the main interest. No equitable interest could be protected by such a course. But I am very clearly of opinion, first, that this is not an action raised on the footing that the association is a separate association apart from their rules; and, in the second place, I am of opinion that these three pursuers could under no circumstances, or at all events could not in the present circumstances, under any title, vindicate the property which they want to recover from the defenders. It has been said that it is very hard that this property should be carried off from those by whom the funds were contributed, but I have no idea that the funds are in any risk whatever of being so diverted. It appears to me that however this dispute about custody is decided this one thing is clear, that the funds are dedicated to specific objects, from which they cannot be diverted, and that whether the defenders succeed in retaining the books or the pursuers in getting possession of them, the beneficiaries under that trust remain substantially the same. How that is to be worked out is a totally different matter. I think it unnecessary for the purposes of this action to decide what the effect of the new dispensation which was granted was, although I entertain an opinion on that subject. I shall only say that it may turn out that the new dispensation, in entirely abrogating the old, and all the privileges it conferred, simply carried over the whole privileges and rights which had been enjoyed under the former, and that those who were elected office-bearers under the new have simply the same power and the same duty of administration which the old trustees had before they were expelled the order. I say that may turn out to be so; and it seems to me not an unlikely or an unreasonable result. But, in the second place, if that were not so, and the persons under the new dispensation were not entitled to and did not come in place of the old, the only result would be that the funds would then be destitute of the legitimate and statutory administration under the rules, and would require to be administered under some judicial authority at common law. That is not an unusual proceeding. It might be that the interposition of the Court might be necessary for that purpose, but whether that would be so, or whether the society would come to be dissolved under the rules, for which there is provision, the result would be the same, viz., that the persons who truly have the beneficial interest in the funds would necessarily be protected in whatever way their rights were given effect to. I give no countenance at all, in the opinion that I have delivered, to the notion that any one who had no interest in the funds before the suspension can attain any benefit by it. What the effect of an expulsion of a member may be on his claim on the funds is another matter altogether, into which it is not necessary for our present purpose that we should enter. And so, upon the whole matter, my opinion is that the three persons who sue this action have no title whatever to make the demand which they have made, and that, consequently, we should dismiss the action on that ground.

LORD NEAVES.—I agree in the views stated by your Lordship. The history and progress of this case is somewhat singular. Looking at the summons, it seems intended to complain of what has been done by the superior body, and to hold that as ineffectual, so that the pursuers shall be held as still in the full enjoyment of the ancient status that belonged to them, notwithstanding the attempts first to suspend, and then to exclude them from the general body. When the case was presented in that aspect, the proper interlocutor was that which the Lord Ordinary pronounced, viz., that it sought a reversal of that which could not be taken cognisance of by this Court, but must be reviewed before the Sheriff, in terms of the statute. But with great ingenuity, when the case came here, that plea of jurisdiction was elided in this way. The pursuers now say,—"We do not complain of expulsion, we have been well suspended and well expelled, but we stand on a basis of our own as an independent friendly society, which has nothing to do with the Ancient Foresters. No doubt, we are going under their name, and taking the No. 1544, and calling ourselves Ancient Foresters, but, in truth, we are very modern Foresters, and were only set up the other day. We do not ask the Court to revoke anything that has been done. We acquiesce in our position, but still we make this claim." Now, that is another aspect of the case, and in that aspect we are obliged to deal with it. If the pursuers are not the Ancient Order of Foresters, No. 1544, but are No. 1 of a new friendly society, we get into this other difficulty, where is your status as connected with the previous state of things? You were well suspended and well expelled, and you have set up in business for yourselves, what then have you to do with the past?

No. 40. Nov. 24, 1874. Simpson, &c. v. Ramsay, &c.

It must be remembered that all this matter with regard to friendly societies is the creature of statute, because at common law no body of this kind has a status or persona at all. They cannot be looked at except as individuals. Now, we may say to the pursuers, where is your statutory character as a friendly society? You are not registered in that way as an independent body. The bye-laws of 1870 set forth that you are an auxiliary branch, and the registrar certifies "that the foregoing rules of the Court Royal Archer, No. 1544, an auxiliary branch of the Greenock district of the Ancient Order of Foresters at Greenock," &c. That was certified by the registrar, not knowing the facts that had taken place. Now, is this body a friendly society in itself? If it is, it is of modern origin, and how does it possess that corporate capacity which alone gives it a continuity of existence? I cannot say that it has any such position. If it is a new society started in 1870, what has it to do with the old books, or with the old funds, as far as administration is concerned? I concur in what your Lordship has said, that the beneficial interests of individuals is a totally different matter, but, in so far as regards status and persona, this body must bring itself to be identical with the old body to whom these books originally belonged, and the parties now disclaim any attempt to prove that. That being the case, I see no persona or status that it has at all.

It is said, as to the pursuers suing as they do under the old name,—"We merely call ourselves by that name, we merely pass under the old name, we are entitled to take up any old name, or any name whatever, and to be registered under any name as a friendly society." But will it give you a title to the books of an old society now held by the genuine body because you have taken up that name? That will never do. Incorporation in one form or other is essential to continuity of existence. There is no other means by which it can be attained—by which the rights of a former generation of people can be communicated to others in a case of this kind without that incorporation that gives them perpetuity or continuity of existence. Now, this is a serious matter, because it cannot be doubted that very great importance is attached to these regulations, and to the law as now altered in this matter. The Legislature obviously conceives that this organisation, when regularly carried out and properly conducted, is of great importance. But then it appears to the Legislature, and to the parties themselves establishing it, to depend upon a certain strictness of subordination, which must be rigidly enforced, so that any one who chooses, or any number of individuals who choose, to hive off in that way cannot claim identity with those who remain behind. When one considers the great objects that such societies have in view it is plain that it would destroy the usefulness of them altogether if they could split and split down, and then carry off proportions of the funds, and disconnect the past with the future, or connect themselves with the past and future without real identity. It is the future payment that may make the past of any avail, and it is on the general completeness of the arrangements both as an insurance office and otherwise that the value of this institution depends. It does a great deal of good, I have no doubt, in many ways. Charity, brotherly good-feeling, and a certain sense of honour and pride in the body may be nurtured in this way, and everything should be done to perpetuate these elements, but then we must conserve the laws, and adopt the precautions which have been laid down by the Legislature. On the whole it appears to me that the pursuers have no status or persona whatever, and that this action cannot be maintained.

What the beneficial interest of individuals may be we have no occasion to enter upon just now. The present point is not the individual benefit. How that is to be settled may be a nice question. What we have to consider is the possession of the documents and funds, and the administration connected therewith, which can only belong to the representatives of the ancient and enduring body, which is still going on. I am inclined to think that the new dispensation places the new body in the position of the old; but it is not necessary to determine that here. It is sufficient, I think, as far as regards status and persona, and right to administer the funds of this society, that the pursuers have admitted themselves out of Court by what they have done, and by now declaring that they acquiesce, and consequently do not invoke any jurisdiction to upset what has been done. Upon these grounds I am clearly of opinion with your Lordship. At the same time I cannot help saying that those who hold these books, and who administer the funds, ought to be carefully on their guard, and well advised that they do not prejudice any individual beneficial rights that have been created by the state of things up to the time that this question arose.

LORD ORMIDALE concurred.

LORD GIFFORD.—I have found this question to be attended with very great nicety and difficulty, and I am sorry to have the misfortune to come to a somewhat different conclusion from the majority of your Lordships. It partially reconciles me to the conclusion which the Court has reached, and the judgment which is now to be pronounced, that I understand all your Lordships to be of opinion, and to hold, that you are not deciding any substantial right of property here—that if there are beneficial rights in the accumulated

No. 40.
Nov. 24, 1874.
Simpson, &c. v. Ramsay, &c.

funds of this society, money in the bank, the result of many years' accumulation, or other property—heritable it may be, or moveable—to which the Court Royal Archer was entitled, no decision is pronounced as to whom that property now belongs to beneficially, or who are entitled to share in it. Still the question which is raised by this action seems to me to be one of very great importance, and as I differ from the conclusion to which your Lordships have come, I shall mention in a very few sentences the grounds of my difficulty. It appears to me that according to the laws of this society—I mean the whole three sets of laws, for the Court Royal Archer, No. 1544, has a set of laws of its own which are separately registered by the registrar of friendly societies, and which no doubt embodied the other two sets of laws, that of the District Foresters of Greenock, and that of the Ancient General Order of Foresters—looking to these three sets of rules, I think the Court Royal Archer, No. 1544, was a separate and independent corporation. I think it was a distinct society, which had the power to hold property, which could sue or be sued, and which could exercise all the functions of a friendly society independent either of the district society of Greenock, or of the Ancient Order of Foresters—the general and very large body over all the kingdom. And therefore, while no doubt it was affiliated, and had a certain connection with the general order, I cannot hold that the general order was the only friendly society. The friendly society was the Court Royal Archer, No. 1544. We are not here in a question with either the district or with the general order. The whole question before us relates to Court Royal Archer Friendly Society bearing that name, No. 1544.

Now, a dispute arose among the members of this society, and under the rules an appeal was taken, which ultimately resulted in the executive council suspending the Court Royal Archer Friendly Society. But it appears to me that that suspension did not disincorporate the society. It was still a friendly society; it was still entitled to do certain acts, every act, in short, which a friendly society could do, and to enjoy all the privileges, excepting those acts and privileges which resulted from its connection with the general body. It was an affiliated society, the affiliation of which was for a time suspended, but that did not kill the child or put an end to it altogether; still less—and that is the point where my difficulty becomes greatest—still less did it deprive it of its property and put the whole funds (and it may be very large funds) into the hands either of the district of Greenock, or of the Ancient Order in Leeds, or wherever else it may be. It was a suspended friendly society, suspended from connection with the general body, but still existing, still holding its own property, and capable of exercising and making good its separate and independent rights. Supposing a question had arisen regarding its own property—its society hall for instance, for it might hold heritable property—supposing such a question had arisen at the time of its suspension, could it be held that it had no locus standi? Could it not have protected its property? Could it not have bought more property notwithstanding its suspension? No doubt it had not during suspension the privileges of a connected society, but still it was a society.

Now, that state of matters goes on for some time, and a considerable period elapses, the period fixed by the general rules, which make the suspension final, and then a new dispensation is issued, and it is said that that transferred the whole rights of the original Court Royal Archer, No. 1544, to a continued body, I do not say (for they disclaim that) to a new body, but to a continued body of Court Royal Archer, No. 1544, which was created under the new dispensation

No. 40.

Nov. 24, 1874.
Simpson, &c.
v. Ramsay, &c.

of 21st July 1870. Now, this raises a question of considerable difficulty, and I have carefully looked at the laws to see whether the general body—the high court or the district court—in any case whatever, had power over the separate property of the individual court, so that they could either transfer it to a different court or create a new body giving it such continuity as to take over the property of the old. I do not find in the laws any power of that kind. I do not think the high court was ever intended to be vested with the power to take the property of any individual court, and hand it over either to a new body under the same name, or to any other body under a different name. In truth, the power of issuing dispensations is not a power of incorporation. That is a power which the Legislature alone can give. The meaning of the dispensation is not a statement by the Ancient Order that they are creating a new body —a new friendly society having a statutory title. It just means this, that they allow any number, viz., in the present case three individuals, and any number who may associate with them, to incorporate themselves under the statute as a new body. That is all. Now, they have so incorporated themselves, at least it is held so. But that does not affect this question of property. It is said that one of the parties has now the majority, but I do not think anything turns upon that. The question regarding the property of the old Court Royal Archer, No. 1544, which has been accumulating for twenty years, cannot be affected by a dispensation which the general court issues to other members, it may be the minority, it may be, for aught I know, strangers, who are to incorporate themselves, in virtue of that dispensation, in connection with the general body.

A difficulty no doubt arises in this case, that the view I am taking would import that there were two friendly societies having the same name, Court Royal Archer, No. 1544, but that is a technical difficulty which I cannot help, and which I do not think incapacitates this Court from determining or entering on the question, for I am speaking just now to the question of title to sue. If I can find that the pursuers of this action, setting themselves forth as trustees of a friendly society, registered in conformity with law, have really that standing, then I think we are bound to go on to the merits of the case, and not to throw out this action as an action brought by a party who has no title. Even were we to hold that the title which the pursuers claim, Court Royal Archer, No. 1544, is a title to which they had no right, that would not destroy the title to sue. They would still be a body holding property. It would not annul their infeftment supposing they were infeft. It would not make it impossible for them to sue a removing against their tenants, if they had any tenants. In short, I cannot think that the suspension, or the new dispensation either, had the effect of disincorporating the old body which was incorporated by registration, and transferring all their rights to a new body consisting of those who incorporate themselves under the new dispensation. The new dispensation bears that the Ancient Order of Foresters "give our consent, approbation, and authority, to our well-beloved brothers, &c., or those who may hereafter legally succeed them," to hold a regular court. The words of the dispensation seem to confer, it may be, the old name, but the old name on substantially a new body, for Ramsay, and Pearson, and Reid were certainly not Court Royal Archer, No. 1544, at the date when the new dispensation was issued, and those who united themselves with them would not one of them originally be members of the Court Royal Archer, No. 1544. Therefore, the difficulty about having two friendly societies bearing the same name is just an awkwardness, but does not affect the substantial question between the parties. And accordingly, as I read the laws, provision is actually made in the general laws for a district society seceding from the general body, and still continuing to be a society. For the very first regulation under the general laws is this, that one of the purposes of the general society shall be to provide a fund for the support and protection of those members who vote in the minority of any court that may break up, that is, that may dissolve itself, or that may secede from the order. So that it contemplates a court seceding from the order, meaning, as I understand, a court still, that is, a friendly society still, though no longer one of the friendly societies in connection with the order. The impression which I have formed on a consideration of this case is that, in a question of title to sue, the parties here are right enough, and that therefore we must proceed with the merits. And that brings us to the second question, viz., Is the dispute which has arisen a dispute which under the laws must be referred to arbiters, or a dispute which, there being no such provision in the rules, must go the Sheriff? If I were to go into that I would feel inclined to hold that it is not such a dispute as must go either to arbiters (and none of the parties maintain that) or to the Sheriff. I think it is a question regarding the accumulated property of an old friendly society, which (I do not say whether rightly or wrongly, or how it has happened) has been cut off from the general body, but which, so far as its property is concerned, is still in existence, and entitled to appeal to the Court regarding it. And therefore, I feel very great difficulty in respect of the considerations which I have pointed out; but the result of the opinion in which I have the misfortune to find myself in a minority of one, and which, therefore, I cannot entertain with very great confidence, is that we must go on with this case, and decide it on its merits. It is not one of those cases sent to the Sheriff by the statute; then it must necessarily be entertained in this Court, and we must consider the merits; and a consideration of the merits might result in this, that the original purpose for which this fund was subscribed having expired or come to an end, the fund must be divided rateably (for I can conceive a result of that kind), among the beneficiaries. I do not dwell upon that, but the result at which I have arrived is that we should sustain the title to sue, and proceed to consider the merits of the case.

No. 40.
Nov. 24, 1874.
Simpson, &c. v. Ramsay, &c.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the interlocutor complained of: Sustain the first plea for the defenders: Find that the pursuers have no title to sue, and therefore dismiss the action, and decern: Find the defenders entitled to expenses," &c.

M'CAUL & ARMSTRONG, S.S.C.—WILLIAM ARCHIBALD, S.S.C.—Agents.

JOHN ADAM AND JOHN SPOWART, Petitioners and Respondents.—Balfour.
JAMES MOIR Junior (Clerk to the Commissioners of Police of Alloa), Respondent and Appellant.—Asher—Moncreiff.

No. 41.
Nov. 24, 1874.
Adam and Another v. Commissioners of Police of Alloa.

Sheriff—Appeal—Statute 25 and 26 Vict. c. 101, Police and Improvement Act, 1862, secs. 135, 396, and 397—Nuisance.—The Police and Improvement Act 1862, sec. 135, gives power to the commissioners to erect public urinals, "but so that such erection shall not become a nuisance," and declares that "any householder (i.e. any male occupier of lands and premises of the requisite yearly value) who thinks himself aggrieved thereby may appeal to the Sheriff in manner after provided." The only subsequent provisions as to appeal are contained in the 396th and 397th sections, the former of which allows appeal against an order of the commissioners "within seven days next after the making of any such order," and the latter renders the Sheriff's judgment on such appeal final.

Held that a petition at the instance of the proprietor of a house in a burgh praying for the removal as a nuisance of a urinal erected by the police commissioners was competent at common law.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Clackmannan. I.

JOHN ADAM and John Spowart, owner and tenant respectively of two shops and a dwelling-house in Candle Street, Alloa, presented a petition to the Sheriff of Clackmannan against the clerk to the commissioners of police of the burgh of Alloa, complaining of the erection by the commissioners on 20th August 1874 of a public urinal in Candle Street, opposite or nearly opposite to the entrance of the above mentioned premises, and craving an order on the commissioners to remove the urinal and to restore the street to its former condition. The petition set forth as the grounds of the application that the urinal was erected without the petitioners' knowledge, and without the commissioners giving them or the factor for the property any notice of their intention to erect it, or offering to make compensation to them, or either of them, for any injury which might be thereby occasioned to them. No notice of any kind was given of the commissioners' intention to erect the urinal, and it was erected by them illegally without authority, without following out the order prescribed by the "General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862," and contrary to the provisions of that Act. The urinal was and would be and become a nuisance to the public, and more especially to the petitioners. It would interrupt the public traffic in Candle Street, which was already too narrow for the same. It darkened their premises, being placed opposite or nearly opposite to one of the windows of one of the shops. It was otherwise offensive to them and to the customers frequenting the shops, and it would prevent carts and other carriages from coming to or drawing up at the doors of the shops.

The respondent stated in defence this preliminary plea;—(1) The action is incompetent, no appeal having been taken as provided for by the Police Act.*

* The Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862, 25 and 26 Vict. c. 101, enacts, section 135,—"The commissioners may erect such public water-closets, privies, and urinals within the burgh, and in such situations as they think fit, and may defray the expense thereof, and of keeping the same in good order, and may make compensation for any injury occasioned to any person by the erection thereof, out of the police assessment, but so that such erection shall not become a nuisance, and any householder who thinks himself aggrieved thereby may appeal to the Sheriff in manner after provided."

Sec. 396.—"Any person liable to pay or to contribute towards the expense of any of the works aforesaid, or otherwise aggrieved by any order of the commissioners relating thereto, may at any time within seven days next after the

No. 41.

Nov. 24, 1874. Adam and Another v. Commissioners of Police of Alloa.

The Sheriff-substitute (Bennet Clark), on 28th September 1874, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard parties' procurators on the closed record, and the respondent's objection to the competency of the petition, repels said objection, and finds that the petition is competent; and, before farther answer, allows the parties a proof of their respective averments on record," &c.

The respondent appealed.

On the order of the Sheriff (Monro) the clerk to the commissioners put in a minute stating that the resolution of the commissioners to erect the urinal in question was contained in a minute of meeting, of date 27th April 1874, which bore that the meeting was specially called on the requisition of two individual commissioners, and that it was resolved thereat, inter alia, to erect urinals in certain streets, and to remit to the improvement committee to fix the exact sites. The respondent's minute also stated that the meetings of the commissioners were all open to the public and to newspaper reporters, but that no notice was given of the resolution come to to erect the urinal in question. It did not state that any public notice was given of the meeting of the 27th April 1874, or of the object for which it was called.

---

making of any such order, give notice in writing to the commissioners that he intends to appeal against such order to the Sheriff, and, along with such notice, he shall give a statement in writing of the grounds of the appeal; and if within four days next after giving such notice the party grant bond to the Sheriff, with two sufficient cautioners, to the satisfaction of the Sheriff, to abide the order of the Sheriff, and pay such costs as shall be awarded by the Sheriff thereupon, the work so appealed against shall not be begun until after the judgment of the Sheriff upon such appeal," &c.

Sec. 397.—"And in respect to appeal as to all other matters and things which the commissioners are by the police provisions of the Act empowered to do or perform or to authorise to be done or performed, and the cost attending which falls by this Act to be provided for by way of private improvement assessment (see section 103), the commissioners shall, where not otherwise hereby directed, give notice of their intention to do or perform or to authorise to be done or performed such matter or thing, either by public advertisement in some newspaper circulating in the burgh or in the county in which the burgh is situated, or by posting handbills in conspicuous places in the burgh, or by notice in writing to be transmitted through the post-office or delivered personally or at their dwelling-houses, to the individuals having interest, as the commissioners shall think proper, and it shall be lawful for any person whose property shall be taken or affected, and who shall consider himself injured or aggrieved in respect of such other matters or things by this Act so directed to be done or performed and provided for, to appeal to the Sheriff from any order made or notice given by the commissioners in respect of such matters or things in the manner and to the effect herein last of all provided and directed, and if such matter or thing shall not be made the subject of appeal to the Sheriff or being appealed shall be allowed by him, the commissioners may proceed with the same, and levy the assessments in reference thereto authorised by this Act, provided always that all such appeals provided for in this Act, the immediately preceding clause, and all other appeals to the Sheriff allowed by this Act not otherwise provided for, shall be disposed of summarily, and the decision of the Sheriff shall in all cases be final and conclusive, and not subject to review by suspension, reduction, or advocation, or in any manner of way."

Sec. 3.—(Interpretation clause) . . . . "The word 'householder' shall mean a male occupier of lands or premises of the yearly value of £10 or upwards in all burghs, except in populous places containing less than one thousand inhabitants, and in populous places containing less than that number of inhabitants it shall mean a male occupier of lands or premises of the yearly value of £6 or upwards."

The Sheriff, on 18th October 1874, adhered to the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute of 28th September preceding.* No. 41.

Nov. 24, 1874.
Adam and Another v. Commissioners of Police of Alloa.

* "NOTE.—The complaint of the petitioners, the proprietor and tenant respectively of a shop and dwelling-house in Candle Street, Alloa, is that the urinal in question is an obstruction to the street, and specially to the access to their own premises, and is, and will be, in other respects, a nuisance; and the prayer is that it shall be removed. It is not maintained by the defenders, the magistrates of Alloa, that at common law this petition is incompetent or irrelevant. The defence is, that the act of the magistrates in placing the urinal there is within their powers under section 135 of the statute, and cannot be called in question unless by appeal under the statute; and that no appeal having been taken, there is now no remedy open to the petitioners except a claim for compensation. On the other hand, the petitioners deny that the present application is excluded by the statute."—(Quotes section 135; see note, supra, p. 143.) "Upon this section sundry observations occur:—(1) It does not apply to the petitioner, Mr Adam, who is only the proprietor, and resides in Leith, and does not fall within the definition of a householder in section 3. (2) The provision that any aggrieved householder may appeal to the Sheriff 'in manner after provided' is of difficult application, for the mode of appeal 'after provided' cannot be literally followed in this case. The only section providing an appeal which can be in the view of said section 135 is section 396 (section 397 being limited to cases of private improvement assessment.) Now, section 396 enacts."—(Quotes section 396; see note, supra, p. 144.) "Upon this section it may be observed, 1st, That the allowance to any person aggrieved by any order of the commissioners relative to works cannot override the marked omission of the owner in the 135th section, especially where he is, as here, not aggrieved by any order, but by an act done without either definite order or previous notice. 2d, That neither the owner nor the householder can be bound to give notice of an intention to appeal against an order where no order has been made (the resolution of the commissioners being merely to erect urinals in certain streets, and requesting the committee to fix the precise sites), and no notice of the intended work given; and, 3d, That the provision that the work appealed against shall not be begun until the Sheriff gives judgment is inapplicable to a case where the work is already done, and without notice. If, therefore, the provision for an appeal in the 135th section is to be carried out that must be either, on the one hand, by holding that such appeal need not comply with the various conditions precedent prescribed in the 396th section, or it must be held that a previous order and notice are by implication requisite before the erection of any privy or urinal, and that where such order and notice are neglected the commissioners lose the special protection of the appeal clauses, and become subject to the ordinary administration of justice. In the former view, the present petition may be held as an appeal under the statute, and, if necessary, a slight alteration on its title, so as to make it 'Petition of Appeal,' might make it sufficient. In the second view it is open to no objection; and, in either view, it admits of being maintained that this petition is protected by section 438, which provides that 'no jurisdiction conferred by this Act shall be held to exclude the jurisdiction of any Sheriff or Court of Guild, where the case shall, in the first instance, have been brought before or taken up by such Sheriff or Court of Guild.'

"Reverting to section 135, it is difficult to suppose that the Legislature, in authorising commissioners to put down privies and urinals 'in such situations as they think fit,' meant that they might do so free from any check or control, or any respect for the rights of others. A substantial power is given, although no such startling construction be adopted; for they are authorised to make such erections out of the public funds in their charge, and thus, if no objection arises ab extra, they are protected against any question as to want of power. The clause surely does not empower them to put down such conveniences within a gentleman's garden or parterre, or in the courtyard of his house, against his will. They have no power to appropriate private property, even on compensation, except under the Land Clauses Act—(see section 390). If, then, the clause

No. 41.

Nov. 24, 1874. Adam and Another v. Commissioners of Police of Alloa.

The clerk to the commissioners appealed to the Court of Session.

Argued for the appellant;—The application of the respondents to the Sheriff was an incompetent proceeding. The Police and Improvement Act, 1862, under sections 135 and 396, provided a statutory method of appeal to the Sheriff against the erection of public urinals, &c., by the commissioners, while section 397 enacted that the Sheriff's decisions in all appeals allowed by the Act should be final, and not subject to review. The respondents had failed to take advantage of the statutory mode of appeal, and had afterwards gone to the Sheriff under his common law jurisdiction,[1] which was necessarily excluded. While the commissioners were willing to waive objections, and allow the case to proceed as a statutory appeal before the Sheriff, with the consequent finality, they objected to its being allowed to go on under his common law jurisdiction, with the possibility of appeal to the Court of Session and House of Lords.

Argued for the respondents, petitioners in the inferior Court;—The contention of the appellant proceeded on a misapprehension of the 135th section. By that section it was committed to the commissioners to judge of the necessity and expediency of erecting public urinals, &c., and of the appropriateness of the sites chosen. On this question of discretion an appeal lay to the Sheriff under the provisions of the statute. But then the powers conferred on the commissioners by section 135 of the Act were guarded by this proviso, "but so that such erection shall not become a nuisance." If the erection either was in itself, or became in the using a nuisance, the commissioners were acting beyond their powers, and there was no limit to the remedy. If there was a statutory form of appeal, remedy might be had under the statute; but whether there was or not, there was nothing to exclude a common law action.

In the present case, however, the statutory form of appeal did not apply. It was contended that it was limited by section 396 to seven days after the making of an "order" by the commissioners. If so, then it was necessarily to be presumed that notice of such order must be given, and the limitation could only apply to the case of objections to the exercise of the commissioners' discretion in making such order, not to the case of nuisance arising after the order had been carried out. It could not be that, in the latter case, the petitioners were to be left without remedy. Either, then, the limits of time contained in section 396 were inapplicable to the present case, and the petition might be read as a statutory appeal, or the method of statutory appeal was itself inapplicable, and the application to the common law jurisdiction of the Sheriff was a competent and proper course of proceeding.

---

does not give unlimited and despotic power there must be a limit, and that limit is naturally furnished by the rights of others as protected by law. The withdrawal of that protection of the rights of the lieges which is afforded by the ordinary Courts of law is not to be readily implied, and not to be established except by unambiguous legislation.—See Colt v. Caledonian Railway Company, 2d July 1859, 21 D., p. 1118, per Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis. It is to be observed that while in this Act the decision of the Sheriff on appeals is declared final and unreviewable (see close of section 397), there is not,—except in the case of private improvement assessments under section 397, where careful previous notice is provided,—any declaration of finality of an act of the commissioners in the case where no appeal is taken. An appeal is an appropriate remedy where there is an order or judgment, but not where there is merely a fact or misfeasance of a party complained of; but it may be doubted whether this obvious distinction has been always kept in view by the framers of the statute."

[1] Smeaton v. Commissioners of Police of St Andrews, May 17, 1865, 3 Macph. 816, 37 Scot. Jur. 422.

No. 41.

Nov. 24, 1874. Adam and Another v. Commissioners of Police of Alloa.

But, farther, in any event, it was only the householder, i.e., according to the interpretation clause, the occupier, who was even by the terms of the 135th section limited to the statutory form of appeal. Whatever might be said, therefore, of a common law application at the instance of the tenant, it was undoubtedly good at the instance of the landlord.[1]

At advising,—

LORD NEAVES.—This case involves questions of considerable importance in more respects than one. But after a careful consideration I am not disposed to disturb the judgment arrived at by the Sheriffs.

The power conferred on the commissioners by the 135th section of the statute is one which may be exercised in a way very beneficial to the community, but at the same time very detrimental to individuals and very irritating and offensive. The power accordingly is guarded by one precaution which it is impossible to overlook. That precaution is embodied in these words,—"But so that such erection shall not become a nuisance, and any householder who thinks himself aggrieved thereby may appeal to the Sheriff in manner after provided." Now, unfortunately there is no very distinct provision "after provided" on this subject; for the Act was not framed with that caution and completeness which we would have expected in a measure of such public importance.

Now, the question is, what are we to do in the present case. No notice of the intended erection was ever given by the commissioners. It is said indeed that no notice was needed. But in the absence of notice I think it would be very difficult to find a terminus for the running of the inducice which gives finality to the resolutions of the commissioners. On the other hand the only person entitled to complain in the statutory manner is the householder or occupier. Still we cannot lay out of sight the provision that "the erection shall not become a nuisance." Here we have it not only alleged by the tenant or householder, but also by the proprietor, who, though not a householder in the sense of the Act, has even a more substantial interest in the property, that the erection "is and will be and become" a nuisance. This he offers to prove, and goes to the Sheriff under his common law jurisdiction—for I cannot hold this as a statutory application—and the Sheriff allows him a proof before answer. Whatever might have been the result had the householder alone presented this petition, about which I do not seek to inquire, I cannot hold it incompetent to entertain it at the instance of the proprietor, who, though he may not have the statutory qualification to complain or appeal in the manner provided by the statute, certainly had a decided interest to obtain a remedy. I do not say what is to be the precise construction of this 135th clause. I do not attempt to define the term "nuisance" there occurring. It may suffer a qualification to the effect that the erection shall merely not become a nuisance beyond what is in nature to be. But these are matters for the Sheriff's consideration on the proof when led.

I may add that I do not concur in the Sheriff-depute's view that the petition we have before us may become a means of obtaining the statutory review. I

[1] Scott v. Leith Police Commissioners, May 29, 1830, 8 S. 845, 2 Scot. Jur. 425, and March 7, 1835, 13 S. 646, 7 Scot. Jur. 317; Young v. Henderson, March 3, 1855, 27 Scot. Jur. 241; Campbell v. Leith Police Commissioners, H. of L. Feb. 28, 1870, 8 Macph. 31, 42 Scot. Jur. 310; Millar's Trustees v. Leith Police Commissioners, July 19, 1873, 11 Macph. 932, 45 Scot. Jur. 578.

No. 41.
Nov. 24, 1874.
Adam and Another v. Commissioners of Police of A[illegible] cannot understand such a hybrid form of process, which is to develop into one form or the other as the case proceeds. The questions whether the place chosen is the fittest possible, and whether the erection is a nuisance, are perfectly distinct. If the petitioners establish their averment of nuisance they place the commissioners outwith the statute altogether, for the statute does not give them power to erect a nuisance. In the circumstances I think that the Sheriff was perfectly right in allowing a proof before answer.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD GIFFORD concurred.

LORD ORMIDALE was absent.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Having heard counsel on the appeal, dismiss the same, and affirm the interlocutors appealed against: Remit the cause to the Sheriff to proceed with the same, and find the respondents entitled to expenses."

M'EWEN & CARMENT, W.S.—KEEGAN & WELSH, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 42.
Nov. 24, 1874.
Laidlaw and Sons v. Wilson and Armstrong.

WILLIAM LAIDLAW AND SONS, Petitioners and Respondents.—D.-F. Clark—Trayner.
WILSON AND ARMSTRONG, Respondents and Appellants.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—J. C. Smith.

Process—Appeal—Sheriff—Jury Trial—Proof—Statutes 6 Geo. IV., c. 120, sec. 40, and 30 and 31 Vict., c. 100, sec. 73.—Where a case, appealed from the Sheriff-court for jury trial, appeared to the Court not suitable for trial by jury, a proof before answer was allowed before one of the Judges of the Division (dies. Lord Ormidale, who held that the case should have been remitted for proof in the Sheriff-court, so as to preclude appeal on the facts to the House of Lords).

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Roxburghshire. I.

THIS was a petition in the Sheriff-court of Roxburghshire at the instance of William Laidlaw and Sons, manufacturers, Hawick, against Wilson and Armstrong, also manufacturers there, for the purpose of recovering certain lots of wool, or the value thereof, alleged to have been embezzled by Thomas Davidson, a warehouseman, with whom they had been deposited by the petitioners, and by him sold to the respondents.

The case involved many difficult questions of law, as of principal and agent, deposit, presumption from possession, bona fide purchase, bona fide consumption, &c., which would arise on the evidence.

The respondents appealed for jury trial in terms of 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, sec. 40, and 31 and 32 Vict., c. 100, sec. 73.

On the case appearing in the roll of the Second Division, the petitioners, the respondents in the appeal, objected to the case being sent to a jury, on the ground that in its nature it was unsuited for jury trial.

The respondents, appellants in the Court of Session, objected to the competency of sending the case to proof in that Court without a jury, and to the expediency of remitting it to the Sheriff.[1]

The petitioners and respondents replied;—The case of Dennistoun decided only that an appellant coming to this Court for jury trial was not entitled to turn round and ask a proof without a jury. Their case as respondents was different. They were brought to the Court of Session

[1] Dennistoun v. Rainey, Knox, and Company, May 16, 1871, 9 Macph. 739, 43 Scot. Jur. 408.

No. 42.

Nov. 24, 1874.

Laidlaw and Sons v. Wilson and Armstrong.

against their will, and strongly objected to the case being sent to a jury. It was a case of mixed fact and law, and now that it was in this Court it would be best disposed of by a proof before a Judge without a jury.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think there would be insuperable difficulty in framing issues so as to place this case properly before a jury. And I am of opinion, therefore, that we should allow a proof before answer, which I propose should be led before one of ourselves, and not before the Sheriff on a remit.

LORD ORMIDALE.—I desire to state the grounds on which I feel myself unable to concur with your Lordship in thinking that proof in this case should be taken before one of the Judges of this Court. In Dennistoun v. Rainey, Knox, and Company (May 16, 1871, 9 Macph. 739), referred to in the discussion, it was assumed, and rightly I think, that while it was competent for either party, on proof being allowed in the Sheriff-court, to appeal for jury trial, it was also competent for this Court, in the appeal, if they considered the case for some sufficient reason altogether untenable, to dismiss it;—or, in other words, that it was competent, on the ground of irrelevancy or other preliminary plea, to quash the proceedings without either sending it to a jury or to probation in any shape. But here neither party maintains that the case is of such a character that we can so dispose of it at once. Both parties concurred in stating that there must be investigation. One asked for a jury trial, while the other insisted for a proof before one of the Judges of this Court. Neither of them desired that the case should be sent back to the Sheriff. I am disposed to think with all your Lordships that there ought to be investigation, and that as some difficult questions of law may not unlikely arise, it may be expedient that a proof be allowed before answer rather than send the case to a jury. But, then, I very much doubt whether, having regard to the case of Dennistoun v. Rainey, Knox, and Company, the proof ought to be taken in this Court. It rather appears to me that the case ought to be sent back to the Sheriff-court to be proceeded with there. In that way, if the case should afterwards come before us, our findings on the facts proved will be conclusive, and not appealable to the House of Lords, and thus effect would be given to section 40 of the Judicature Act, 6 Geo. IV., c. 120, as explained by the Lord President in Dennistoun's case. If, on the other hand, we allow a proof here, our judgment on the facts might be taken by appeal to the House of Lords, contrary to the spirit and intention of that Act, and in opposition to the precedent we have in the case of Dennistoun. It is true that there it was the party who appealed, on the footing that it was a jury trial he wanted, who desired that the proof should be taken before a Judge in this Court; but I am unable to see how it can affect the principles on which the Court proceeded, or the statutory provisions bearing on the matter, which party is the advocator or appellant of the process to this Court. For these reasons, and as it is right that in a question of procedure uniformity of decision should be observed, I am clearly of opinion that the present case ought to be sent back to the Sheriff-court that the proof may be taken in ordinary form.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—On the competency of the course which I have proposed I do not think it necessary to say much. I should be reluctant to come to the conclusion that when a case has been brought into this Court it is not competent for us to do justice between the parties by ordering what we conceive to be the most appropriate inquiry into the facts. I see nothing either in the statute or in the case of Dennistoun, which has been referred to, which leads to that conclusion. In that case the Court refused to allow the appellant the option of a jury trial, or a proof before answer in this Court. But that is no authority to compel us either to send the case to a jury or to remit it to the Sheriff, if we are satisfied that another course is more appropriate. It may be that to remit the case to the Sheriff would prevent the case going on the facts to the House of Lords. But I cannot say that, in my opinion, in a case of such mixed fact and law as this is, it is altogether an unmixed evil that the House of Lords might have both the disputed matters of fact and the questions of law before them in the event of an appeal.

No. 42.

Nov. 24, 1874. Laidlaw and Sons v. Wilson and Armstrong.

LORD NEAVES.—It is not every one who remembers the circumstances which led to the passing of the Judicature Act of 1825. It was passed generally to remedy existing evils, and the 40th section was introduced to remedy one particular evil, namely, the want of finality in Sheriff-court judgments upon evidence. There then existed, and very naturally, a strong feeling against allowing cases to run the gauntlet of all the Courts below and then to be appealable to the House of Lords on questions of fact. But I think that this feeling of repugnance to cases going to the House of Lords on questions arising on proof has been considerably relaxed in later years. Had the pursuer brought his case here in the first instance we should have had to consider whether it was one for jury trial, in which case there would have been a final judgment on the facts, unless a new trial had to be granted, or whether it was one for a proof, in which case the questions of fact, as well as of law, might have been taken to the House of Lords, and they would have seen the real case out of which the questions of law arose. There has, I think, been considerable change in the feeling of the profession and of the Legislature on this matter. And if I can satisfy my mind that a case, however it may have been brought into this Court, is one that should be tried by means of a proof in this Court, I am inclined to direct that that course should be followed, there being no special and plain impediment. The case of Dennistoun was quite different, and I do not see that what we propose to do here is at all inconsistent with the decision of the other Division in that case.

LORD GIFFORD concurred.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Having heard counsel on the appeal, before answer allow both parties a proof of their respective averments, and to the petitioners a conjunct probation: Grant diligence against witnesses and havers; and appoint the proof to proceed before Lord Gifford at such time and place as his Lordship may fix."

ADAM SHIELL, S.S.C.—DAVID DOVE, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 43.

Nov. 27, 1874. Goetze v. Aders, &c.

FRIEDRICH GOETZE AND SOHN AND OTHERS, Petitioners.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Trayner.
ADERS, PREYER, AND COMPANY, Respondents.—D.-F. Clark—Balfour.

Bankruptcy—Foreign—Forum Competens.—The mercantile sequestration of a bankrupt in a foreign country renders a subsequent award of sequestration in Scotland incompetent.

No. 43.

Nov. 27, 1874.
Goetze v. Aders, &c.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Shand.
B.

THE firm of F. Goetze and Sohn, spinners at Glauchau, in Saxony, was, upon their suspension of payment, declared bankrupt by decree of the Court of the Prince and Count of Schönburg, at Glauchau, pronounced on the 2d January 1874; and on the 3d of January Richard Clauss, advocate, was appointed trustee upon the estate.

On the 6th December 1873 the firm of Messrs Aders, Preyer, and Company, of Bradford, to whom it was alleged Goetze and Sohn were indebted in the sum of £2668, 15s. 6d., had used arrestments jurisdictionis fundandæ causa, and had attached certain goods belonging to the alleged debtors, partly in the hands of Messrs F. Bentzen and Company, of Glasgow, partly in those of Messrs Sinclair and Mitchell of the same place.

On the 8th December 1873 action for payment of said sum had been raised in the Court of Session by Messrs Aders, Preyer, and Company, who, on the 13th January 1874, had further, on the dependence of said action, procured the arrestment of the said goods which had been attached, in the first instance, jurisdictionis fundandæ causa only.

On the 4th February 1874 the firm of F. Goetze and Sohn, Johann Friedrich Goetze, the only partner of that firm, and the trustee in bankruptcy, Richard Clauss, with concurrence of one of the creditors, Carl August Oberlander, a creditor of F. Goetze and Sohn, presented a petition to the Lord Ordinary, praying that, under the 13th section of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, sequestration should be awarded of the entire property belonging to the firm of F. Goetze and Sohn as a company, and of Johann Friedrich Goetze, as a partner thereof or as an individual.

Aders, Preyer, and Company lodged objections to the petition, on the ground, 1st, that no jurisdiction had been founded by the arrestments; and 2d, that the prior Saxon concourse process or sequestration rendered a second sequestration incompetent.

The Lord Ordinary refused the prayer of the petition on the first of these grounds.

The petitioner reclaimed.[1]

After hearing counsel, the Court ordered a case to be prepared and laid before German counsel.

The case put the following queries:—"1. Does the sequestration in Saxony give the trustee in said sequestration a preferable or first exclusive right over the whole estate of the bankrupts, F. Goetze and Sohn, and Johann Friedrich Goetze, situated beyond, as well as within, the realm of Saxony? 2. Is the right of the trustee over the estate of the bankrupts situated beyond the realm of Saxony in any respect inferior to his right over the estate within the realm? 3. Does this right of the trustee over the estate of the bankrupts situated beyond the realm of Saxony require in any case, and if so, in what, to be completed by a supplementary sequestration or similar process before the Courts of the country in which such estate is situated?"

Professor Doctor Endemann, Jena, returned an opinion in which the answers given were as follows:—"1. According to the German bankruptcy law, as prevailing in Saxony, the institution of concourse on the firm of F. Goetze and Sohn and Johann Friedrich Goetze confers on

---

[1] Petitioners' Authorities.—Cole v. Flammare, Aug. 4, 1772, M. 4820; Act 9 Geo. IV. c. 72, sec. 22; Joel v. Gill, June 10, 1859, 21 D. 929, 31 Scot. Jur. 511.

Respondents' Authorities.—Burns v. Monro, July 18, 1844, 6 D. 1352, 16 Scot. Jur. 583; Thomson v. Whitehead, Jan. 25, 1862, 24 D. 331, 34 Scot. Jur. 163.

No. 43.
Nov. 27, 1874.
Goetze v. Aders, &c.

the trustee in bankruptcy a right to the property of the bankrupt situated as well without as within the realm of Saxony. This right is in itself exclusive, because it appertains to the representative of the entire body of the creditors appearing in the concourse, who alone have a right to satisfaction, and that out of the whole of the property constituting the estate in bankruptcy. 2. The right of the German trustee in bankruptcy to the property of the bankrupts beyond the realm of Saxony is in no respect weaker than his right to the property situated within the realm or within the German Empire. 3. The third query is to be negatived in toto. The right of the trustee in bankruptcy to the property situated beyond Saxony is not dependent on any such measure as is suggested therein."

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a petition praying for sequestration of the estates of Messrs Goetze and Sohn, spinners, Glauchau, in Schönburg, Saxony, and of Johann Friedrich Goetze, the only individual partner of that firm. It is stated in the petition that the affairs of this trading firm having become embarrassed, they find it necessary to apply for sequestration. They further state, "that the affairs of the said F. Goetze and Sohn, and of the said Johann Friedrich Goetze, the only partner of said firm, having become embarrassed, they found it necessary to stop payment, and to apply for concourse process or sequestration of their estates in the Court, at Glauchau, of the Prince and Count of Schönburg, in Saxony, which was awarded on the 2d day of January 1874, and the petitioner, Richard Clauss, was appointed trustee on said estates by said Court on the 3d day of said month of January 1874."

Mr Goetze's only place of business was within the kingdom of Saxony, but he had a foreign trade and foreign correspondents. At the date of the concourse process or sequestration there were certain funds belonging to Goetze in the hands of Messrs F. Bentzen and Company, and also certain funds in the hands of Messrs Sinclair and Mitchell in Glasgow. These goods were arrested by English creditors previous to the Saxon sequestration. On the 4th of February the petition was presented to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, and on the same date the petition was refused. The petitioner reclaimed, and at this stage of the case the arresting creditors appeared to oppose the awarding of the sequestration. We heard parties, but found it impossible to decide without knowing what their rights were under the Saxon sequestration. We were in hopes that the parties would lay before us a statement of what their rights were under the Saxon law. This led to considerable delay, and when it was found that the parties could not agree, it became necessary to have a case prepared for the opinion of German lawyers. We have now a very excellent and clear opinion of Professor Endemann. The result is to shew that the title of Clauss under the concourse or sequestration is a universal title so far as moveable estate is concerned, wheresoever the estate may be situated. The title is the same as that of a trustee in a Scottish sequestration or an assignee in an English bankruptcy.

It is not necessary, and indeed it would be improper, to give an opinion as to the effect of the arrestments. It is possible that a competition may arise between Clauss and the arresting creditors in Scotland. But the only question we have to decide is whether sequestration ought to be awarded in terms of the prayer of the petition. It does appear to be a very strange application to be made not by the bankrupt alone but also by Mr Clauss, the trustee for the creditors in Saxony. He asks that sequestration of the estates shall be awarded while he has a complete and universal title to these estates in his own person. Nothing can be clearer than that we can award no sequestration except under and in terms of the Bankrupt Act, and that no sequestration is authorised to be awarded by that statute, except a sequestration which shall affect the whole estate of the bankrupt wherever situated. If it was ever supposed that there might be a partial sequestration, the sooner such a notion is put an end to the better. Therefore, to grant the prayer of this petition would be to sequestrate over again the estates which have been already sequestrated in Saxony, and to create a title which would compete with the title of the trustee, who has been appointed in these bankruptcy proceedings. The effect of awarding this sequestration would be to lead to the appointment of a trustee in Scotland, who should be authorised to administer the entire estate of the bankrupt, and would be vested under this sequestration with a title to that estate co-extensive with the title of Mr Clauss himself. It seems to me that it is impossible to conceive anything more entirely inconsistent with well settled principles of international law. Mobilia situm non habent and mobilia sequuntur personam are maxims universally received in every civilised country, and they are therefore juris gentium. They are the foundation of many most important rules of international law. One of these is, that the succession to moveable estate is regulated exclusively by the law of the domicile, without reference to the place where any portion of the moveable estate may be actually situate. The practice is to allow foreign executors to come here and obtain confirmation, so as to give them a title to that portion of the moveable estate of a foreign defunct which happens to be situated in this country, and that whether the executor be an executor-nominate or an executor-at-law. So also a conveyance of moveables inter vivos, whether for the benefit of creditors or any other purpose, may, if made according to the forms of the country where the granter lives, and according to the law to which he is subject, receive effect in this country, will enable the assignee who possesses such a title and produces it here to ingather that portion of the moveable estate of a foreign bankrupt which is situated in this country. This general principle has been acknowledged in the law of Scotland as well as in the law of England from a very early period. But the principle goes no further than this,—to give effect to the title of the foreign assignee from its date. Therefore the title of Clauss will receive effect from its date, and entitle him to ingather that part of the bankrupt's estate situated in Scotland.

No. 43.

Nov. 27, 1874. Goetze v. Adera, &c.

This general principle has been acknowledged in the law of Scotland from a very early date. In the leading case of Strother v. Read (M., Forum Competens, No. 4), "assignees under an English commission of bankruptcy were preferred to an arrester in a competition repecting the effects of an Englishman situate in Scotland." The English assignees came here after arrestments had been used, and they were preferred because their title was prior to the arrester's. There was no specialty, because at that time Scotland and England stood in the relation of foreign countries. But in case any specialty should be supposed to arise from the parties being English it is enough to mention the case of Maitland v. Hoffman (March 4, 1808, M. App. Bankrupt, No. 26), where a precisely similar judgment was pronounced, where a commission of bankruptcy issued in America was held preferable to an arrestment used in this country subsequent to its date, though prior to the date of the assignment. This goes no further than to give effect to the title from its date. There may be regulations in different countries necessary for giving preference among the creditors which can receive no effect

No. 43.
Nov. 27, 1874.
Goetze v. Aders, &c.

extra territoriam. It is only as operating a conveyance of moveable estate that the foreign bankruptcy proceedings receive effect. In Hunter v. Palmer (Feb. 25, 1825, 3 Sh. 586) (N. E. 402), a question of this kind having arisen, an English commission of bankruptcy competing with an arresting creditor, it was maintained that by the English law all diligences were voided by a prior act of bankruptcy, and that as prior acts of bankruptcy had occurred the arrestments were not effectual. But the Court refused to give effect to this, and preferred the arresting creditors, on the ground that their title had been completed prior to the English commission of bankruptcy.

Clauss, who is seeking to have this estate sequestrated, has a title completed by the prior sequestration in Saxony. But his object is plain enough. If sequestration is awarded as on 4th February 1874 that would operate to cut down the preference obtained by Aders, Preyer, and Co. by their arrestments on 8th December 1873 as being used within sixty days of sequestration, and consequently the arresters could not prevail against the title of the trustee. This is a fair object, if possible; and we have to consider if the means are legitimate. I think that they are the reverse. It would be to subvert the principles of international law, and the decisions of the Court, which we are bound to give effect to. In the case of Royal Bank v. Scott, Smith, Stein, and Co. (20th January 1813, F. C.), the defender's firm carried on business both in London and Edinburgh, and became bankrupt in England. Subsequently to that the Royal Bank applied for sequestration here, and the application was refused because of the prior English commission of bankruptcy. It appears to me that that was a more favourable case for granting sequestration than the present. The bankrupts were Scottish traders, carrying on business in Scotland as well as in England, and it might have been possible to administer the Scotch estate here, and the English estate in England. But here the bankrupts have no connection with Scotland, except that their goods are in the hands of Scottish traders.

On this subject Lord Robertson has stated the question of law as follows:—"It is a question of great importance what is the effect in Scotland of an English commission of bankruptcy. In my opinion, the effect to be given to it in every country where the true principles of international law are understood is that it must carry the whole effects belonging to the bankrupt. It has been a principle which has been long established that moveables have no locality. They follow the person of the owner, and their condition is governed by the law of his domicile. It may be said that this is a fiction, and it is so. But it is a fiction introduced by the soundest principles of justice, and in practice has been attended with the most beneficial consequences. It has been confirmed by repeated decisions, and it is a principle which your Lordships will not now shake." "This, indeed, was settled in Scotland by the case of Strother v. Read, of which case there is nothing said. It is impossible for your Lordships to overlook the effect of the decision in which the principles I have mentioned are fully recognised by a most solemn and deliberate judgment. It is said that the jurisprudence of the country where the transactions are entered into is an essential part of the contract between debtor and creditor. This is certainly true; but what is the inference from it? It is as good in the mouth of an English creditor as a Scotch creditor, and the result would be that there would be two commissions going on simul et semel, with all the inextricable consequences that must follow from such a system. It is impossible for your Lordships to listen to this doctrine without flying in the face of the principle of law that moveables follow the person."—(The Royal Bank of Scotland v. Scott, Smith, Stein, and Company, 28th November 1812, Buchanan's Justiciary and other cases, 1800–1810, p. 329).

No. 43.

Nov. 27, 1874.
Goetze v. Aders, &c.

The result of the whole of the authorities is that we must give effect to priority in point of time, and the estate being already sequestrated and vested in the trustee by virtue of the foreign concourse process it is impossible for us to grant the prayer of this petition.

LORD DEAS.—This petition was presented on 4th February 1874, being in the ordinary form of a petition for mercantile sequestration. Two objections were taken to the granting of the prayer. 1st, That the debtor and his company were not liable to the jurisdiction of the Courts of this country. 2d, That "the prayer of the petition ought to be refused, in respect of the prior Saxon sequestration of the estates of F. Goetze and Sohn, and of the sole partner of that firm." The Lord Ordinary has dealt only with the first of these objections. But when the case came before us it appeared to the Court that a more general question was involved—whether there could be a second sequestration, when there was alleged to be an existing valid sequestration in Saxony? With a view to that question, your Lordships ordered a case to be prepared with certain queries, for the opinion of a German lawyer, and accordingly we have now before us the opinion of Professor Doctor Endemann, which I agree with your Lordship in thinking a very able and lucid opinion. Indeed, I have never seen an opinion by foreign counsel better calculated to be useful to the Court.

It is very satisfactory to find the law, which is so well stated, to be in accordance with our own. The cases which have been referred to by your Lordship are important, and lead to the same result.

That result is that an effectual sequestration was awarded in Saxony on 2d January 1874, and that we acknowledge the effect of that sequestration to be to convey the moveable estate of the bankrupt situated in this country, on the footing that a mercantile sequestration awarded in one country carries the moveable estate wherever situated.

It is difficult to see how the trustee is to get possession of the estate in this country free of the effect of the arrestments in execution which have been used to attach it. But that question is not raised by the petition, which prays for nothing but sequestration, and it is better to say nothing about it any more than about the effect of the arrestments used to found jurisdiction. The case for opinion was ordered upon the footing of determining the general question of the effect of a foreign sequestration, and I am for adhering to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, on the single ground that the foreign sequestration renders sequestration in this country incompetent.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I do not think it necessary to rest the decision of this case on the plea that jurisdiction to support the petition for sequestration has not been constituted by the arrestments used ad fundandam jurisdictionem. On that point I shall not express an opinion, because I think we have a ground of judgment broader and more important, and quite sufficient for disposal of the cause. I accordingly concur with your Lordships in placing the decision on the separate ground, which I think sound and most important, to which your Lordships have directed attention.

No. 43.
Nov. 27, 1874.
Goetze v. Aders, &c.

The decisions in the case of Strothers v. Read in 1803,[1] and in the case of Selkrig in 1805,[2] and in the more recent and more serious case of Stein and Company, are of the highest authority, and really conclusive. They are recognised by Professor Bell as settling the law on the subject. Moveables have no locality which law can recognise. They follow the owner, and personal estate is held as situate where the bankrupt had a domicile, and is to be administered according to the law of the country where he is declared bankrupt. Therefore a sequestration—or other process equivalent to sequestration—in one country, if there effectually issued, must embrace and attach the whole moveable estate of the bankrupt wherever situated. A second attachment by a second sequestration of equal scope and comprehensiveness, while the first is extant and in force, is unnecessary and unreasonable, and indeed is contrary to sound principles of international law.

In my opinion the German or Saxon sequestration did in this case embrace and attach all the personal property of these debtors. We are bound, on principles of international law, to recognise it, and to give it effect, and we are therefore bound to refuse to interpose by a second sequestration.

The opinion which we have from the learned German jurist, Dr Endemann, is interesting, instructive, and important, and his exposition of the universality of the attachment by sequestration of the whole personal estate of the bankrupt, according to the principles of international law, is very valuable.

The opinion which your Lordship has now expressed is in entire accordance with the German law, and the international law explained in the opinion of Professor Endemann, and is equally in accordance with the law authoritatively settled by the Scottish decisions to which I have already referred.

I concur so entirely in your Lordship's opinion and observations that I shall not add another word.

LORD MURE concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

RONALD, RITCHIE, & ELLIS, W.S.—FRASERS, STODART, & MACKENZIE, W.S.—Agents.

No. 44.
Nov. 27, 1874.
Kermack v. Kermack.

ELIZABETH KERMACK AND OTHERS, Pursuers and Respondents.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Balfour.
JAMES KERMACK, Defender and Appellant.—D.-F. Clark—Rhind.

Prescription—Interruption—Statutes 1469, c. 28, 1474, c. 54.—Held that prescription of a bond may be interrupted by payments of interest, but that these cannot be proved by parole.

Observed, that the statute 1474, c. 54, made no alteration on the law introduced by the statute 1469, c. 28, with regard to the necessity of taking document upon an obligation within forty years.

Process—Abandonment of Action—A. S. 10*th July* 1839, sec. 61 (Sheriff-court Procedure)—A. S. 11*th July* 1828, sec. 115 (Court of Session Procedure).—The pursuer of an action, after an interlocutor was pronounced disallowing proof by parole, obtained a diligence for the recovery of writings. He allowed it to expire without using it, and then presented a minute of abandonment of the action under A. S. 10th July 1839 (Sheriff-court Procedure), sec. 61. Held that he was entitled to abandon.

---

[1] M., Forum Competens, App. 4. [2] Selkrig v. Davies, 2 Dow, 230.

No. 44.

Nov. 27, 1874.

Kermack v. Kermack.

1ST DIVISION.

Sheriff of Fifeshire.

M.

Opinion, that the 61st section of A. S. 10th July 1839, regulating Sheriff-court procedure, was identical in meaning with the 115th section of A. S. 11th July 1828, regulating procedure in the Court of Session.

THIS action was raised in the Sheriff-court of Fifeshire by Elizabeth and Euphemia Kermack, daughters of the deceased Charles Kermack, feuar, Ceres, against James Kermack, their brother. The summons concluded for payment of "£250 resting owing by the defender to the pursuers, being the one-half or portion payable by him of the sum of £500 sterling conceived in favour of the pursuers by disposition and settlement executed by the said Charles Kermack dated 18th day of December 1809, whereby he disponed to John Kermack and the said James Kermack, both his sons, certain heritable subjects therein described, under burden of payment to the pursuers of the said sum of £500 sterling, payable at the death of Barbara Kyd, their mother, and which sum, it is thereby provided, should bear interest from the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after their mother's death, which event took place in the year 1831, and which subjects the said James Kermack took under the said conveyance burdened as aforesaid, and he paid interest on his one-half of said sum to the pursuers, and in particular, he paid consecutively interest thereon for the following years as follows, viz.,—£10 on or about the 25th November 1845 for the year from Whitsunday 1843 to Whitsunday 1844, £10 on or about the 25th December 1846 for the year from Whitsunday 1844 to Whitsunday 1845, £10 on or about the 19th day of May 1848 for the year from Whitsunday 1845 to Whitsunday 1846, and £10 on or about the 13th day of April 1850 for the year from Whitsunday 1846 to Whitsunday 1847: Item, the sum of £265, being the interest on the said principal sum."

The defence was, (1) Denial of the statements; (2) Prescription.

Euphemia Kermack having died during the progress of the action her trustees and executors were sisted in her room.

The Sheriff-substitute (Beatson Bell) on 5th May 1874 pronounced this interlocutor:—"Before answer allows to the pursuers a proof prout de jure of the averments in their summons as to payment of interest; allows the defender a conjunct probation thereanent."

On appeal the Sheriff (Crichton) adhered.

The defender appealed to the Court of Session.

The defender argued;—The obligation was prescribed under the statute 1469, c. 28, the creditor not having "followed" it and "taken document" upon it within forty years. The subsequent statute, 1474, c. 54, made no difference in the law, but only explained that obligations existing in 1469 fell under the operation of the Act, if they were not litigious at that time.

In all cases in which payments to account of interest or partial payments of the principal have been held to interrupt prescription it is either expressly stated or it must be presumed that there were writings of some kind produced, such as receipts in the debtor's possession, which were held equivalent to documents taken by the creditor. There was no example of the admission of parole proof.[1] In order to discharge the debtor these payments of sums above £8, 6s. 8d. could not be proved by parole. Therefore, why should they be so for the benefit of the creditor? Even if the fact of payment was admitted it would be impossible to ascertain satisfactorily by parole testimony on what footing and on what account the payments were made.

The pursuers argued;—The words "take document" were designedly

[1] Nicolson v. L. Philorth, 1667, M. 11,233; Guthrie v. Nisbet, 1696, M. 11,257; Garden v. Rigg, 1743, M. 11,274, 1 Pat. App. 409; Wood v. Howden, Feb. 7, 1843, 5 D. 507, 15 Scot. Jur. 260.

No. 44.

Nov. 27, 1874
Kermack v. Kermack.

left out of the statute 1474, and accordingly in the cases of Nicolson, Guthrie, and Garden,[1] that was held not to be necessary. Such payments were acts of homologation, capable of being proved by parole.[2] Such payments are interpreted to shew that the creditor is following forth his right.[3] When a party entitled to receive money alleged that it was paid, he might prove the fact prout de jure, because no writ remained in his possession as evidence of it.[4]

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—By his deed of settlement, dated 18th December 1809, the late Charles Kermack disponed certain heritable subjects to his two sons, John and James Kermack, burdened with payment of the sums of £500 to his two daughters on the death of their mother. The mother died in 1831, when both the daughters had attained majority, so that the said sum was payable at that time. This action is raised at the instance of these daughters against James Kermack for payment of £250 of principal, "being the one-half or portion payable by him of the sum of £500," and £265 of interest.

The defence stated is prescription, the long negative prescription introduced by the statutes of James III. The reply to this defence consists in a statement that four payments of £10 each were made—one in 1845, one in 1846, one in 1848, and one in 1850, to account of interest on the debt. Those payments are said to have the effect of interrupting prescription.

The question thus raised is of some importance. It is not immaterial to observe that the payments are alleged to have been made for the interest of half-years or years, considerably bygone at the time when they were made. There is, therefore, nothing stated to shew that they were made on account of the interest due for the periods alleged, except the mere allegation in the summons. It is not stated that there are any extant receipts. It was suggested that the pursuers might take a diligence for recovery of writings, but the Solicitor-General did not appear to be inclined to take that course.

On the record as closed the Sheriff-substitute allowed the pursuers, before answer, a proof prout de jure, and the Sheriff on appeal has adhered to this interlocutor.

Two questions are raised—first, whether payments to account of interest will interrupt prescription; secondly, whether such payments can be proved prout de jure.

On the first question I confess that I do not entertain any doubt. In two cases at least it has been decided that prescription may be interrupted by such payments—Nicolson v. L. Philorth, Dec. 18, 1667 (M. 11,233), and Garden v. Rigg, Nov. 16, 1743 (M. 11,274). Stair, ii. 12, 26, founding on the authority of the case of Nicolson, states the law thus:—"So likewise payment of annual-rents within forty years interrupts prescription of bonds, and that not only as to the party paying, but payment made by the principal debtor was found to interrupt prescription as to the cautioner, who never paid nor was pursued during the space of forty years."

The reason why the payment of interest is held to interrupt prescription is

---

[1] Supra.

[2] Ersk. Inst. iii. 3, 50; Gardiner v. Chalmers, 1636, M. 12,362; Chalmers v. L. Craigievar, 1628, M. 12,368; Ross v. Elliot, 1630, M. 12,369.

[3] Ersk. Inst. iii. 7, 38; Bell's Prin. 611-617; Napier on Prescription, 673.

[4] Dickson on Evidence, 609.

No. 44.
Nov. 27, 1874.
Kermack v. Kermack.

that it indicates distinctly on the part of the creditor that he has not relinquished or abandoned his debt, but, on the contrary, means to insist on it. In that respect it stands on the same footing as partial payment of the principal. The ground on which partial payment of the principal is held to constitute interruption is well explained by Lord Kilkerran in his report of the case of Garden v. Rigg. He says,—"The reasons why partial payments interrupt prescription of the debt is that the acceptance of a receipt in part-payment of a particular debt implies an acknowledgment that such debt is a subsisting debt at the time; but an indefinite receipt of money, applying to no particular debt, is no acknowledgment of any particular debt, and therefore would not have been sustained as an interruption of either the one or the other of the debts pursued for, but for the defender's acknowledgment." Thus an acknowledgment by the debtor, or a receipt taken by him so expressed as to shew that the payment was to account of a particular debt will alone avail. A mere indefinite payment is of no avail to constitute interruption.

This leads to the inquiry whether it is competent to prove the payment of money as to account of the interest or principal of a bond otherwise than by writing. I am of opinion that the Sheriffs have come to a wrong conclusion upon this question. The provision of the statutes that the debt will prescribe unless the creditor takes document upon it, is not satisfied by a mere proof by witnesses, first, that money has passed, and, secondly, that it was intended to be applied, and was applied, either to principal or interest of the particular debt. It seems to me that the latter fact is not at all suitable to be proved by witnesses. I do not dispute that the mere payment of money may be so proved, though not for the purpose of releasing the debtor or of keeping him bound, but for collateral purposes.

I am fortified in this opinion when I observe that in all previous cases in which the plea of interruption has been sustained, there have been either receipts or a judicial admission. Thus in Nicolson v. L. Philorth there were receipts, and these were held equivalent to "document;" and in the next case, Guthrie v. Nisbet, the payments were admitted. In Garden v. Rigg the pursuer, when he pleaded interruption, relied on receipts given to the defender which he insisted he should exhibit, and the defender did exhibit them. There is no example of a proof by witnesses of partial payment or payment of interest to the effect of interrupting prescription. I cannot conceive any matter less suitable to be proved by witnesses than the application of a payment of money. I therefore think this interlocutor should be recalled. If the pursuer thinks he can recover any writings I am not disposed to refuse him a diligence.

Lord Deas.—When a debtor pleads prescription it is usual and prudent for him to say as little as possible. But when a creditor pleads interruption to prescription there is not the same reason for reticence, and he is generally anxious to give all the explanation he can which will tend to shew that his plea is well-founded. In this case, however, the statement of the creditor is certainly as meagre as possible.

The constitution of the debt is clear enough. It is contained in a mortis causa deed, which came into operation by the death of the granter, in 1820. The debt was, however, not payable till the death of the widow, which occurred in 1831. It is said that the only payments made were four in number, and all between 1845 and 1850. No allegation is made of any demand for payment

No. 44.

Nov. 27, 1874.
Kermack v. Kermack.

before or after these years, and no explanation of this silence is offered. My opinion, however, does not depend on these circumstances, and I notice them in passing merely.

In answer to the defence that the claim has undergone the long negative prescription introduced by the statutes 1469, c. 28, and 1474, c. 54, the pursuer pleads interruption by the payments alleged, which he proposes to prove by parole testimony. It is said that, although the Act of 1469 requires the taking of document within the forty years, this requisite was purposely omitted in the Act of 1474. But, in attending to the terms of these statutes it is clear enough that the sole object of the second Act was to declare what had been left vague by the first,—that all obligations, whether made before or after the passing of the Acts, were to prescribe, and no alteration was made, or intended to be made, as to taking document on the debt. On the contrary, the words in the second statute—that "all obligations, made or to be made, that be not followed within forty years, shall prescribe,"—obviously mean, all obligations, whether made or to be made, not followed by taking document within the forty years, as mentioned in the first Act. I do not discover that in the four succeeding centuries it has ever been judicially suggested that taking document was not the test of interruption under these two statutes taken together.

What happened was, that the Court put a very liberal, perhaps rather a loose construction on what was to constitute the taking of document, by holding that, if interest had been paid for which the creditor had granted receipts, those receipts in the hands of the debtor might be regarded as documents taken by the creditor. The Judges in those days seem to have regarded the prescription as odious. Accordingly, in Nicolson v. the Laird of Philorth, 18th December 1667, M. 11,233, where the cautioner pleaded interruption in respect of payments of interest by the principal debtor, "the Lords repelled the defence" (of prescription) "in respect of the reply, and found that the ground of prescription, as to personal actions, being odium and negligentia non petentis, that it doth not militate in this case, the creditor having gotten annual rent, so that he cannot be said to be negligent."

Again, in Guthrie v. Nisbet, 6th June 1696, M. 11,257, where three consecutive discharges of interest by a factor were pleaded as interruption, "the Lords, considering this was no constitution of a debt, but the preserving it against an odious prescription," thought the factor's discharge equivalent to the principal's, "seeing the Act of Parliament requires only the taking of a document to stop prescription, and that talis qualis insinuatio is sufficient to interrupt."

But although the taking of document was thus favourably construed for the creditor, there is no case in which the taking of document has been dispensed with, and it may be doubted whether this loose mode of construing the words has not been seriously discountenanced by the judgment of the House of Lords, reversing the judgment of this Court in Her Majesty's Advocate v. Hay, 24th April 1758, 2 Paton's App. 266.

The judgment of the House of Lords in the previous case of Garden v. Rigg, 28th January 1748, 1 Paton (i.e. Craigie and Stewart) 409, is somewhat complicated, but sanctions nothing adverse to the doctrine that to interrupt the long prescription document must be taken.

It would indeed be strange if parole could be allowed in a case of this kind; for in Napier v. Campbell, 7th December 1703, M. 10,656, the judgment bears, —"The Lords found, after forty years' prescription, the party was not obliged to give his oath, whether it was yet resting owing; and though he should confess it, yet he was not in foro humano liable for the debt, whatever he might be in foro poli et conscientiæ;" and Mr Erskine accordingly says, 3, 7, 15,—"All our lawyers are agreed that, in the long negative prescription, the creditor, barely by his silence for the whole course of prescription, is understood to have abandoned his claim, and so loseth his right of action, without the necessity of bona fides in the debtor. Hence, if a creditor, who has made no demand within the years of prescription, should afterwards offer to prove, by the debtor's own oath, that the debt still subsisted, even that offer would not save the debt from being extinguished by the elapsing of the forty years, though it is obvious that the debtor's consciousness of the subsistence of the debt excludes bona fides."

I also find it stated in my notes of Professor Hume's Lectures that the effect of the lapse of forty years is absolute extinction of the debt, without room for reference to oath, and, in another passage, that no verbal admission, however explicit, and though offered to be proved by oath, will avail.

If, then, the question depended on these statutes alone, I should be of opinion that the answer of prescription, so far as yet appears, is conclusive. But I rather think the statute 1617, c. 12, although not pleaded in defence, may be also applicable. Though the main object of that statute was to introduce the positive prescription, it is well known that it also extended the negative. It enacts "that all actions competent of the law upon heritable bonds, reversions, contracts, or others whatsoever, either already made or to be made, shall be pursued within the space of forty years after the date of the same, except the saids reversions be incorporate within the body of the infeftments used and produced by the possessor of the saids lands," &c. The action is brought upon the deed already mentioned. The burden is not said to be incorporated in the body of any infeftment; and I am not prepared to say that in this state of the facts the statute is inapplicable. It is not, however, necessary to go into this at present, because the older statutes are sufficient for the defender's purpose.

I am, in any view, clearly of opinion that the proposed parole proof is incompetent.

LORD MURE.—The question is whether the operation of the Act 1469, c. 28, regulating the long negative prescription, can be held to have been interrupted by payment of interest or of part of the capital within the forty years, and whether such payments may be proved by parole testimony.

If we were called on to consider this question for the first time I should have been disposed to hold that under the words of the statute the debts did not subsist, unless there had been some proceeding by action and "taking document" in the shape of some renewal of the obligation, in order to shew that the debts were still due. We have been referred, however, to a number of cases from 1667 to the end of last century, which are said to have decided that something short of this is sufficient to interrupt prescription, that the mere fact of payment of interest or partial payment of the principal is enough, and that the fact may be proved by parole.

As to the first proposition, I have no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that in these cases such payments have been held to constitute interruption. But I think the observation of the appellant's counsel was substantially correct, that in all the cases quoted there were either admissions of the payments or documents produced in the form of receipts, and that when there were no admissions, these documents were held tantamount to the creditor taking document upon his debt. This was expressly the ground of decision in the case of Nicolson, as the words of the report bear, and also in Garden v. Rigg. But in the present case nothing has been produced which can be held to be an equivalent for "taking document," and I concur with your Lordships in thinking that proof prout de jure is incompetent.

No. 44.
Nov. 27, 1874.
Kermack v. Kermack.

LORD ARDMILLAN was absent when the case was argued.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the interlocutors of the Sheriff-substitute and the Sheriff, dated the 5th May and 25th and 30th June 1874: Find the proof allowed by these interlocutors to be incompetent, but allow the pursuers (respondents) to lodge a specification of any documents which they desire to recover by diligence: Find the appellant entitled to expenses since the date of the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor of 5th May 1874 in the inferior Court, and also the expenses in this Court," &c.

The pursuer took a diligence for the recovery of writings but did not use it. After it had expired he presented a minute of abandonment under the 61st section of A. S. 10th July 1839,* regulating Sheriff-court procedure.

The defender objected. He argued;—The interlocutors limiting the mode of proof and granting a diligence which had expired without anything being recovered under it necessarily led to absolvitor, and the clause in A. S. 1839 was the same in meaning as the 115th section of A. S. 11th July 1828,† regulating procedure in the Court of Session.

The Court were of opinion that the clause in A. S. 1839 was the same in meaning as that in A. S. 1828, but held that there was no interlocutor either of absolvitor or leading by necessary inference to absolvitor, and they sustained the minute of abandonment.

CHAS. S. TAYLOR, S.S.C.—D. CRAWFORD & J. Y. GUTHRIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 45.
Dec. 4, 1874.
Mitchell v. Scott's Trustees.

WILLIAM MITCHELL, Pursuer.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Strachan.
ROBERT CURRER AND OTHERS (Oliver Scott's Trustees), Defenders.—Balfour—Keir.

Writ—Testing-Clause—Writer's Name—Statutes 1593, cap. 179, and 1681, cap. 5.—In an offer to sell heritable subjects, which was not holograph, the writer was mentioned in the body of the writing as "Mr John Smith, who

* "It shall be competent to the pursuer, before any interlocutor of absolvitor is pronounced, to enter on the record an abandonment of the cause, on paying full expenses to the defender, and to bring a new action, if otherwise competent."

† "And whereas it is enacted by section 10 of the Act [6 Geo. IV. c., 120 Judicature Act, 1825], that the pursuer shall have it in his power to abandon the cause on paying full expenses to the defender, and to bring a new action if otherwise competent, it is declared that this applies only to the case of the pursuer abandoning his cause before an interlocutor has been pronounced assoilzieing the defender in whole or in part, or leading by necessary inference to such absolvitor, after which it shall not be competent for him to do so, in regard to that part of the cause decided by said interlocutor, either expressly or by necessary inference; reserving, however, to him any remedy by a new action which may be competent to him under subsisting regulations."

No. 45.

Dec. 4, 1874.
Mitchell v. Scott's Trustees.

will prepare the disposition," and was only designed in the testing-clause as "the said John Smith." Held that the writer of the offer was not duly designed, and that the offer was therefore improbative, although in the acceptance, which was written on the same paper as the offer, allusion was made to "the said John Smith as agent for both parties."

Agent and Client—Mandate—Sale—Homologation.—A law-agent employed to sell certain heritable subjects got from the seller an improbative offer of the subjects at a certain price. He then, in the presence and with the consent of an intending purchaser, wrote on the same paper with the offer a modified acceptance of the offer, which was signed by the purchaser, but was not tested. He thereafter wrote a docquet on the paper containing the offer and acceptance, whereby he stated that he, as agent for both parties, accepted and confirmed "the foregoing agreement," and acknowledged having received 1s. from the purchaser to account of the price. Held, after considering a proof as to the nature of his employment by the parties, that as there was no evidence of such special authority having been given him as to entitle him to make the contract for the parties his confirmation of the missives was of no effect, and that the agreement could not be enforced.

Observations as to the nature of the authority necessary to entitle an agent to confirm such missives.

Question, Whether it is competent for one man acting for two persons to conclude a contract between them?

2D DIVISION. Lord Mure. I.

On 19th March 1873 Mr William Mitchell, ironfounder, Camelon, raised this action against the trustees of the late Mr Oliver Scott, stocking-maker, Grahamston, concluding (1) for declarator that Mr Scott had sold to him certain heritable subjects in Grahamston in August 1871 at the price of £540, and (2) for implement, and (3) for damages.

Mr Scott's trustees lodged defences.

The missives and circumstances upon which Mitchell relied as constituting the alleged sale were, as appeared from the condescendence and proof, as follows:—

In August 1871 Mr Scott instructed Messrs Smith and Allan, writers in Falkirk, to advertise the heritable subjects in dispute for sale.* Mr Mitchell, after inspecting the subjects, communicated with Messrs Smith and Allan, with a view to purchasing them, and offered to them £540 as the price he was willing to give for the subjects.† Mr John Smith, one

* The nature of Mr Smith's employment by Mr Scott were thus stated by Mr Scott's widow in her cross-examination:—"(Q.) Did you give the advertisement to Messrs Smith and Allan with your own hand? (A.) No. I think it would be sent to them by letter. (Q.) Did you see Mr Smith about that time as well? (A.) I think Mr Smith had not been down in our house for eighteen months before the advertisement. (Q.) Did he come down after it? (A.) Yes, when he wrote the missives; but not until then. (Q.) Had he been acting as agent for your husband previously? (A.) Yes. (A.) Then you left it to Mr Smith, or Messrs Smith and Allan, to carry out the transaction, and to sell the property? (A.) Yes. (Q.) I suppose you were satisfied that that would be the best thing for you to do? (A.) Yes. (Q.) They were to get as good a price for it as possible? (A.) Yes. (Q.) To sell it on favourable terms? (A.) Yes. (Q) You meant to leave all that to them? (A.) Yes, the whole. (Q.) They were to settle the price, and to carry out the transaction? (A.) They were to carry out the transaction. (Q.) They had your full authority to do that at the time? (A.) Yes."

† Mr Mitchell described his employment of Mr Smith as follows in his evidence:—"(Q.) Did you, at that time, employ Mr John Smith as your agent in connection with this matter? (A.) I employed him thus far, to get the business settled at once, and I was ready to pay the money next day, if it was convenient for him. (Q.) Did you authorise Mr Smith to carry out the transaction of the partners of the firm, on 21st August 1871, went to Mr Scott, who was confined to bed, and wrote out the following missive offer, which was duly signed by Mr Scott in presence of Mr Smith and Mr Scott's wife:—"Mr William Mitchell, ironfounder, Camelon.—Alma Villa, 21st August 1871. Sir,—I hereby make offer to sell to you the houses and pertinents . . . at the price of five hundred and forty pounds (£540)," with entry to one of the houses at Martinmas, and to the other at Whitsunday. "You will take the title as it at present stands, and Mr John Smith will prepare the disposition in favour of you and Mrs Mitchell in the terms of destination to be furnished by you. I will pay the half of his account for the disposition, and the price can be paid to me when the disposition is signed and delivered to you, but under deduction of interest of the price at the rate of four per cent per annum from the date of payment till Whitsunday next, when you are to get entry to the larger house, but adding to the price six pounds five shillings for your occupation between Martinmas and Whitsunday. In witness whereof, I, Oliver Scott, sometime stocking manufacturer, and now residing at Alma Villa, Grahamston, have subscribed this offer, written by the said John Smith, at Grahamston, the twenty-first day of August, eighteen hundred and seventy-one years, before these witnesses, Elizabeth Scott, my wife, and the said John Smith. OLIVER SCOTT. Elizabeth Scott, witness; John Smith, witness."

No. 45.

Dec. 4, 1874. Mitchell v. Scott's Trustees.

Mr Smith, on the same day, went to Mr Mitchell, and, after some conversation, wrote out on the same paper the following qualified acceptance of the above offer:—"Camelon, 21st August 1871.—Mr Oliver Scott, sometime stocking manufacturer, Alma Villa, Grahamston. Sir,—I have received your offer (prefixed), and accept thereof, with the following addition and alteration, which can be accepted by the said John Smith, as agent for both parties, in order to bind the bargain, viz.:— . . . . my entry to both houses to be as at Whitsunday next, till which time I am neither to occupy nor pay rent. You have received herewith one shilling of the price as earnest that the purchase by me has been concluded by me on the foregoing terms. In witness whereof I subscribe this acceptance, place and date before mentioned. WILLIAM MITCHELL."

This acceptance was signed by Mr Mitchell, but was not tested. Mr Smith duly received the shilling referred to in the writing, and afterwards on your behalf? (A.) Of course I did, when I was going to pay him. (Q.) But did you authorise him as your agent to carry out the transaction on your behalf? (A.) Yes. (Q.) Did you authorise him to complete the agreement for you? (A.) Yes; to make out the papers. I was ready to pay the money the moment the papers were completed. (Q.) Didn't you employ Mr Smith to act as your agent in the matter? (A.) I did. (Q.) What did you employ him to do? Was there not another document written out after that—the document on the other page of No. 6 of process? (A.) Yes; that was written out in my house that same night. (Q.) That is the indorsation beginning 'As agent for the before-named parties,' &c.? (A.) Yes. (Q.) That was written by Mr Smith at that time in your house? (A.) Yes. (Q.) Did you authorise Mr Smith to write that as your agent? (A.) After I gave him 1s. he wrote that as my agent to settle the business; and the moment he made out the papers I was willing to pay the money, and I am willing to do so yet. (Q.) Then after that was signed you handed him 1s.? (A.) Yes; I handed it to my wife first, and she handed it back to me, and I handed it to Mr Smith. (Q.) The documents which had then been written were left with you? (A.) Yes. (Q.) Was it then arranged that Mr Smith should prepare a disposition in your favour? (A.) Yes. (Q.) Was that arranged before these documents were signed? (A.) It was in the papers that he should do that, and I employed him to do it."

---

No. 45.
Dec. 4, 1874.
Mitchell v. Scott's Trustees.

gave it Mrs Scott. Mr Smith then, in Mr Mitchell's house, appended the following docquet to the paper containing the above offer and acceptance:—"Camelon, 21st August 1871.—As agent for the before-named parties, I accept and confirm the foregoing agreement, and acknowledge to have received one shilling to account of the price on behalf of Mr Scott. JOHN SMITH."

The writings were then left with Mitchell, but nothing followed upon these as between Scott and Mitchell, although Mitchell frequently applied to Mr Smith and pressed him to get the matter carried through.

Mr Smith extended a disposition of the subjects by Scott to Mitchell in September, but it was never signed by Scott, as he was too ill to attend to business. Mr Scott continued unwell and unfit to transact business, and eventually died on 22d August 1872, leaving a trust-disposition in which Mr Currer and others, the defenders, were appointed his trustees.

Mr Smith died in April 1873, before the proof, which was not led till June 1874.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The action cannot be maintained, in respect that the missives alleged to constitute the contract of purchase and sale between the pursuer and Mr Scott are not holograph nor tested in terms of the statutes. (3) Separatim, no concluded contract was ever entered into, in respect that the material alterations upon the terms of Mr Scott's alleged offer, expressed in the pursuer's alleged acceptance, were never accepted or adopted by Mr Scott, or by any one having his authority.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the missive offer of the late Oliver Scott, founded on by the pursuer, is defective in the statutory solemnities, and that the acceptance of the said offer is neither tested nor holograph of the pursuer: Sustains the second plea in law for the defenders, and assoilzies them from the conclusions of the action, and decerns: Finds the pursuer liable in expenses, subject to modification, of which appoints an account to be given in, and remits, &c."*

* "NOTE.—The testing-clause of the missive offer, which is quoted in the third article of the condescendence, bears to be written by 'the said John Smith,' who is also one of the witnesses; but, on referring to the body of the writ, the writer is simply mentioned as 'Mr John Smith.' He is not, therefore, designed; and although it may be conjectured, from its being stated that he is to prepare the disposition to follow upon the missive that he was a professional agent, that, according to the rules laid down in the cases of Percy v. Caldwell, 25th November 1808, F. C., Lockhart, 16th February 1815, F. C., and Callender, December 17, 1863, is not a mode of construction which can be adopted as sufficient to supply the requirements of the statutes. The offer is therefore null under the Act 1681, c. 5, and cannot of itself be made the foundation of the claim raised under the present action.

"But it was contended on the part of the pursuer that the objection was obviated by the description given of Mr Smith in the acceptance of the offer, and also in the document signed by Mr Smith which is annexed to the acceptance, in both of which he is described as 'agent for both parties;' and it was also argued, upon the authority of the case of Callender, that this notandum was an adoption or homologation of the defective offer. The Lord Ordinary, however, has not been able to see his way to give effect to either of these pleas.

"For, in the first place, as to the acceptance, it is not holograph; so, that, even assuming the designation contained in it to be sufficient, which is a point not free from doubt, it cannot, it is thought, be read as supplying the statutory defect in the offer. It is not, moreover, a part of the offer, but the writing of another party. And the Lord Ordinary is not aware of any authority for

No. 45.

Dec. 4, 1874. Mitchell v. Scott's Trustees.

The pursuer reclaimed.

Argued for him;—The offer here was not void under the Act 1681, cap. 5. It was quite easy to see who the "said John Smith" in the testing-clause was. It was the "Mr John Smith" who was to prepare the disposition. If there had been any uncertainty, it was quite cleared up by the docquet appended to the same paper in which he was spoken of as "agent for both parties." Only Mr John Smith, of the firm of Allan and Smith, could satisfy this designation. The person meant was more clearly defined than in the case of Callender.[1]

Even if the offer were informal and improbative, Mr Smith was employed by both parties to carry through this transaction, and consequently, although the missives were not in themselves probative and binding writings, he could confirm them, and did confirm them, by means of the holograph docquet which he appended to the paper on which the improbative missives were written. It was competent so to confirm informal writings. Authority to purchase or sell land was a mandate to act fully for the mandant.[2]

Counsel for the defenders were not called upon for a reply.

LORD ORMIDALE.—The counsel for the reclaimer has with great ability endeavoured to satisfy the Court that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be holding that a separate writing of this description, not engrossed by reference into the writ, the validity of which is in question, as was the case with the rental in the case of Callender, can be founded upon as explanatory of the defect in the writ under challenge. To hold that it could would, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, amount substantially to admitting a condescendence in support of the offer, which is expressly excluded by the statute. And the same observation applies to the writing of Mr Smith annexed to the acceptance, which, though holograph, is no part of the offer.

"But the question remains, whether that writing can be held to amount to such an adoption and corroboration, on the part of the late Mr Scott, of the defective offer as must have the effect of precluding Mr Scott, or the defenders as his trustees, from challenging the transaction. The Lord Ordinary does not think that it can. It is not the writ of Mr Scott, and the Lord Ordinary doubts whether the passage in Mr Erskine (iii. 3, 47), which is generally relied on in such questions, can be held to afford any sanction to acts of homologation by any one other than the party himself whose writ is defective. It is not, as the Lord Ordinary conceives, within the ordinary powers and duties of a law-agent himself to execute the writings by which a sale of his client's property is carried through. Nothing, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, short of express, and, as he is disposed to think, written authority, to that effect, of which there are examples in the style books, ought to be held as sufficient to bind a client in such transactions; and the Lord Ordinary does not think that there is evidence of any such authority having been given in the present case.

"On the question of expenses, the Lord Ordinary has found the pursuer liable, only subject to modification, because the statutory objection to the designation of the writer of the missive offer, in respect of which the case has now been disposed of, was not raised till after the whole proof had been led. It is covered, no doubt, by the plea in law which the Lord Ordinary has sustained, but it is nowhere specifically stated in the record, and was not mooted at the discussion which led to the record being amended before the proof was allowed. Had it been so raised, the Lord Ordinary would have considered it right to deal with it before a general proof was allowed, and the expense of that proof would, in all probability, have been saved."

[1] Callender v. Callender's Trustees, Dec. 17, 1863, 2 Macph. 291, 36 Scot. Jur. 140.

[2] Corbet v. Douglas and Jarvie, March 5, 1808, Hume's Dec. 346; Boswell v. Selkrig, March 9, 1811, Hume's Dec. 350.

No. 45.

Dec. 4, 1874.
Mitchell v. Scott's Trustees.

recalled, and that there was here a good completed transaction of purchase and sale. I am, however, quite unable to come to that conclusion.

It was maintained, in the first place, as regards the Lord Ordinary's finding, that there was not a sufficient statutory designation of the writer of the offer of purchase, that there was at least quite a sufficient identification, if not designation of Mr Smith as the writer of that document, and that nothing more was requisite. It appears to me that there is neither designation or identification of Mr Smith. The mere incidental notice of Mr John Smith as "writer" is clearly not enough, seeing that there is no sufficient identification of any such individual as the writer of the offer. This is a much weaker case for the reclaimer than that of Callender v. Callender's Trustees,[1] cited by his counsel, where the writer was designed as "factor," and yet that was held to be insufficient, and the difficulty only got over in a manner and in respect of strong pregnant acts of adoption which have no place in the circumstances of the present case.

But it is said that the defective offer and acceptance,—the acceptance being equally liable to objection as to statutory solemnities,—were by a third writing or docquet confirmed by Mr Smith, as acting for and with the authority of both the seller and purchaser, and so validated and made obligatory. I am not satisfied, however, that Mr Smith had the requisite authority to confirm the offer and acceptance, or that there is any reliable proof to that effect. On this point, as well as the validity of the offer and acceptance taken by themselves, the case of Goldston v. Young[2] is very instructive. In that case the seller of heritable property went to a party who intended to purchase, and wrote out with his own hand what bore to be an offer by that party, which the latter subscribed and the seller accepted. The seller then brought an action for implement of the contract thus validly completed, as he thought, but it was held by the Court that the offer was defective, inasmuch as the statutory solemnities were wholly awanting as regarded the alleged offer, the same being neither tested in terms of law or holograph of the party by whom it bore to be made.

Without entering into further detail, I am quite satisfied that, 1st, the offer and acceptance here in question are in themselves defective and invalid; and, 2d, that their invalidity has not been cured by the alleged confirmatory document, or anything else that seems to have occurred. I have only to add that I am not prepared to say that it was absolutely incompetent for Mr Smith so to have acted as to bind both parties, provided he had clear and unquestionable authority to do so. At the same time it must not be overlooked that the Court will always deprecate the acting of the same agent for two parties having conflicting interests, and will very jealously and scrupulously examine his powers. But without determining any such point, it is enough to say that in the present instance Mr Smith's powers so to act for seller and purchaser have not been instructed.

I have no hesitation, therefore, in the circumstances of this case, in proposing that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary reclaimed against should be adhered to.

LORD NEAVES.—I concur.

We have heard a very able argument, which has helped us very much in a case of considerable nicety and novelty.

One point in the case, and perhaps the main one, relates to the validity of [1] Supra, p. 166. [2] Dec. 8, 1868, 7 Macph. 188, 41 Scot. Jur. 122.

No. 45.

Dec. 4, 1874. Mitchell v. Scott's Trustees.

this transaction, whereby Smith holds that he concluded a contract by means of what is called a confirmatory document. Without this docquet by Smith there could clearly be no contract, as the offer was not well met by the acceptance, and there never was a consensus between the seller and buyer. Can it then be said that this confirmatory document is valid? No doubt in the preliminary stages of a purchase or transaction it is quite competent for one and the same agent to act for both parties. As regards preliminaries it may often be the wisest and most economical course. But then can binding documents be concluded, such as a bilateral contract, by one man either in writing or without? I doubt whether delivery in such a case would not be necessary. Though delivery in the ordinary case of deeds jointly executed is presumed, it would be difficult to say that when it comes to be a question of a concluded contract each party should not interpone his individual consent.

It would be strange if an agent could say, "I hereby, as agent for A, offer this property at £100, and I hereby, as agent for B, accept of it at £95," and then, as agent for A, agree to the modified acceptance, and by paying himself a shilling, as agent for A, conclude a bargain binding on A and B.

If such a transaction is to be competent the whole surrounding circumstances must be such as completely to justify it, and there must be no doubt as to the authority and consent of the principals to the result. The question then comes to be, is that the case here? The offer is signed by one of the principals, the agent then goes and gets only a modified acceptance from the other, to which modification he accedes without going back to the principal offerer. There is no presumption that the agent had authority to step forward in this way and supersede his principal, after that principal had personally made an offer that had not been accepted.

I therefore think that we ought to adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

Lord Gifford.—This case arises under the old law, and must be looked at by the light of the old statutes, and decisions regarding deeds.

The first question is, whether the original offer is or is not a probative writ, or is it defective in respect it does not contain the designation of the writer, John Smith? On this point I am of opinion, with your Lordships, that there is no sufficient designation of the writer of the deed. No doubt very slight indications have been held sufficient, but here there is no designation at all. All that is said is, that John Smith will prepare the disposition, but that does not tell who John Smith was; anybody can prepare a disposition, whether a professional man or not; and so I think that there is not here a designation conformable to the requirements of the statute.

Secondly, the acceptance is admittedly not holograph, and accordingly it is not a probative writ, and consequently the missive offer and acceptance do not per se constitute a concluded and binding agreement.

But the counsel for the pursuer maintains that both these documents, although not binding by themselves, are made into a complete and binding agreement, legally obligatory on both parties, by the docquet subsequently added by Mr Smith. There can be no doubt whatever that defects of this nature in writs, that is, defects in the statutory solemnities, can be removed by a duly executed writ or docquet, granted either by the parties themselves, or by their authorised agents. That proposition is not disputed. It is possible also that the authority of the agent may competently be proved by parole.

No. 45.

Dec. 4, 1874. Mitchell v. Scott's Trustees.

Then it is said that Mr John Smith was agent for both parties, and by his holograph docquet converted the imperfect missives into a completed agreement, both by supplying the want of statutory solemnities, and by acceding to a conditional acceptance.

But the argument here must go the length that Mr Smith could make the contract for both parties, and that he was authorised by both parties to do so. I grant that one agent may act for two parties in many cases, and quite rightly so,—for example, in conducting negotiations with a view to a sale or bargain, or in carrying out a bargain already made by the parties themselves. Even in such cases the position of an agent for both parties with adverse interests is a delicate one, but he has no power to make a new contract between his two constituents, and I have the gravest doubt whether it can be held competent or possible to appoint an agent with general powers to contract for both parties,—to make a contract on both sides,—to contract himself as agent for one party with himself as agent for another party. The two characters are incompatible and inconsistent. The agent must make the best terms he can for A, and then at the same moment he must secure the best terms he can for the opposite party B. He must deal at arm's length with himself. In short, he, a single person, must make a bilateral contract.

But even if such anomalous powers were possible, it would need wonderfully explicit authority to create such powers in one agent. It must come up to this, that both the parties appointed an arbiter to make a contract for them, not to act as agent, but as arbiter,—not to carry out the rights of his two clients, but to fix at his own pleasure what their rights should be. Now, it seems to me quite plain on this proof that Smith never was in such a position as that. He never was authorised to make a bargain of sale for both parties. He could not address a missive offer to himself, and then himself accept it, without communicating either offer or acceptance to either of his clients, and, in point of fact, he never supposed he had such powers. Accordingly, he went to his constituent, the seller, to get the offer signed, and the moment he did that he ceased to be entitled to alter the offer. The acceptance was in quite different terms from the offer, and although £6 is not a great sum, still the whole price was not large, and the deduction might have made all the difference. I am clearly of opinion, on the proof, that Mr Smith had no power to accede to the condition in the acceptance,—to make a new bargain,—to reduce the price even by £6, and the result is that there never was consensus in idem. On both grounds therefore, looking at the missives as they stand, as improbative and not binding, and being of opinion, on the proof, that Mr Smith had no authority to bind Mr Scott, I come to the conclusion that no contract was made which could be enforced in a Court of law.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is a somewhat delicate and difficult case, but I concur with the proposed judgment.

The first objection to the missives on the statutory ground has, I think, been rightly decided by the Lord Ordinary, although, looking to the authorities, the point is somewhat narrow.

The clear ground on which it is impossible to sustain the transaction, apart from the statutory objection, is that there never was a completed contract. The seller never agreed to the conditions in the acceptance.

It may be that a case is possible where such a transaction as this might be

No. 45.

Dec. 4, 1874. Mitchell v. Scott's Trustees.

sustained, where the agent is clearly employed and authorised by both parties. But it is quite clear Smith never thought he had power to make the whole contract.

I think we should adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

THE COURT adhered.

MORTON, NEILSON, & SMART, W.S.—J. & A. PEDDIE, W.S.—Agents.

No. 46.

Dec. 8, 1874. Larkin v. M'Grady.

EDWARD LARKIN, Pursuer and Claimant.—A. Blair.
EDWARD M'GRADY, Respondent.—Balfour—Pearson.

Insanity—Process—Cognition—Title to Pursue.—The cousin-german, not being the nearest agnate, or the heir at law, or one of the next of kin of a person alleged to be insane, purchased a brieve of insanity. Objection to his title to pursue repelled.

Observed, that although the nearest agnate had not come forward to pursue the cognition, he might, after the person was cognosced, and the brieve retoured to Chancery, come forward and claim the office of tutor.

Process—Cognition.—At the trial of a brieve of insanity an objection was taken to the pursuer's title to pursue the cognition. The presiding Judge reserved the question for the consideration of the Court, and allowed the trial to proceed. Held that the procedure was competent.

Insanity—Brieve.—The Act of Sederunt of 3d December 1868, sec. 6, directs that after the trial of a brieve of insanity, if the whole heads of the brieve are not affirmed by the jury in favour of the person claiming as nearest agnate, then the formal writing made out and subscribed by the clerk shall bear that the brieve and claim are not proven. At the trial of a brieve of insanity at the instance of a person who was not and did not claim as nearest agnate the jury returned a verdict cognoscing in terms of the brieve, and finding that the pursuer was not the nearest agnate, and that another person named was the nearest agnate. It was contended that a verdict of not proven should be recorded, in respect that the heads of the brieve had not been affirmed "in favour of the claimant as nearest agnate." Held that the clause in the Act of Sederunt applied only to a case in which the purchaser of the brieve claimed as nearest agnate.

1ST DIVISION. B.

A brieve in Chancery was presented to the Lord President to inquire "whether Edward M'Grady, residing in Hamilton, is insane, who is his nearest agnate, and whether such agnate is of lawful age?"

Edward Larkin, miner, who claimed the office of curator, was pursuer, and appearance was made for M'Grady.

The case came to be tried before the Lord President and a special jury on 23d November 1874. "Counsel for the claimant, having in his opening address to the jury, admitted that the claimant was not the nearest male agnate, but only the younger brother of the nearest male agnate, and that he was neither the heir nor one of the next of kin:

"Counsel for the respondent contended;—(1) That the claimant had no title to purchase the brieve, and the jury ought therefore to be discharged, or directed to find a verdict of not proven. (2) In respect of the above admission, and of the provision of section 6 of Act of Sederunt, 3d December 1868, no other verdict than one of not proven could be returned. The Lord President allowed the trial to proceed, reserving the effect of the above objections for the consideration of the Court. Whereupon the counsel for the respondent excepted to the course adopted by the Lord President of allowing the trial to proceed reserving the effect of the above objections."

No. 46.

Dec. 8, 1874.
Larkin v. M'Grady.

The verdict of the jury was in the following terms:—"The jury 'cognosce' in terms of the brieve; but find that Edward Larkin is not the nearest agnate, neither is he the heir at law or next of kin of Edward M'Grady; and that Patrick Larkin, miner, Hamilton, is the nearest agnate, and is of full age."

The case came before the First Division on a bill of exceptions for the respondent.

He argued;—(1) The claimant had no title, not being the heir or one of the next of kin. The action was not an actio popularis, but confined to the nearest relations.[1] (2) The verdict should have been "not proven," as required by the 6th section of A. S. 3d December 1868.[2] (3) The whole heads of the brieve were not affirmed in favour of the claimant, but the contrary.

The pursuer argued;—The right of purchasing a brieve of cognition was not limited to the nearest agnate. Any one having interest might come forward. The practice was as the authorities shewed. If the nearest agnate came forward, the Court would probably appoint him tutor-at-law, but if not, the Court would appoint either the pursuer of the action or any one else they pleased to be tutor-dative.[3]

LORD DEAS.—The ground of this bill of exceptions is that the presiding Judge allowed the trial to proceed, reserving for the consideration of the Court the effect of the two objections stated by the respondents. I am clearly of opinion that the course which your Lordship followed was right and regular.

The other Judges concurred.

The Court disallowed the bill of exceptions.

LORD PRESIDENT.—Your Lordships having disallowed the bill of exceptions, we have now to dispose of the verdict of the jury. The respondents object to its being retoured to Chancery as an answer to the brieve, on two grounds. They say that the party called in these proceedings, the claimant, had no right to purchase the brieve; and, secondly, that in respect of the provisions of section 6th of the Act of Sederunt, 3d December 1868, the verdict ought to have been one of not proven.

---

[1] Statute 1585, c. 18; Balf. Pract. 433; Stair, 1, 6, 25; Fraser, Parent and Child, 536; Stark v. Stark, 1746, M. 6291; Bryce v. Graham, Jan. 25, 1828, 6 S. 425.

[2] A. S. Dec. 3, 1868 (proceeding on Court of Session Act, 1868, 31 and 32 Vict. c. 101), sec. 6, is in these terms,—"When the jury return their verdict affirming the whole heads of the brieve it shall be noted 'cognosce,' but when the jury do not affirm the whole heads of the brieve the verdict shall be noted generally 'not cognosce,' unless there be any special finding regarding the person claiming in the character of nearest agnate (in which case the clerk shall make such note as the presiding Judge shall direct), and the jury shall then be discharged. And it shall be the duty of the clerk thereafter to make out and subscribe a formal writing embodying the verdict and answering the different heads of the brieve, which shall be retoured to Chancery, if the several heads of the brieve are affirmed but not otherwise," and if the whole heads of the brieve are not affirmed in favour of the person claiming as nearest agnate, then the formal writing, made out and subscribed by the clerk, shall bear that the brieve and claim are not proven.

[3] Inglis, 1701, 4 B. S. 517; Moncrieff v. Maxwell, 1710, M. 6286; Ld. Reay v. Anderson, 1800, M. 16,385; M'Allister, June 7, 1798, 6 S. 440, Note.

No. 46.

Dec. 8, 1874.
Larkin v. M'Grady.

1. I am of opinion that the result of the authorities is that such a brieve may be purchased by a person who is not the nearest male agnate, if he is a near relation. It is not necessary for us to determine what degree of propinquity will suffice. But I think it clear that a person who is at once a cousin-german of the person whose sanity is in question, and the immediate younger brother of the nearest agnate, who, failing him, would become the nearest agnate, is within the category of near relations.

2. As to the second point, no doubt the terms of the 6th section create at first sight a little difficulty. The respondents contend that, under the last clause of the section, a formal writing should be made out and recorded to the effect that the brieve and claim are not proven, in respect that "the whole heads of the brieve are not affirmed by the jury in favour of the person claiming as nearest agnate."

But it is to be observed that the person who appears as claimant in this cognition does not claim in the character of nearest agnate. So that the provision of the 6th section does not in terms apply to this case. It is indeed abundantly clear that it was not intended to apply to a case of this kind, but to a brieve pursued by the nearest agnate, or by a person alleging himself to possess that character. And what is meant is that if he fails on any one of the three heads a verdict of not proven is to be recorded. That is quite right. If he fails on the first head, then the man is not insane. If he fails on the second, the pursuer is not what he represents himself to be. And if he fails on the third, he is not of full age. The verdict, therefore, ought to be one of not proven. But is this a verdict of not proven? I apprehend not. The jury cognosce in terms of the brieve. They find, secondly, that Patrick Larkin is the nearest agnate. Thirdly, they find that he is of full age, and therefore capable of taking the office of tutor, and he can do so still, when this brieve is retoured to Chancery, if he is so inclined. If he is not inclined to take the office, an application may be made for an appointment of tutor-dative under 19 and 20 Vict. c. 56, sec. 19, or for the appointment of a curator bonis.

The Act of Sederunt was not intended to destroy a title which was otherwise good.

The clerk will therefore make out a formal writing embodying the verdict, and answering the different heads of the brieve, and that will be retoured to Chancery.

LORDS DEAS and MURE concurred.

LORD ARDMILLAN was absent.

ON the matter of expenses this interlocutor was pronounced:—"The Lords, having heard counsel as to the expenses incurred in this cognition, find the pursuer entitled to his expenses, including those caused by the bill of exceptions, and remit to the Auditor to tax the amount of the said expenses, and report: Find that the expenses of the defender (respondent) in these proceedings will form a proper charge on his estate, as the said expenses shall be taxed by the Auditor on the principle of taxation as between agent and client," &c.

JOHN LATTA, S.S.C.—MORTON, NEILSON, & SMART, W.S.—Agents.

JOHN GAIRDNER, Pursuer and Appellant.—D.-F. Clark—Gloag.
J. AND T. YOUNG, Defenders and Respondents.—M'Laren—Asher.

No. 47.

Dec. 10, 1874.
Gairdner v. Youngs.

Proof—Conjunct Probation—Proof in Replication.—The defender in an action on an account stated a contra account, and pleaded compensation. Proof was allowed to both parties "of their respective averments in so far as not expressly admitted on record, and to the pursuer a conjunct probation." Evidence was led by both parties, and then the pursuer led his conjunct proof, in which he went minutely into various objections to the defender's contra account raised by him on record, but which he had not touched in his proof in chief. Held that the defender was entitled to a proof in replication.

Observed (per Lord President) that it was the duty of the pursuer in his proof in chief to lead evidence on all the points raised by him on record.

1st DIVISION. Sheriff of Ayrshire. M.

JOHN GAIRDNER, wood merchant, Newton-on-Ayr, raised an action in the Sheriff-court of Ayrshire against Messrs J. and T. Young, engineers, also at Newton-on-Ayr, to obtain payment for an account of wood furnished.

The defenders admitted that the account sued for was due and resting owing by them, with the exception of a small sum of £1, 10s. 7½d., which they averred that the pursuer had agreed by writing under his own hand to deduct as an overcharge. But they claimed payment of a contra account due by the pursuer to them for machinery and other articles furnished, and pleaded compensation.

The pursuer, in answer to the defenders' statement of facts, objected to the various items of the defenders' contra account, on the ground of badness of material and workmanship, and overcharge, and in respect to the most important item, on the ground of the inefficiency of the article in working.

The Sheriff (N. C. Campbell), on appeal, allowed both parties a proof of their respective averments, in so far as not expressly admitted on record, and to the pursuer a conjunct probation, and remitted to the Sheriff-substitute.

The pursuer, his account generally being admitted, tendered himself as a witness merely to explain the circumstances connected with the allowance of a deduction averred by the defenders, and then closed his proof in chief.

The defenders thereupon adduced two persons in their own employment, and two men of skill, and examined them generally as to the quality of the articles furnished, and the reasonableness of their charges, and closed their proof.

The pursuer then led his conjunct proof, adduced eight witnesses, and entered with great minuteness into proof of his objection to the defenders' contra account.

On the pursuer's conjunct proof being closed the defenders moved for a proof in replication, which the Sheriff allowed on the particular points specified, and by the witnesses named in a minute put into process.

After the defenders' proof in replication was led the Sheriff found generally in favour of the defenders in the action.

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The first thing to be determined in this case is whether proof in replication was properly allowed to the defender. I cannot say that this process has been well conducted. From first to last the proceedings have been faulty, and the blame attaches equally to all parties concerned. The original allowance of proof was made in the interlocutor of the Sheriff-principal of 4th

No. 47. Dec. 10, 1874. Gairdner v. Youngs.

June 1869, which "allows both parties a proof of their respective averments, in so far as not expressly admitted on record, and to the pursuer a conjunct probation." It seems to me that under that order for proof it was the duty of the pursuer to lead evidence on all the points raised by him on record. He was not entitled to confine himself to the particulars of his own account. He had raised the question, whether the defender had overcharged the items contained in his contra account, and if he did not lead proof of his averments on this point he was really leaving that proof till his own anticipated conjunct proof came to be led. Such a method of conducting his case was quite unjustifiable. It was depriving the defender of any reply to his proof of the real matter in dispute between them. The pursuer was quite wrong in not entering upon this subject in his proof in chief. Very naturally the defender was not particularly careful in leading evidence on this point, for he had nothing to meet but the pursuer's averments on record, which had not yet been supported. He contented himself with adducing two of his own people and two men of skill. But then comes the pursuer's conjunct probation, in which, for the first time, he enters on a very large question, judged at least by the mass of evidence. He goes minutely into a question of overcharge, and assails not only the material and the workmanship, as well as the price of the article supplied by the defender, but also the efficiency of the article when put in use. And then, according to the terms of the Sheriff's interlocutor, the proof should have ended. But the Sheriff very naturally said, "Looking to the way in which the pursuer has conducted his proof, he has exposed the defender to a great disadvantage, and a proof in replication must therefore be allowed." I cannot say that he was wrong in this conclusion. It was very wrong that the case should ever have come into such a position as to require a proof in replication. But under the circumstances I think the Sheriff did right to grant it.

We must therefore enter on a consideration of all the evidence that has been led.

LORD DEAS, LORD ARDMILLAN, and LORD ORMIDALE concurred.

ON a consideration of the evidence the Court refused the appeal.

FYFE, MILLER, FYFE, & IRELAND, S.S.C.—MILLER, ALLARDICE, ROBSON, & INNES, W.S.—Agents.

No. 48. Dec. 12, 1874. Stevenson v. Magistrates of Rutherglen and Others.

REV. W. F. STEVENSON (Minister of the Parish of Rutherglen), Objector.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Gloag.

THE PROVOST, MAGISTRATES, AND TOWN-COUNCIL of Rutherglen, Respondents.—Balfour—Alison.

MRS ROSALIE W. WARDROP AND OTHERS (Henry Wardrop's Trustees), Respondents.—Balfour—Alison.

JOHN PINKERTON, Respondent.—Balfour—Alison.

Teinds, valuation of.—A decree of valuation in 1634 bore to value the teinds of certain lands belonging to a burgh, which had hitherto been paid in rental bolls. Held that there was no presumption that the teinds of the burgh green, which formed part of the lands, and which, though capable of cultivation was presumably in pasture at the date of the valuation, had not been included in the conversion into rental bolls, and were not therefore included in the valuation.

Observations (per Lord Justice-Clerk) on the case of Orwell, March 8, 1867, 5 Macph. 557, 39 Scot. Jur. 271.

No. 48.

Dec. 12, 1874.
Stevenson v. Magistrates of Rutherglen and Others.

Teinds—Valuation—Proof—Onus.—A decree of valuation dated in 1634 bore to value the teinds of the lands of A, with the exception of a certain ten shilling land, which through lapse of time it had become impossible to identify. In a locality in 1874 the proprietor of a portion of the lands of A founded upon the valuation as embracing his lands. Held, in the absence of evidence as to the situation of the ten shilling land, that in the first instance the onus lay upon the minister to shew that the heritor's lands fell within the exception, but that in the circumstances that onus had been discharged.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Shand.
Teind Clerk.

IN the locality of Rutherglen a scheme of locality and state of teinds was framed by the common agent which did not shew sufficient free teind to meet the augmentation. The minister, the Rev. W. F. Stevenson, objected, on the ground, inter alia, "that there were certain lands in the parish from which the objector draws no stipend, and which are not entered in the state of teinds or locality. In particular, the following lands are in this condition :—

"(1) The lands of Ellisbank, belonging to Wardrop's Trustees, and possessed by Mr Aitkenhead at a rent of £30, ...	£30	0	0
"(2) The lands of Gooseberry Hall,* belonging to John Pinkerton, at a yearly rent, it is believed, of .	30	0	0
"(3) The ground called the Green, belonging to the burgh, of which the estimated rental is . .	128	0	0

"The teinds of the said lands fall to be localled on in the scheme of locality."

A decree of valuation dated 18th June 1634 was produced, which was obtained at the instance of Sir William Hamilton of Elliston, titular and tacksman of the teinds, both parsonage and vicarage, of the parish of Rutherglen, against the provost and bailies of the burgh as representing the burgh, and against the remanent heritors and feuars within the same. By this decree the Lords Commissioners "find and declair that the parsonage teyndis of the lands of Rutherglen, called the Kingis Lands, estimat to ane ten pund land or yrby, pertaining to the inhabitantis of Rutherglen for the maist part, by and attor ane ten shilling land thereof, perteining to the said persewar heretably, is worthe, and that the samen may be worthe and pay yearlie in constant rent, sax chalderies victual, quhairof four chalderis quhyt aittis, and twa chalderis beir, and the burrow ruids estimat to ane three pund land, including certain parcells or ackeris pertaining to the said persewar, with some common land or loningis, fourtie bolls victual, half meil half beir, and the said Lords decernit and ordainit the said six chalders victuall of the qualitie foresaid, and fortie bolls victuall, half meill half beir, to continue and be repute and haldin as the just, treu, and constant worthe and rent of the said thertein pund land, excludeing the said persewaris ten shilling land of the Kingis Lands, and including his aikers of the burgh ruidis or common landis yearly, communibus annis, in all time coming, deducing always of the said whole parsonage teynds his Matie's ease, extending to ane-fifth part yroff, because ye treu worthe of the saids parsonage teynds

* The lands of Gooseberry Hall were admitted to consist of four parcels, which came to be united in the hand of the respondent Mr John Pinkerton, viz., (1) the lands of Alleys, acquired from Walter Campbell of Shawfield on 4th May 1790; (2) a small piece of ground acquired from the magistrates of of Rutherglen on 1st June 1796; (3) the lands called Flatters, acquired from John Gray of Scotstown on 5th May 1806; and (4) the lands called the Nine Riggs, acquired from Walter Buchanan and Robert Macfarlane in August 1813 and June 1814.

No. 48.

Dec. 12, 1874. Stevenson v. Magistrates of Rutherglen and Others.

of the landis and aikeris rexive above written, being referrit to the said persewaris probation, and having the sole and onlie prerogative to prove, conform to the Act of Parliament, the samen being all led teyndis, he producit ane number of famous witnesses, wha sufficientlie proved the said parsonage teynds to be as is particularly above written, with deductione always of ane fifth part for his Matie's ease, conforme to the said Act of Parliament, and therefoir the saids Lordis decernit and ordainit in manner foresaid, and sicklyke ordains lres. gif need beis to be direct hereupon in form as effeiris."

On this valuation a surrender was made by the provost and magistrates as representing the burgh and the remanent heritors in 1836, and sustained by Lord Ordinary Cockburn on 21st January 1837.

The question which arose between the parties was whether the three parcels of land belonging to the several respondents, and mentioned in article 5 of the objections, were or were not included in the valuation, and the teinds thereof surrendered.

The Lord Ordinary, Shand, on 6th March 1874, allowed the parties a proof of their respective averments on record in reference to these particular lands and the teinds thereof, the objector to lead in the proof.

The following was the import of the proof, both parole and documentary, which was led on the subject of the burgh green:—The green of Rutherglen was situated on the south bank of the river Clyde, and extended to about 36 acres. The return which the burgh got from it during the last twenty years had ranged from about £150 to about £60; but this income was derived not from agricultural uses, but from other purposes to which the land had been applied. The green in its natural state was arable, and the soil of such a quality as to be well suited for producing cereal crops; it was not reclaimed moor-land, or other naturally sterile land, made arable by artificial operations, but at the date of the valuation of 1634 the land was the same in character and quality as at present. From the older documents in process it appeared that the green, though always fitted for producing crops, was used as pasture land, and was pastured by the burgesses, many of whom were proprietors of small properties called "burgh roods," or parts of what had been the "common lands," or other property originally acquired from the burgh, and who paid a small annual rent to the magistrates for the privilege of pasturing their cattle on the green, and probably also on the other land belonging to the burgh. From a minute of council, however, dated 1653, quoted in Ure's History of Rutherglen, published in 1793, and from other evidence, including parole testimony, it appeared that the green was occasionally under crop, possibly for some years after 1653, and at any rate occasionally from 1763 to the present time. The inference drawn by the Lord Ordinary from the evidence as a whole was that at the date of the decree of valuation the green was in pasture, but that at the same time the proof did not exclude the notion that the green might have been even at that early date cropped from time to time, and that it was always quite suitable for cultivation. Though the pursuer of the valuation, Sir William Hamilton, had right to the vicarage as well as to the parsonage teinds, and in the subsumption of the summons of valuation the defenders were called to see that the teinds, "both parsonage and vicarage," should be valued by the Court, yet the decree included parsonage teinds only in its operative words. There was, however, no indication on the face of the decree that the teinds of any kind of any part of the lands mentioned had been excepted from the valuation, nor was there any reservation for after valuation of vicarage teinds of the green, or any indication that there were other teinds leviable than those which were valued. The decree was acted on from its date down to the present time, and during that period no stipend was ever allocated upon the green. It was proved by a number of documents that the thirteen pound land, being the ten pound land called the king's land, and the three pound land made up of the burgh roods and certain parcels of land and common lands or loanings, had from a period antecedent to the date of the decree, and from its date until the present time, been regarded as equivalent to the burgage land, i.e., the land within the boundaries of the burgh. The parties who signed the objector's presentation were the heritors of the thirteen pound land, and their right to do so under a conveyance of the patronage, dated in June 1734, by Mr Campbell of Shawfield, who had acquired right to the titularity from Sir William Hamilton, was settled in the case of Brown v. Johnston, 9th June 1830, 8 S. 899. The reference to the teinds as being "all led teinds," which occurred in that part of the decree referring to the proof adduced by the titular, did not conclusively shew that the titular drew the ipsa corpora of the teinds, but was explained by the fact that there had been a constant use of payment of the teind of the whole lands at a certain agreed-on rate in rental bolls, or a conversion of rental bolls into money. Besides the fact that a portion of the teind was stated in meal, which was inconsistent with the notion of the teind having been drawn directly from the lands, the documents recovered from the burgh records shewed that Sir William Hamilton, the titular, was in use to draw a certain gross amount of teind for the whole thirteen pound land, so far as not in his own possession, from the magistrates and council, for themselves and on behalf of the other heritors, and that the magistrates, in their turn, received the proportions of the teind payable by each heritor.

No. 48.

Dec. 12, 1874. Stevenson v. Magistrates of Rutherglen and Others.

The Lord Ordinary, on 3d September 1874, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Repels the objections for the minister in regard to the green of Rutherglen belonging to the burgh; and finds that the green was included in the lands the teinds whereof were valued by the decree of valuation obtained at the instance of Sir William Hamilton of Ellieston, Knight, dated 18th June 1634, founded on by the respondents, and that the teinds so valued were surrendered in 1836 by minute of surrender lodged in the process of locality then in dependence, and which was sustained by interlocutor of 21st January 1837: Sustains the objections for the minister in regard to the teinds of the lands of Ellisbank and the lands of Gooseberry Hall respectively: Finds that the proprietors of these lands have failed to prove their averments that the teinds thereof were valued by the said decree of valuation of 1634, and that the teinds of these lands are therefore liable in stipend, and remits to the clerk to rectify the locality accordingly: Finds the objector liable in expenses to the respondents, the magistrates and council of the burgh of Rutherglen, and finds him entitled to expenses against Wardrop's trustees and John Pinkerton in the question between him and them respectively: Allows accounts of these expenses to be given in."*

* "NOTE.—The question between the parties is, whether the teinds of (1) the green of the burgh of Rutherglen, belonging to the burgh; (2) the lands of Ellisbank, belonging to Wardrop's trustees; and (3) the lands of Gooseberry Hall belonging to John Pinkerton, were valued by the decree of valuation of 1634, mentioned in the preceding interlocutor. The whole of these lands are situated within the burgh, and hitherto no stipend has been specially allocated on them. . . .

"The question raised, like others, as to the scope and effect of old decrees of valuation which have occurred for decision, are attended with considerable difficulty; but after consideration of the special terms of the decree, with the light of the evidence, consisting mainly of ancient deeds and minutes of council and other documents, I am of opinion that the decree of valuation must be held to apply to the green of Rutherglen, but that the proprietors of the other lands have failed to shew that it includes the properties belonging to them."

No. 48. Against this interlocutor both the minister, on the one hand, and Wardrop's trustees and John Pinkerton, on the other, reclaimed.

Dec. 12, 1874. Stevenson v. Magistrates of Rutherglen and Others.

(His Lordship here went at length into the evidence relating to the green.)

"2. In regard to the lands of Ellisbank and Gooseberry Hall. . . . The heritors, Wardrop's trustees, and Mr Pinkerton, allege that the lands now belonging to them respectively belonged to Sir William Hamilton at the date of the decree in 1634, and this is admitted by the minister. . . . The question between the parties is, whether the respondents' lands formed part of 'the parcells or ackeris' which were valued, or part of the ten shilling lands of the king's lands which were not valued.

"The decree is open to the observation that its terms are not such as of themselves to identify and distinguish the lands then belonging to Sir William Hamilton which were valued from those which were not.

"Some parcels or acres of land is an expression which does not identify any lands, but the parcels or acres are mentioned as having been part of 'the burrow ruids,' and if the respondents could shew by their titles, or otherwise by satisfactory evidence, that their lands had been part of the burgh roods, and so part of the three pound land, they would be entitled to have the present question decided in their favour. There has been no reference to anything contained in the titles which marks the lands as having been burgh roods, and the evidence otherwise is not sufficient, in my opinion, to prove that they were so. On the contrary, I rather think the preponderance of the evidence is to an opposite effect.

"In the ordinary case, it lies on the owner of the lands to discharge the onus of shewing that his teinds have been valued. The production of a decree expressed in such terms as fairly to include the lands may shift the onus to the objector; but in the present case the decree alone cannot be accepted as having that effect, for, according to its terms, part of Sir William Hamilton's lands was the subject of valuation, another part was excluded, and from the decree alone it cannot be gathered within which category the respondents' lands fall. It may be unfortunate for the respondents as heritors interested that this is so, but their predecessor alone is to blame for the omission to have the decree so expressed as to identify the lands which were the subject of valuation.

"The decree, therefore, does not shift the onus from the heritors. The question remains, and it is one of difficulty, whether the decree, combined with the usage which has followed, under which the lands have hitherto been free from any allocation of stipend, is sufficient to do so. In the present case, the teinds, having been those of the titular's own lands, would only be localled on so long as they remained in this position, after the other teinds of the parish had been exhausted. This would account for the fact that no stipend was allocated on the lands in earlier schemes of locality, and might lead to the lands being omitted in later schemes, even after they had become liable. In the particular circumstances of the present case I am not prepared to hold that with a decree, the terms of which are so loosely expressed as the present, the usage is sufficient to entitle the heritor, from usage alone, to succeed in his contention that his teinds are valued. It rather appears to me that in order to bring his lands within that part of the decree which is here founded on he must either shew that his lands are part of the burgh roods, or otherwise point out other lands within the burgh unvalued, which have been localled on, or are liable to be localled on, as the ten shilling lands of the king's lands which belonged to Sir William Hamilton.

"I am of opinion that the respondents have not adduced evidence sufficient to instruct either of these points. I presume the titles of the particular lands throw no light on this subject from the terms of the descriptions there used, because no argument to that effect was maintained; and while the burgh

No. 48.

Dec. 12, 1874.
Stevenson v. Magistrates of Rutherglen and Others.

It was argued for the minister;—(1) Though the green might be contained within the words of the valuation it was not valued, inasmuch as it was in pasture and not teindable at the date of the valuation. Further, the valuation was by rental bolls, and bore to be of parsonage teinds only. Such valuation could only cover those parts of the land valued which were actually producing crop at the date of the valuation; therefore, as the green was not producing crop it was not included in the valuation.[1] (2) As it was proved that the lands of Ellisbank and Gooseberry Hall belonged to Sir William Hamilton at the date of the valuation the inference was that they formed part of the excepted ten shilling lands, and the onus of proving that they did not fell upon the heritors, and they had failed to discharge it.

Argued for the provost and magistrates as representing the burgh;—Though the green might have been under pasture at the date of the valuation, it was, at that date, capable of cultivation, and therefore teindable; and as it was clearly included within the limits of the valuation, it must be held to have been valued.[2]

Argued for Wardrop's trustees and John Pinkerton;—In the circumstances of the case, the onus of proving that the lands were not valued fell upon the minister, and he had failed to discharge himself of it.[3]

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The questions which arise for our decision in this case are, first, whether the green of Rutherglen is included in the valuation of 1634 and the surrender of 1836; and, secondly, whether certain small portions of land situated within the burgh of Rutherglen are so included.

---

roods, consisting of small portions of land in the hands of other heritors, are not at a great distance from the respondents' lands in question, yet I think the fair inference from the meagre evidence adduced is rather to the effect that the lands in question formed part of the king's lands, on which an old castle belonging to the family of Sir William Hamilton had stood, than that they are part of the burgh roods. It was urged for the respondents that most of the adjoining lands paid stipend in meal and bear, being the kind of victual in which the burgh roods were valued, and not oats and bear, the victual in which the king's lands stand valued; but it was pointed out by the objector that the king's lands and burgh roods run into each other at various points, as some of the heritors pay partly in the one quality of victual, and partly in the other.

"It is proved by extracts from the sasine records that Sir William Hamilton, at the date of the decree, was possessed of other lands than those belonging to the respondents, and particularly of lands lying in or near East Croft and at Wardlawhill; and as the lands of Eastcroft and Wardlawhill pay stipend in meal and bear, and are included in the surrender of 1836, it was argued by the objector that the inference to be drawn is that these lands are the burgh roods or acres which belonged to Sir William Hamilton, and were valued by the rental under the name of parcels or acres. There appears to me to be reason for this view, and at least that it affords sufficient grounds for requiring some more distinct evidence from the heritors than they have adduced in support of their contention, that their lands are the parts of the burgh roods referred to."

[1] Richmond v. Common Agent in Locality of Orwell, March 8, 1867, 5 Macph. 557, 39 Scot. Jur. 271; Plummer v. Common Agent in Locality of Selkirk, Dec. 21, 1867, 6 Macph. 124 and 128, 40 Scot. Jur. 70; Houston v. Common Agent in Locality of Haddington, Jan. 17, 1868, 6 Macph. 235, 40 Scot. Jur. 139.

[2] Lord Glenlyon v. Clark, Nov. 15, 1842, 5 D. 69, 15 Scot. Jur. 4; Learmonth v. City of Edinburgh, June 1, 1859, 21 D. 890, 31 Scot. Jur. 491; Earl of Moray v. M'Diarmid, Nov. 16, 1869, 8 Macph. 142, 42 Scot. Jur. 274.

[3] Minister of Banchory-Devenick v. The Heritors, June 22, 1871, 9 Macph. H. of L. 121, 43 Scot. Jur. 428.

No. 48.

Dec. 12, 1874.
Stevenson v. Magistrates of Rutherglen and Others.

The Lord Ordinary has very clearly explained the general circumstances under which these two questions arise, and I shall not attempt to deal with the very complicated details on which we had so full an argument, but shall content myself with indicating the principles which should regulate our decision, and the result of their application to the facts before us. The parsonage teinds of the burgh of Rutherglen were, with the limitation I shall immediately refer to, valued in 1634 at the instance of the titular, Sir William Hamilton of Shawfield. It appears from the valuation, and is consistent with the general history of the burgh administration, that at the date of the valuation the teinds had been converted into rental bolls, and were in use to be collected by the magistrates of the burgh. I infer, from the fact that in a locality of 1650 the stipend was directly laid upon the magistrates, that they held some kind of right from the titular at that time by way of tack or otherwise. It seems also clear from the titles and documents in process that this burgh territory which was the subject of valuation was broken into a great variety of small holdings or pendicles of land which are described in the different titles as roods or rigs or acres or gardens belonging to the inhabitants of Rutherglen, or patches of land or other description such as one might expect in the case of ground parcelled out among the burgesses of the burgh. From a paper in the locality of 1805 I find that Mr Farie of Farm stated that he was in possession of twenty-five or twenty-six acres situate in a great many different parts of the burgh territory. The titular, as I have said, was Sir William Hamilton of Shawfield, whose estate was acquired by Campbell of Shawfield, including the patronage and the right to the teinds, and in 1730 or thereabouts he conveyed to the magistrates the whole parsonage teinds of the burgh territory, and afterwards the patronage, stipulating for an immunity from teind in respect of the lands which he himself retained. He afterwards obtained a private Act of Parliament in 1789, authorising him to sell so much of the estate of Shawfield as should pay off the debts therein specified by judicial sale, and in the sales which followed the different lots had a certain proportion of teinds specifically allocated on them, and some were left entirely free. I have stated these additional facts, because they seem to throw some light on the questions which we are now to consider.

In regard to the green of Rutherglen, at present a piece of grass land of thirty-six acres, I concur with the Lord Ordinary in holding that it was included in the valuation of 1634. It was unquestionably embraced in the burgh territory, because the thirteen pound land specified in the valuation represents the land which the burgh held of the Crown under very ancient charters for payment of thirteen pounds Scots, and as the green is unquestionably in the land so held, it was necessarily included in the words of the valuation. If the minister contends that, notwithstanding the words of the valuation, it was, in point of fact, not valued, I think it lies with him to establish that proposition; and it was contended to us that he had done so, on the following grounds:—It was said that in 1634 the green was in pasture, and was not then considered a teindable subject, and that as the valuation was not one of stock and teind together, but assumed the rental bolls which the heritors had been in use to pay as the criterion of value, it must be held, on the authority of the case of Orwell, that the green was not then valued. But I think the argument, though able, embraced several fallacies. In the first place, it is quite certain that the green was a teindable subject—that is to say, was capable of cultivation as arable land, the proof of which is, that for a considerable period during last century it was used for that purpose. And it has been found in several cases that land, although never known to have been so cultivated, yet susceptible of cultivation, was teindable. In the second place, and this seems to be conclusive, it is manifest from the terms of the valuation itself that the rental bolls, although representing a conversion of the teinds, were paid in respect of land which from time to time might not be used for crop. Indeed, it seems certain that many of the pendicles of which I have spoken must have been in this situation, and the valuation includes in terms "some common lands or loanings," sufficiently proving the truth of this assertion. Thus, even if it had been proved, which is far from being the case, that these thirty-six acres had never been under crop prior to 1634, I should have thought this fact wholly immaterial.

No. 48.

Dec. 12, 1874.
Stevenson v. Magistrates of Rutherglen and Others.

I need only farther add on this head that the case of Orwell affords no ground for the general proposition maintained for the minister, that where the valuation is made by rental bolls under the alternative permitted by the king's commission, the state of the land at the date of the valuation determines whether it is included or not in the valuation. As these rental bolls represent an ancient conversion the state of the lands when it was accepted as the valuation cannot possibly shew for what lands the rental was originally payable. The passage in Lord Benholme's opinion bears no such signification. It only means this, that where specific prestations had been previously in use to be paid as in lieu of the teind exigible these could not be held to comprehend subjects which from their nature could not have been actually under crop before, while, when stock and teind are valued together, and a fifth of the rent assumed as the value, the case might be different. The case of Orwell seems a very clear one. The question was whether the teinds of a share of an undivided commonty were to be held as included in the valuation of certain specific lands. It was doubtful enough whether the heritor had any right in the commonty at the date of the valuation, but it seems quite certain that prior to its division the commonty could not have been a subject from which parsonage teinds were payable. The fact that the common green of Rutherglen has never been allocated on for stipend tells neither one way nor other in this question of valuation. The fact plainly arose from the magistrates being from the first the collectors and ultimately the titulars of the teinds.

In regard to the second question which has been raised it stands somewhat differently. Holding that the valuation included all the burgh territory, it nevertheless did so with one specific exception, and that was certain ten shilling lands then belonging to Sir William Hamilton, the titular. I cannot read the valuation otherwise. Whether these ten shilling lands had been valued before, or whether the titular did not care to value subjects in his own hands, we have no means of ascertaining. The fact, however, remains, that while the minister has got by the surrender the full amount of the specific valuation, he has obtained no teind whatever in respect of these ten shilling lands, and is to that extent deprived of his right. The question is whether the deficiency must be made up by the lands in question.

I am quite satisfied that the task of identifying these lands is entirely hopeless, nor do I care to engage in the attempt to weigh the probabilities of this matter. The question must be solved by deciding on whom the burden of proof is laid. The general rule is that an heritor must prove that his lands are embraced in the valuation, but I am of opinion that, in the first instance, that onus is sufficiently sustained in this case by an heritor who shews that his lands are

No. 48.

Dec. 12, 1874.
Stevenson v. Magistrates of Rutherglen and Others.

within the territory, and that if the minister alleges they are within the exception, that cannot be presumed but must be proved,—otherwise the valuation would be entirely useless to any heritor who could not prove the negative. Holding, however, that it lies with the minister to give prima facie evidence that the lands in question were within the exception, I think he sustains that burden sufficiently by shewing that these lands were the property of Sir William Hamilton at the date of the valuation and have not hitherto been localled on for stipend, and therefore I am prepared to concur in the view of the Lord Ordinary as far as relates to the lands of Gooseberry Hall or Ninerigs and those belonging to Wardrop's trustees, seeing it is certain that these were derived from Sir William Hamilton. It is not unreasonable to hold that it lies with Sir William Hamilton's successors to shew that their lands are not excepted from the valuation, and this, I think, they have entirely failed to do. In regard to the two other pendicles of land, which appear to have been derived from the burgh and from the Duke of Hamilton, I think the claim of the minister cannot be sustained. The only element which would have weighed with me against this result is the immemorial non-payment of stipend, which may possibly have originated from the stipulation made by the titular in 1730, and the distribution of the stipend over the lots sold under the Act of Parliament of 1789. But until now the minister never had an interest to challenge this state of things, and holding, as he has always done, the magistrates as his paymasters, he could not have been expected to do so.

Lord Neaves concurred.

Lord Ormidale.—I have come to the same result. The difficulties in the case have arisen from the lapse of time since the decree of valuation in 1634. Owing to that great lapse of time it is not surprising that it should be found impossible to arrive at a conclusion which can be said to be absolutely right.

It did occur to me, on the first view of the case, that the onus of proof ought to be laid entirely upon the minister. But when it was explained that until he obtained the present augmentation he had no interest to raise the disputed questions I came to see that it was right the onus should, in the first instance at least, be laid on the heritors to shew that their lands were covered by the valuation.

Founding, however, on the case of Banchory-Devenick, the heritors maintained that the minister was bound even from the outset to shew that there were unexhausted teinds, and out of what lands. But the circumstances in the Banchory-Devenick case were quite different from what occur here. The successive ministers of that parish had for many years acted and transacted on the footing that the whole teinds were exhausted, and had accordingly, on that footing, applied for and obtained the benefit of the Small Stipend Act. Therefore, in that case, when the minister ultimately came to ask for an augmentation and offered to prove that there were unexhausted teinds, the Court, while they granted an augmentation, did so only on the footing of his undertaking to shew that there were lands out of which teinds were due. No such onus, however, was laid upon the minister in the present case when he was found entitled to an augmentation. I am therefore of opinion that the principle of the Banchory-Devenick case does not apply, and that, in accordance with the ordinary rule, the onus is, to begin with, on the objecting heritors. But the onus may shift, and, without going into a repetition of details, I think your Lordship in the chair has made a correct discrimination in this respect.

No. 48.

Dec. 12, 1874.
Stevenson v. Magistrates of Rutherglen and Others.

According, then, to the proposed judgment, in which I concur, there will be an adherence, with a slight variation, to the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, who has manifestly bestowed great pains on the case, and explained in a note very clearly and satisfactorily the grounds upon which he has proceeded.

LORD GIFFORD.—To a large extent the question here is one of fact and not of law. It is whether the lands in dispute are or are not included in the lands the teinds of which are valued by the decree of valuation of 1634. If there had been no exception in the decree of valuation I apprehend that a question could hardly have arisen. The lands valued are described as the ten pound king's lands, belonging to the inhabitants of the burgh of Rutherglen, excepting the ten shilling land thereof belonging to Sir William Hamilton, the titular, and the three pound lands, consisting of the burgh roods, some parcels of land belonging to Sir William Hamilton, and some common lands or loanings. The whole lands amount to about 1000 or 1200 acres. The parsonage teinds of these lands are declared to be of a certain constant value, and there is no dispute that it is a good and valid valuation. But unfortunately the exception of the ten shilling land of Sir William Hamilton is introduced without any description or specification of where this ten shilling land is situated; and the difficulty now is to discover, after more than two centuries have elapsed, what Sir William Hamilton's ten shilling land really was. The exception is the cause of additional perplexity, inasmuch as Sir William Hamilton was at the date of the valuation proprietor of two sets of lands, viz., of burgh lands, which were included in the valuation, and of this ten shilling land, which was excluded from the valuation; and the question is, whether the lands belonging to Wardrop's trustees and Mr Pinkerton are part of the lands excepted or of those included in the valuation.

The burgh green stands in a different position. It certainly is included in the lands valued and in the decree of valuation. But then the minister says he will undertake to prove that, at the date of the valuation, the green was not a teindable subject, and therefore could not be valued. It is impossible to allow the minister, after this lapse of time, to come forward and try to upset the valuation by extraneous evidence. Where the valuation distinctly includes certain lands it is impossible now to allow it to be overcome by a proof as to the mode in which these lands were possessed at or before the date of the decree. I am inclined to think, therefore, that the proof is really incompetent. But whether competent or not the minister has failed to instruct his averments. Whether the green was in pasture or not in 1634 it was always capable of bearing corns, and, in this sense, it was always a teindable subject. It is expresly included in the decree of valuation, and it cannot be shewn that its teinds were not included in the value fixed.

The other two subjects, the properties of Wardrop's trustees and Mr Pinkerton, stand in a different position. The question is, are these lands part of Sir William Hamilton's ten shilling king's lands or part of his burgh lands? Now, here the actual tracing of the particular parcels of land is impossible. We have had conjectures suggested to us more or less ingenious. But they are only conjectures, and cannot safely lead us to a definite conclusion. It is a hopeless task, and consequently the question of onus or presumption becomes of importance. I agree with your Lordship that, in accordance with a long train of decisions, the onus here lies, in the first place, on the heritors. They must shew that their lands and teinds are valued by a valid decree of valuation applicable thereto. But this is an onus which, in the varying circumstances of each case, may be easily shifted. I think the onus in this case first shifted when the decree of valuation was produced and founded on by the heritors. The decree proves that the whole thirteen pound lands of Rutherglen are valued excepting the ten shilling land belonging to Sir William Hamilton, and this throws the onus on the minister to prove that the lands now in dispute fall under the exception. But when the minister shewed that the heritors' lands had descended to them from Sir William Hamilton, the onus, I think, shifted back to the heritors to shew that they were not part of Sir William Hamilton's excepted ten shilling king's lands, but part of his other lands, which, in the valuation, are coupled with the burgh acres. This, I think, the heritors have failed to do; and I therefore agree with the Lord Ordinary in giving the minister the benefit of the presumption so far as regards the lands which are traced to have belonged to Sir William Hamilton. As to lands not in this position they must be held as included in the valuation.

No. 48.

Dec. 12, 1874.
Stevenson v. Magistrates of Rutherglen and Others.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the said interlocutor, and in lieu thereof repel the objections for the minister in regard to the green of Rutherglen belonging to the burgh, and find that the green was included in the lands the teinds whereof were valued by the decree of valuation obtained at the instance of Sir William Hamilton of Ellieston, Knight, dated 18th June 1634, founded on by the respondents, and that the teinds so valued were surrendered in 1836 by minute of surrender lodged in the process of locality then in dependence, and which was sustained by interlocutor of 21st January 1837: Repel the objections for the minister in reference to those parts of the lands of Gooseberry Hall which were acquired from the magistrates of Rutherglen on 1st June 1796, and the lands called Flatters, acquired from John Gray of Scotstown on 5th May 1806; as to which two parcels of land find that they are not shewn to have been part of Sir William Hamilton's lands, and must therefore be held to be part of the lands the teinds of which are valued by the said decree of 1634: Sustain the objections for the minister in regard to the teinds of the lands of Ellisbank and the lands of Gooseberry Hall, except the two portions above mentioned: Find that the proprietors of these lands have failed to prove their averments that the teinds thereof were valued by the said decree of valuation of 1634, and that the teinds of these lands are therefore liable in stipend, and remit to the clerk to rectify the locality in accordance with this interlocutor: Find the objector, the minister, liable in expenses to the respondents, the magistrates and council of the burgh of Rutherglen, and find him entitled to expenses against Wardrop's trustees: Quoad ultra, in the question between the minister and John Pinkerton, find no expenses due to or by either party," &c.

GEORGE BURN, W.S.—W. & J. COOK, W.S.—Agents.

No. 49.

Dec. 12, 1874.

Maclaren v. Bradly.

JOHN FISHER MACLAREN, Pursuer.—R. V. Campbell.
MRS ANNIE CAMPBELL MORRISON OR LACY OR BRADLY, and HUSBAND, Defenders.—Rhind.

Indefinite Payment—Triennial Prescription.—In an action for payment of the balance due on a tradesman's account, for goods furnished and cash advanced, the triennial prescription was pleaded. Held that as indefinite payments by the debtor credited in the account fell to be applied in extinction of the items on the debit side of the account in the order of date, and as the items left unpaid consisted entirely of cash advances, the triennial prescription did not apply.

1ST DIVISION. Ld. Mackenzie. B.

JOHN FISHER MACLAREN raised this action on 25th July 1874 against Mrs A. Campbell Morrison or Lacy or Bradly and her husband, for payment of £30, 5s. 6d. sterling, being the balance of an account due by the defenders to the pursuer as assignee or indorsee of Messrs James Muirhead and Sons, watchmakers and jewellers in Glasgow. The account contained charges for goods furnished at various dates from June 25, 1869, to July 20, 1869, amounting to £173, 14s. 6d., and for cash advances from August 30, 1869, to November 4, 1869, amounting to £40, 11s.

The account credited the following payments by the defenders :—

1869.
Nov. 15.	By cash,	£50	0	0
1870.
Jan. 5.	„ cash,	80	0	0
July 18.	„ cash,	40	0	0
	„ watch,	14	0	0
		£184	0	0

and brought out a balance unpaid of £30, 5s. 6d.

The defenders pleaded ;—(2) Prescription.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor in which he found 'that the provisions of the statute 1579, c. 83, apply to the furnishings of goods and to the work charged for in the account libelled on: Quoad ultra allows the parties a proof of their respective averments in terms of The Evidence (Scotland) Act, 1866,' and appoints the proof to be led before the Lord Ordinary on a day to be afterwards fixed."

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued that he was entitled to apply the payments to the first part of the account,[1] and that the items left unpaid consisted entirely of cash advances.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—(After stating the facts).—I am clearly of opinion that the statute 1579, c. 83, does not apply to cash advances. When an account consists partly of cash advances and partly of goods furnished the cash advances are exempted from the triennial prescription. This was decided in the case of Keir v. Magistrates of Kirkwall, 15th June 1827 (5 S. 802, N. E. 742), and there are other cases to the same effect.

The pursuer or his authors, Muirhead and Sons, have acknowledged that they have received from the defender £184, partly in goods and partly in cash, and they have credited the defender with that amount. The pursuer maintains that [1] Bell's Pr., sec. 563 ; 2 Bell's Com. 535 (M'Laren ed.) 428 ; Hotson v. Threshie, Feb. 28, 1833, 11 Sh. 482 ; Paterson v. Strachan, Hume, Notes, p. 480 ; Boys' Trustees v. Hamilton, June 30, 1829, 7 S. 815 ; Lang v. Brown, Dec. 2, 1859, 22 D. 113, 32 Scot. Jur. 64.

No. 49.
Dec. 12, 1874.
Maclaren v. Bradly.

these payments are to be held as extinguishing the earlier items consisting of goods furnished. The result would be to extinguish the items for goods furnished, and also some of the cash advances, leaving only £30, 5s. 6d. still outstanding. The sums sued for thus consist only of cash advanced, to which the triennial prescription does not apply. I think the pursuer is right in his contention. The principle was well illustrated and explained in the case of Lang v. Brown, decided 2d December 189 (22 D. 113).

I am therefore of opinion that we ought to recall the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and that the plea of the triennial prescription should be repelled, and the case remitted back to the Lord Ordinary.

LORD DEAS, LORD ARDMILLAN, and LORD MURE concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor reclaimed against: Repel the first, second, and third pleas in law for the defenders, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to allow the pursuer a proof in common form."

JOHN LATTA, S.S.C.—JAMES Y. PULLAR, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 50.
Dec. 16, 1874.
Bethune v. Morgan.

SIR JOHN TROTTER BETHUNE, Baronet, Pursuer.—D.-F. Clark—Pearson.
WILLIAM MORGAN, Defender.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Campbell Smith.

Lease—Executor.—A tenant under an agricultural lease in favour of himself and his heirs, in which he bound himself, his heirs and executors, to pay the rent, died before the expiration of the lease. The heir declined to take up the lease, and the executor also refused to do so.

Question, whether the executor was liable for any loss the landlord might sustain through non-implement of the contract.

Held, by Lord Gifford (Ordinary), that the executor was liable.

1ST DIVISION, with three consulted Judges. Lord Gifford. M.

THE following narrative is taken from the opinion of the Lord President:—"The late Thomas Morgan, whose brother and executor William Morgan, is the defender in this action, was tenant of the pursuer, Sir John Bethune, in the farms of North and South Cassingray, under a lease in favour of himself and his heirs for nineteen years from the term of Martinmas 1858. By that lease he bound and obliged himself, and his heirs, executors, and representatives whomsoever, to pay to the pursuer yearly the sum of £850 sterling in name of tack-duty. The clause is in general terms and in the usual style. The deceased Thomas Morgan continued in possession of these farms until his death on 9th November 1871, and upon that event the defender, as his executor, entered upon the possession and management of the farms, and continued there till Martinmas 1873, for the purpose of realising for the executry estate that portion of the produce of the farms which belonged to the executry. But after this had been accomplished the defender intimated to the landlord his intention to remove, having no title as lessee and no intention of carrying on the farms even if the landlord had desired him to do so. The pursuer, on the other hand, avers that he was willing that the defender should possess the farms under the lease, but this the defender refused to do. The landlord now brings this action, concluding for a sum of £935, 12s. 6d. against the executor, as damages incurred by the landlord in respect of non-implement of the contract of lease. The heir of the deceased tenant refused to take up the lease, and there being no other heritable estate left by the tenant, there was no formal renunciation of the succession, but the refusal to take up the lease is, in practical effect

No. 50.

Dec. 16, 1874.
Bethune v. Morgan.

such a renunciation. There could be no doubt that the heir was quite entitled to refuse to take up the lease.

"The defences which are stated against this action by the executor are (second plea)—'The defender, having broken no contract, nor otherwise injured the pursuer, is not liable to pay damages to him;' and (third plea)—'An executor, not being bound to fulfil all the personal engagements of the defunct, is not bound to pay damages for non-fulfilment of a contract when the contract bound the deceased to a defined course of personal conduct, and when that conduct became impossible through death or any other inevitable cause.'"

The Lord Ordinary, on 16th July 1874, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that, according to the true meaning and effect of the lease between the pursuer on the one part and the late Thomas Morgan on the other part, the obligation to pay the rent therein stipulated is validly and effectually constituted, not only against the deceased Thomas Morgan, the original tenant, and against his heir-at-law representing him, but also against the executor of the said deceased Thomas Morgan, and that in valorem and to the extent of the executry-estate: Finds accordingly that the defender, as executor of the deceased Thomas Morgan, and to the extent of the executry-estate, is liable to the pursuer in the rents of the subjects let by the said lease, and that down to the expiry of the lease, subject always to deduction of all sums realised by or available to the pursuer from reletting the subjects of the said lease or otherwise, in consequence of the defender and the heir-at-law having declined to take up the said lease; and with these findings, and before farther answer, allows both parties a proof of their respective averments under the 'Evidence (Scotland) Act, 1866,' and appoints the case to be enrolled that a diet of proof may be fixed; meantime reserves all questions of expenses, and grants leave to reclaim."*

---

* "NOTE.—The abstract question whether or not the defender, as executor of the late Thomas Morgan, was liable to the pursuer either for rent or for any of the prestations under the lease, was fully and anxiously argued at the debate, and both parties concurred in asking a judgment upon this question of law, as a decision thereof in favour of the defender would put an end to the litigation. The Lord Ordinary thinks this request reasonable, and he has, accordingly, decided the question argued.

"The defender is the executor of the late Thomas Morgan, and, admittedly, he is liable in the obligations of the said Thomas Morgan in valorem of the executry estate. Thomas Morgan, at the time of his death, was tenant of the farms of North and South Cassingray under a nineteen years' lease commencing at Martinmas 1858. The question is,—Whether the defender as executor (the heir-at-law having declined to take up the lease, and there being no other heritable succession), is liable to the pursuer either for the rent, or for any of the other prestations in the lease?

"The defender ingeniously maintained that, as the lease was destined to heirs only, as the defender, as the executor, could not claim as of right the succession to the lease, and as it had been expressly found that the defender is not personally bound to take up the lease, so he cannot be made liable either for the rent or for any of the other prestations in the lease, or for damages for the breach thereof.

"The question was said at the bar to be a new one, and the Lord Ordinary is not aware of any decided case precisely applicable. But, upon principle, he has not found much difficulty in repelling the defender's plea, and finding him liable in valorem of the late tenant's personal estate.

"(1) The terms of the lease itself are almost conclusive of the question. No doubt the destination in the lease is taken simply to the tenant 'and his heirs;' all assignees, legal and voluntary, are expressly excluded. But then, when the

No. 50.

Dec. 16, 1874. Bethune v. Morgan.

The defender reclaimed.

The pursuer added in the Inner-House a plea of res judicata. The case was heard before the First Division, with three Judges of the Second Division.

---

tenant comes to bind himself to pay rent, he binds his executors as well as his heirs. The words are—'And, on the other part, the said Thomas Morgan binds and obliges himself, and his heirs, executors, and representatives whomsoever, to make payment to the said Sir John Trotter Bethune,' &c., 'yearly of the sum of £850 sterling,' &c. The meaning of this is not doubtful. It is that the tenant's whole estate, personal as well as heritable, is subjected to, and rendered liable in, payment of the rent due to the landlord. It may be that the heritable estate is primarily liable, although there is no discussion as between heir and executor. It may be that the executor, forced to pay, may have relief against the heir or the heritable succession, but surely when the tenant expressly binds his 'executors and representatives whomsoever,' these words can only mean that his personal estate is to be liable to the landlord. This is pars contractus. The parties have said so, and the law will enforce it. The defender's contention would lead to this, that, although the tenant had left a free personal estate of thousands or millions, the landlord would have no claim thereon for the deficiency of his rent. This contention seems quite inadmissible.

"It is true the executor cannot claim the lease as of right, nor probably could he be compelled to take it up and to cultivate the land, at least unless there be express stipulations to this effect, but this does not affect the express liability which the deceased tenant has constituted against his executor. Probably also, if the heir renounced the lease, and the landlord insisted against the executor, equity would require him, as a condition of so insisting, to receive the executor as tenant. But no question of this kind arises here. The landlord has all along been perfectly willing to receive the defender as tenant, and in the litigation which has already taken place between the parties, he tried to compel the defender and the heir-at-law, Mr James Peattie Morgan, to take up the lease. In this attempt, however, the present pursuer was unsuccessful. Both the heir-at-law and the present defender stated that they would have nothing to do with the lease, and would not become tenants therein. It by no means follows, however, that because the present defender cannot be compelled to take the lease therefore he is not liable as the late tenant's executor for what the late tenant has expressly bound him to pay.

"(2) The question now at issue seems almost to be res judicata in the previous litigation between the parties." (His Lordship here referred to the proceedings in the previous action, narrated in the Lord President's opinion.) "It is difficult to resist the conclusion that this finding, pronounced in foro contentioso between the same parties, and relative to the same matter, is final and binding against the present defender. At the same time, the Lord Ordinary would be unwilling to rely exclusively upon res judicata, if the pursuer's case were not otherwise founded in justice and on principle.

"(3) Various difficulties were ingeniously raised by the defender, none of which, however, appear sufficient to avoid the conclusion now reached. For example, the defender maintained that this is an action of damages for breach of contract; but as it has been found that the defender was not bound to take up the lease, there could be no damages for breach of a contract which was never binding on the defender. But the defender's proposition is too broad, for it often happens that damages are exigible where specific performance cannot be enforced,—for example, in all the higher contracts of service. The Court will not enforce specific implement against a clerk or partner, but he will be liable in damages if the contract is not specifically fulfilled. The true answer, however, is that the present is not an action of damages strictly or properly so called. It is an action for liquidated rent expressly covenanted to be paid, and all that the defender can claim is, that the landlord shall deduct whatever he can fairly make from the subject which has been thrown back upon his hands.

At advising,— No. 50.

Dec. 16, 1874. Bethune v. Morgan.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question raised upon this record is a very important one, and one of very general interest, and it amounts just to this, Where, upon the death of a tenant under a current lease, his heir refuses to take up his lease, is the landlord entitled to come upon the executor for damages for non-fulfilment of the contract for the remaining term of the lease?

The first plea which is maintained on the part of the pursuer is that this question has been already determined between these parties, and that the matter is res judicata; and that undoubtedly stands upon the very threshold of the case, and must be first disposed of.

Now, the case in which it is said that this question was determined between these parties is an action which was raised in the year 1872. The summons was signeted on the 6th July 1872, and was brought by this defender and by his brother, the heir of the deceased Thomas Morgan, against the landlord, and the conclusions of that action are, in the first place, on behalf of the heir, that he is not bound to implement the contract of lease,—in short, it is a declarator of immunity on his part from any of the obligations contained in the lease, by reason of his refusing to take up the succession. And then there follows a conclusion applicable to the case of the executor. The conclusion in favour of the executor is this:—"That the pursuer William Morgan jun. as executor to his late brother Thomas Morgan, or in any other character, is not bound to implement the foresaid contract of lease or to run out said contract;" and "further, that the pursuer William Morgan jun., as executor of the said Thomas Morgan, is entitled to realise the crop, stocking, and other moveable estate left by the said Thomas Morgan upon the farms of North and South Cassingray, and to sell the same by public auction at the term of Martinmas first 1872, or at the first term of Martinmas thereafter that may first occur, not less than twenty days from the date of final decree in this action, &c., always reserving the defender's right of hypothec, as also to vacate the said farms at the said term of Martinmas, as if the said lease had come to its natural termination." Now, this, again, upon instead of being enjoyed by the defender. The sound view is, that the landlord or lessor has two securities for his rent, viz., first, the personal obligation of the tenant and his representatives, and, second, the subject let itself and its fruits. Now, when the debtor refuses to take or enjoy the subject let, and allows the landlord to retain and make the best of it, all that he can demand is that the landlord shall deduct from the liquid rent due the utmost that he can recover from his real security.

---

"A farther difficulty raised by the defender was how far the landlord, who at best is only a creditor for sums to fall due during the next three years, can demand decree for a present sum, even offering, as he does, to discount interest. But this does not create any practical difficulty, and the defender himself, who says he is anxious to wind up the executry-estate, will hardly insist on keeping it up till the ish of the lease.

"As the parties are at issue as to what the landlord has realised from the lease, and whether he has duly and timeously re-let the subject, and on other points of detail, the Lord Ordinary has allowed a proof. Here again the defender demanded, as of right, a jury trial, insisting that this was an action of damages and an enumerated cause. As this is not the view the Lord Ordinary takes, and as the questions in dispute are more appropriate for a proof, the Lord Ordinary has ordered proof in common form. He has reserved expenses, but the whole expenses since closing the record should fall on the defender."

No. 50.

Dec. 16, 1874.
Bethune v. Morgan.

the part of the defender, is a declarator of immunity also. He desires to have it declared that he is free from any of the obligations contained in that lease, and entitled, at the same time, to realise the crops which belong to the executry estate. The important pleas which were maintained in that action on behalf of the defender, the landlord, are the second and fourth. The second is,—"The pursuers, as representing the late tenant, being bound to implement the obligations in the lease and to carry it on to its expiry, under the penalties therein stipulated, they are not entitled to decree as concluded for." And the fourth is,—"At all events, the pursuers are not entitled to relinquish the farm, and to have decree as concluded for, without admitting their liability, and providing for the loss and damage incurred and to be incurred to the defender in respect of breach of contract." Now, it will be observed that these two pleas embrace the case of both the pursuers, but taking them as pleas directed against the case of the present defender, the executor, they amount to this, that the executor, as representing the late tenant, is bound to implement the obligations in the lease, and is not entitled to have a declarator of immunity from these obligations for the future, except upon the footing of his making good any loss and damage which the landlord has incurred in respect of non-fulfilment of the contract. The issue thus raised is said to be identical with that which is raised in the present action, or, at all events, it is said that the issue which is raised in the present action is comprehended within that which is raised by the first action. On this question of res judicata it certainly does not matter at all that in the one case the executor is pursuer and the landlord is defender, and in the other that the landlord is pursuer and the executor is defender, if the question raised in the two cases be the same, the parties being also the same.

Now, the interlocutor which was pronounced by Lord Shand, in so far as concerns the executor's case, is this,—"As regards the other pursuer, William Morgan jun., Finds (1st) that having completed a title as executor of his late brother, the said Thomas Morgan, and having in that character intromitted with his brother's moveable estate, he is liable, as his brother's executor, for the fulfilment of the obligations contained in said lease, or otherwise in damages for breach thereof; (2) that he has become personally responsible for the rents stipulated by said lease for the crops and years 1871-2 and 1872-3, but has not by his actings made himself personally responsible, and is not personally liable for the fulfilment of the obligations of the said lease for the period thereof which has yet to run, as maintained by the defender; (3) that the pursuer, the said William Morgan jun., is entitled to realise and dispose of the whole crop and stocking on the said farms in such manner as he may think to the best advantage, subject always to the defender's right of hypothec, and to his, the said William Morgan junior's, existing obligations as executor foresaid, and personally to the defender in terms of the preceding findings, and decerns." Now, in some respects, this is a judgment in favour of the executor. It is in his favour in so far as it finds that he is not personally responsible to the landlord for the obligations of the lease for the period yet to run, and it is in his favour also in so far as it entitles him to reap the crops for the years 1871-2 and 1872-3 without incurring any such personal obligation. But it is against him in so far as it makes him personally responsible for the rents of these two years, and again in so far as it makes him liable, as executor, for the whole obligations of the lease during the period yet to run. I think this is a very distinct and discriminating interlocutor, be it sound or unsound upon its merits. And this

No. 50.
Dec. 16, 1874.
Bethune v. Morgan.

interlocutor was brought under review of the Second Division of the Court at the instance of the defender in that action, the present pursuer. He objected to the findings which were contained in that interlocutor in favour of both the pursuers. But the present defender (the executor), although that reclaiming note gave him an opportunity of bringing the findings under review in so far as they were adverse to him, did not avail himself of that opportunity, and so the interlocutor, as far as he was concerned, became final.

Now, as Lord Shand has found that the executor, William Morgan jun., as executor, and in that character specially, is liable for the whole obligations of the lease for the period yet to run, or otherwise in damages for non-fulfilment of these obligations, and as this action is brought for the purpose of recovering the damages thus arising, it does not appear to me that it is possible to dispute that that liability is a matter upon which judgment has been already pronounced —or, in other words, that so far as the liability of the present defender is concerned this is res judicata. I do not think there could be any better test of that than to look at the interlocutor pronounced by the Lord Ordinary in this case, which seems to me just to decide over again the question which was decided by Lord Shand; for Lord Gifford finds "that the defender, as executor of the deceased Thomas Morgan, and to the extent of the executry estate, is liable to the pursuer in the rents of the subjects let by the said lease, and that down to the expiry of the lease, subject always to deduction of all sums realised by, or available to, the pursuer from reletting the subjects of the said lease, or otherwise in consequence of the defender and the heir-at-law having declined to take up the said lease." That seems to me, as far as the executor is concerned, to be a judgment to the same effect, although in other words, with that which was pronounced by Lord Shand. I am therefore for sustaining the plea of res judicata.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK, and LORD DEAS, LORD NEAVES, LORD ARDMILLAN, LORD ORMIDALE, and LORD MURE concurred, expressly reserving their opinion on the general question.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the said interlocutor reclaimed against: Sustain the plea of res judicata: Find, in terms of the judgment in the previous action between the same parties, that the defender having completed a title as executor of his late brother Thomas Morgan, and having in that character intromitted with his brother's moveable estate, he is liable as his brother's executor for the fulfilment of the obligations contained in the lease contracted by the pursuer and the defender's late brother, or otherwise in damages for breach thereof." The Court further remitted to the Lord Ordinary to allow a proof, and found "the pursuer entitled to expenses since the interlocutor reclaimed against, but under deduction of one-third of the taxed amount thereof," &c.

GIBSON-CRAIG, DALZIEL, & BRODIES, W.S.—WILLIAM MILNE, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 51.
Dec. 16, 1874.
Auld v. Shairp.

MRS JESSIE STEWART HOWAT OR AULD, Pursuer.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—J. C. Smith.
JOHN CAMPBELL SHAIRP, Defender.—D.-F. Clark—Lancaster.

Reparation—Slander—Title to Sue—Executor.—A widow, two years after her husband's death, raised an action of damages as his executrix and as an individual,

No. 51.

Dec. 16, 1874.
Auld v. Shairp.

alleging that the defender, by illegally retaining a professorship in a college after his appointment to the office of principal, and by slanderous statements concerning the deceased, had prevented the patron of the professorship from implementing a written promise to appoint the deceased to the chair. Held (diss. Lord Ormidale) that the pursuer had set forth a title to sue.

Observations on the maxim of the civil law, Actio personalis moritur cum persona.

2D DIVISION. Lord Gifford. R.

THIS action was raised on 2d January 1874 by Mrs Auld, as executrix-dative of her husband, the late James Auld, LL.D., sometime classical master, Madras College, St Andrews, and as an individual, against John Campbell Shairp, LL.D., Principal of the United College at St Andrews. The summons concluded for payment of £5000 "in name of damages and as a solatium."

The circumstances out of which the action arose were shortly as follows:—Upon the resignation of Principal Forbes, the defender, who was then Professor of Humanity in the United College at St Andrews, received from the Crown the appointment of Principal of the College. On the 17th December 1868 he intimated to the College and to the Duke of Portland, the patron of the chair of Humanity, his readiness to resign the chair of Humanity at such time as should be advantageous to the college and convenient to the Duke. Upon the suggestion of Mr James Melville, W.S., the Duke's commissioner in Scotland, and at the request of the College, Principal Shairp consented to teach the Latin classes till the end of the session. This arrangement was embodied in a minute of the College, dated 17th December 1868.

In consequence of these proceedings, applications for the office of Professor of Humanity were made to the patron by various candidates, and among others by the late Dr Auld, husband of the pursuer, then classical master in the Madras College, St Andrews. His application was dated 11th March 1869, to which he received the following reply from the Duke:—"Welbeck, 13th March 1869. Sir,—I have this morning received your letter of the 11th inst., with the testimonials, and have great pleasure in determining at once to appoint you to the chair of Humanity in the University of St Andrews, notwithstanding the previous applications for it from others for some months past, all highly recommended. I feel assured the superior claims of yourself will be generally admitted by all whose opinion is of importance, and I trust that few, if any, of your rival candidates will fail to acquiesce in the fitness of the selection. I have only further to add that I shall be obliged to you to put yourself in communication with Mr Melville of George Street, Edinburgh, my commissioner for Scotland, when the proper time arrives for completing the appointment, and to beg you in the meantime to take the best means of making it generally known that your appointment is decided upon, to relieve others from their suspense. I have the honour to be, Sir, your most obedient servant. SCOTT PORTLAND."

The pursuer averred;—(Cond. 6) "In reliance upon the appointment conferred upon him by the foresaid letter the said James Auld, on 19th March 1869, resigned his appointment, then held by him for life, as head classical master in the Madras College of St Andrews. In his letter of resignation he proposed that his retirement should take place at Whitsunday following, being the period of the termination of the United College session, when his appointment as professor would take effect." (Cond. 7) "Notwithstanding the legal disability of the principal of the said United College to hold a professorship in conjunction with his office of principal, and notwithstanding his actual resignation of the professorship of Humanity, to take effect from 15th May 1869, as embodied in the fore-

No. 51.

Dec. 16, 1874.
Auld v. Shairp.

said minute, the defender, on the expiration of the time during which it was agreed that he should continue to perform the duties of the professorship, refused to demit the same, and continued to exercise the office of professor, and to receive the emoluments pertaining to the office until after the death of the said James Auld, which took place on 11th August 1871." (Cond. 8) "In order to obtain the concurrence of the Senatus Academicus to his holding the new office of Principal and his former office of Professor of Humanity, and to prevent the Duke of Portland from issuing a presentation to the said chair of Humanity in favour of the said James Auld, the defender took repeated opportunities of slandering the said James Auld, and representing him to be a person unfit, both intellectually and morally, to fill the said chair. He made verbal statements to this effect to all the professors in the United College, and particularly to Professor Campbell, the Professor of Greek in the University, during the months of March, April, and May 1869, or about that time. Farther, in or about the months of March, April, and May 1869, the defender wrote letters to the patron, the Duke of Portland, in which he falsely and calumniously represented that the said James Auld was unfit to discharge the duties of the office to which the said patron had promised to appoint him, that he was a broken down old man incapable of the work of the chair, from age, infirmity, and ill health, and that he had obtained the promise of the appointment from the said patron through the deceitful or fraudulent use of certificates or testimonials which did not truly represent his qualifications and which had been given to him, he being fully aware of the fact of their being so given, not as bona fide testimony of his merits as a scholar and teacher, but out of compassion and pity, and to save him from being dismissed from the office of classical master in the Madras College, St Andrews, which he then held. The purport of some of the said letters was to some extent communicated to the said James Auld, but neither he nor the pursuer have been able to ascertain the exact terms of them. They were, however, to the effect above mentioned."*

* The letter chiefly founded on was recovered under a diligence:—"United College, St Andrews, 17 March [1869].—My Lord Duke,—I trust that my duty to the college over which I have been called to preside will be considered to justify my laying before your Grace the impression which the news of Dr Auld's proposed appointment to the Humanity chair has created in this university. It has been received with what I can call nothing short of consternation. Those interested in the United College feel that it would be one of the heaviest blows that could possibly be given to its prosperity. If Dr Auld is placed in that chair I feel sure that the reputation of the college as a place of education will receive a grievous shock, and that the number of students attending it will be greatly diminished. In making this assertion, which is my deliberate opinion, I am speaking at the same time the opinion of almost all the professors and residents in St Andrews with whom I have conversed on the subject. The grounds on which I make this statement are these: It is a well known fact here that Dr Auld, though an amiable and respectable man, has not proved himself an energetic or efficient teacher, but has notoriously failed in his present post as classical master in the Madras College, which is the name of our burgh school. In proof of this I have but to refer to the enclosed extract from the report of the Commissioners on Scottish Burgh Schools, 1868.

"If the account given in this extract describes truly his work in school among boys, how much greater will his failure be in teaching our college classes, which require much greater vigour, power of command, and scholarship. I believe that Dr Auld has forwarded to your Grace certain testimonials from some of the professors here, of whom several are now gone, one or two remain, and of these last I am myself one. Let me now inform you of the circumstances under which these were given. Six years or more ago the trustees of the Madras College

No. 51.

Dec. 16, 1874.
Auld v.
Shairp.

(Cond. 9) "The said James Auld never obtained the said appointment, in consequence of the defender's said conduct and representations, and remained without employment till the date of his death, which took place in the forty-ninth year of his age, and was caused mainly by anxiety and disappointment. He sustained loss, injury, and damage, as has also the pursuer, from the defender's conduct and misrepresentations, to the extent of £5000 or thereby."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The defender having illegally retained possession of the said chair of Humanity, and wrongfully prevented the said James Auld from being presented thereto, and having thereby caused loss, injury, and damage to him and to the pursuer, he ought to be decerned to make reparation as concluded for. (2) The defender having slandered the said James Auld, he is liable in reparation as concluded for, with expenses."

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(1) No title to sue. (2) The averments of the pursuer are irrelevant and insufficient in law to support the conclusions of the summons.

The pursuer having moved for a diligence to recover the letters containing the alleged slander, the Lord Ordinary, on 30th June 1874, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Having heard parties' procurators upon the pursuer's motion for diligence, and also on the first and second pleas in law stated for the defender, repels said pleas, in so far as the same are insisted in as excluding the action altogether; and, before farther answer, grants diligence at the pursuer's instance for recovery of the became so dissatisfied with Dr Auld's teaching that they resolved to remove him from his post. Several of the professors, believing that he was being somewhat too rudely dealt with, and feeling compassion for an amiable man in danger of losing his livelihood, wrote for him testimonials expressed as strongly as they could, perhaps somewhat too strongly. The testimonials, I believe, saved Dr Auld from dismissal. This was the object with which they were written. But they were never intended to certify to his fitness for a professorial chair; and if Dr Auld has laid them before your Grace for this purpose I must be allowed to say that he had no right to do so. All the other candidates sent me their testimonials. Dr Auld did not do so, well aware that, in the interests of the college. I would not have given him any countenance in his candidature. Had I entertained any idea that his claims would have appeared to you superior to those of several of the other candidates, men of much higher scholarship and greater success as teachers, I should have felt it my duty to inform you of the real state of the case, as I now do. If it is still possible for your Grace to reconsider your decision, I know that the university would forward to you a memorial signed by almost every professor, representing how great a calamity Dr Auld's appointment would be considered, and entreating that you would make some other appointment which would be likely not only not to injure the university but might be expected to benefit it.

---

"In doing this the professors of the United College and of St Mary's would act not from any personal feeling against Dr Auld, towards whom personally they are friendly disposed, but simply from the conviction that his appointment would be calamitous to the welfare of the university.

"I would only add that in making this statement I have done so with much pain, but I feel that I should be wanting in my duty both to my college and to your Grace if I did not tell you what I know to be the truth of the case.—I remain, my Lord Duke, your obedient humble servant, J. C. SHAIRP."

"Extract from Government Report on the state of Education in the Burgh Schools of Scotland, vol. ii. page 76.—Dr Auld's department.—On the whole, the classical teaching resulted in the production of unsatisfactory scholars, only the two or three boys at the top of the class did well enough. The Latin prose exercise was ill done, the discipline was loose, and the boys appeared uninterested."

writings mentioned in the specification No. 8 of process, and commission No. 51.
to Mr George Watson, advocate, Edinburgh, or to Mr Stuart Grace, solicitor, St Andrews, to examine the havers and receive their exhibits, the commission to be reported within fourteen days: Appoints the pursuer to lodge issues within four days after the said diligence is reported, reserving entire the defender's pleas, so far as not now repelled: Meantime, grants leave to reclaim against this interlocutor."*

Dec. 16, 187[illegible]. Auld v. Shairp.

* "NOTE.—In this case an anxious argument was maintained on the part of the defender, Principal Shairp, in support of the first and second pleas in law stated for him. He insisted that he was entitled, without any farther proceedings whatever, and without even recovering the letters containing the alleged slander complained of, to have the action dismissed with expenses. The defender accordingly resisted the pursuer's motion for a diligence, and objected to any order for issues being pronounced.

"The defender's argument was rested mainly on the maxim 'Actio personalis moritur cum persona,'—a personal action dies with the person. He maintained that an action of damages or for solatium for alleged slander was a personal action in the strictest sense, and that the right to raise or to insist in such an action did not transmit to the executors of the person slandered. He supported this contention by various authorities and analogies from the law of England, and also from the Roman law.

"The Lord Ordinary was much moved by the defender's argument, which he has carefully considered. If the question had been quite open, the Lord Ordinary's inclination would have been to give effect to the defence, and to dismiss the action. He thinks there is strong reason, as well as strong authority, for holding that a mere claim for solatium for bodily or mental pain, where no damages to estate or patrimonial injury can be relevantly stated or proved, is really a personal action, to which the Roman maxim applies.

"In the present state of the authorities in the law of Scotland, however, the Lord Ordinary has found himself obliged to repel the defender's pleas, and to allow the action to proceed. It will be for the jury to consider how far the alleged slander, if proved, and if no other defence is made good, has resulted in loss and injury to the present pursuer.

"In the first place, no case has been cited by the defender in which an action like the present has in Scotland been found incompetent. The Lord Ordinary is not aware of any such case, or even of any dictum in the institutional writers, directly in point, although there are expressions which may be read consistently with the defender's view. The want of any direct authority in favour of the defender's plea is a strong ground for refusing to sustain it. The case must often have occurred.

"But there seems to be authority in the law of Scotland adverse to the defender's pleas, and there are many cases in which actions of damages similar in nature to the present have been insisted in by executors or personal representatives.

"A very well known instance occurs in the celebrated case of Haggart v. Lord President Hope (final report in House of Lords, 2 Shaw's Appeal Cases, 125). This was an action of damages at the instance of an advocate against Lord President Hope for alleged slanderous censure uttered by the Lord President on the bench judicially, which censure was alleged to have been made from motives of private malice. In the course of the procedure the pursuer, Mr Haggart, died, but his trustees and executors were allowed to insist in the action. There seems to have been a question whether the trustees might not have been required to give their oath of calumny, but it was not doubted that they had a right and title to insist in the action.

"In Mein v. M'Call, 7th June 1844, 6 D. 1112, 16 Scot. Jur. 486, where the pursuer of an action of damages died during the dependence, it was found that the claim of damages was transmitted to his widow and executrix, who was entitled to insist in the action.

"In Neilson v. Rodger, 24th December 1853, 16 D. 325, 26 Scot. Jur. 156, the question was fully and carefully considered, and it was held by the Second

No. 51. The defender reclaimed.

Dec 16, 1874. Auld v. Shairp. Upon the 15th July 1874 the Court pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard counsel on the reclaiming note, before farther answer on

---

Division (dissenting the Lord Justice-Clerk), that in an action for personal injury concluding for damages and solatium, where the pursuer died during the dependence of the action, her executors were entitled to insist in the action, with an issue whether the injury which the pursuer had sustained was to the injury and damage of the deceased pursuer and of the executors as representing her. The opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk Hope, who was in the minority, is a very weighty one, but the decision is binding at all events upon the present Lord Ordinary.

"It is thought no sound distinction can be taken between an action for solatium for bodily injury and an action for solatium for slander which occasions mental suffering. Nor will the result be different in the case where the action is actually raised by the original sufferer and afterwards insisted in by his executor, from the case where the party injured dies before raising action. No doubt the fact that the deceased did not himself raise action may be of great weight with the jury, especially if any considerable interval was allowed to elapse, but this will not affect the abstract competency of the action. Reference may be made to the cases of Milne v. Gauld's Trustees, 14th January 1841, 3 D. 345, 13 Scot Jur. 151; Smith v. Stoddart, 5th July 1850, 12 D. 1185, 22 Scot Jur. 532; Gilfillan v. Monkhouse, 18th May 1824, 3 S. 23.

"But there is another element in the present case which operates strongly as a reason why the present action should be allowed to proceed, and that is, that special patrimonial damage is alleged by the pursuer, consisting not only of the loss of the late Dr Auld's former income, arising from his resignation, but also of the loss of the emoluments of the Humanity chair, from which, it is said, Dr Auld was excluded by the alleged slander complained of. It was not seriously disputed by the defender that where there has been direct patrimonial damage the action transmits to an executor. See Gordon v. Davidson (Aberdeen Bank), 26th February 1864, 2 Macph. 758, 36 Scot. Jur. 376.

"On this point of the case, however, the defender maintained that there could be no patrimonial damage, because the chair of Humanity in St Andrews, for which the late Dr Auld was a candidate, was not vacant during Dr Auld's life, having been held by the defender himself all that time, and he being under no obligation to resign. This led to an interesting argument as to how far it was legal or competent for the defender to hold at the same time the office of Principal of the United Colleges of St Salvator and St Leonards, and also the office of Professor of Humanity in the United College. On this point the Lord Ordinary has formed a pretty distinct opinion that there is no absolute illegality in the union of the two offices, it not being alleged that the discharge of the duties of the chair interfere with, or are inconsistent with, the discharge of the duties of principal. The provisions of the Act of Parliament of 1747 are not conclusive on the question, for although the statute provides that there shall be one principal and nine professors, this does not necessarily mean that one of the professors may not be appointed to and hold the office of principal. The practice both in St Andrews and in other universities seems to have sanctioned at least the occasional appointment of one of the professors to the office of principal, without involving the demission of his chair. The recommendations of the Royal Commissioners of 1826 and 1830 never had the force of law. They were never formally sanctioned or confirmed; but even these recommendations are so qualified as to imply that a principal may, in certain circumstances, also hold a professor's chair.

"It does not appear necessary, however, to pronounce any judgment upon this question; for the pursuer's case is not founded exclusively on the alleged illegality of the defender's plurality of offices, but also upon his intimation that he was ready to resign and on an alleged minute of resignation. The pursuer also relied upon the late Dr Auld's actual resignation of his life appointment of classical master in the Madras College, which resignation is said to have been made in consequence of his appointment to the professorship, which the defender stated

No. 51.

Dec. 16, 1874. Auld v. Shairp.

so much of the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary as repels the first and second pleas, adhere to the same in so far as it grants diligence for the recovery of writings, and appoints issues to be lodged: Of new appoints the said diligence to be reported by the first box-day, and issues to be lodged by the first sederunt-day in October, reserving all questions of expenses."

The pursuer's diligence having been executed, issues were lodged for her.

The debate was then resumed.

Argued for the defender;—By the civil law an action for slander did not transmit to the heirs of the person slandered or against the heirs of the slanderer, unless an action had been raised in which litiscontestation had taken place.[1] The same view was held by the modern civilians, and the reason assigned was, that unless an action was raised in the lifetime of the injured person there was a presumption that the injury had been forgiven.[2] By the French law, while such actions transmitted against the representatives of the wrongdoer they did not transmit to the representatives of the injured person.[3] The law of England was to the same effect as the civil law.[4] It was said upon the other side that this was not a mere claim for solatium for wounded feelings, but that the slander complained of involved special patrimonial loss to Dr Auld, viz. the loss of the emoluments of the chair of Humanity. To support this averment of patrimonial loss it was necessary for the pursuer to shew that the slander was the cause of the loss,—in other words, to shew that the chair of Humanity was vacant. Unless it was illegal in the defender to retain that chair (and the Lord Ordinary was with the defender upon this point), it was impossible for the Duke of Portland to fulfil his promise to Dr Auld, and any loss which he suffered arose not out of the defender's slander, but out of a legal act on the part of the defender, which could not found a claim of damages.

Argued for the pursuer;—Had Dr Auld survived it would have been a jury question how far Principal Shairp's statements injured Dr Auld's professional prospects. The claim, if well founded, would have given right to a sum of money. A claim for money, which it was in the power of a person to add to his estate, if successful, transmitted to his representatives.[5] would be vacant as from 15th May 1869. On the whole, the Lord Ordinary thinks it would be unsafe to exclude all inquiry into these matters, and to decide them as mere questions of relevancy upon the pursuer's averments.

---

"The result is, that, in the Lord Ordinary's opinion, the action must proceed. The usual order would be an order for issues, but the letters containing the alleged slander are not in the pursuer's possession, and as the pursuer intends to put these letters in issue, he moved for a diligence to recover them. The defender resisted this, not only on the grounds of irrelevancy above mentioned, but also on the ground that the letters were private and privileged. The Lord Ordinary has granted the diligence, but the defender's plea of privilege is of course reserved entire. It cannot well be judged of till the letters themselves are seen.

"As the defender's pleas were seriously and keenly insisted in, as excluding the action altogether, the Lord Ordinary has granted leave to reclaim."

[1] Inst. iv. 12, 1 (see iv. 4, 1); Digest, xlvii. tit. 10, secs. 13 and 28.

[2] Vinnius on the Institutes, iv. 12, 6; Voet on the Pandects, xlvii. 10, 22; Heineccius on the Pandects, xlvii. 10, 124.

[3] Pothier, Traité des Obligationes, sec. 638; Domat, i. tit. 1, sec. 10; Merlin, Repertoire, "Injure," sec. 6 (vol. vi. p. 132).

[4] Broom's Legal Maxims, p. 912; Williams on Executors, vol. ii. p. 1728 (7th ed.); Addison on Torts, p. 925 (4th ed.); Chamberlain v. Williamson, Feb. 11, 1814, 2 Maule and Selwyn, 408, see Lord Ellenborough's judgment.

[5] See cases referred to by the Lord Ordinary; also Thom v. Bridges and Macqueen, March 11, 1857, 19 D. 721, 29 Scot. Jur. 311; Davidson v. Tulloch (Aberdeen Bank case), Feb. 23, 1860 3 Macq. 783, 32 Scot. Jur. 363.

No. 51. At advising,—

Dec. 16, 1874. Auld v. Shairp.

LORD NEAVES.—This case involves questions of importance and interest, and is not unattended with difficulty.

The only points we have to consider at present are raised in the first and second pleas in law for the defender, viz., 1st, "No title to sue;" and 2d, "The averments of the pursuer are irrelevant and insufficient in law to support the conclusions of the summons." These pleas have been disposed of by the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor in this manner,—"Repels said pleas in so far as the same are insisted in as excluding the action altogether." This interlocutor is brought under review by the defender, who asks us, in the first place, to sustain his first plea, for if it were to be sustained the action, as he conceives, would entirely fail. This plea, which relates to the title to pursue, is rested upon the maxim of the Roman law with regard to an actio personalis,—it is said that this is a personal action, and falls with the death of the person. The action brought by Mr Auld's widow is said not to lie, in consequence of Mr Auld's death.

In the first place, as regards this plea, it is not easy, in any view. to say that there is an absolute want of title to pursue, because the action is partly laid as upon damage to the pursuer individually. Whether that is relevantly laid is another matter, but certainly the pursuer here proposes to prove damage to herself. What kind of damage does not appear, and of course it is a question whether it is relevantly stated; but as long as such damage is concluded for, it is impossible to say that there is not a title to sue.

In the next place, I conceive that this plea, with reference even to the damage sustained by the late Mr Auld, is not in our law so received and recognised as to be fatal to the action. The Roman law dealt with such actions in the case of the death of a party in different ways. In the case of some actions the death of either party was fatal to the action; in others, the right of action was allowed only to the injured party against the heirs of the wrongdoer. The Roman law, as stated in the Institutes, book iv. title 12, sec. 1, is as follows:—"Non autem omnes actiones, quæ in aliquem aut ipso jure competunt, aut a Prætore dantur et in hæredem æque competunt, aut dari solent. Est enim certissima juris regula, ex maleficiis pœnales actiones in hæredem rei non competere; veluti furti, vi bonorum raptorum, injuriarum, damni injuriæ. Sed hæredibus hujusmodi actiones competunt, nec denegantur: excepta injuriarum actione." It is this exception that is now founded upon. It is plain that actions of the nature of a proper suit for a penalty cannot be insisted in after the death of the wrongdoer, but the present case relates to the death of the injured party; and the Roman law states it as a general rule that an action even upon delict may be maintained against the wrongdoer by the heir of the injured party except in one case, and that is the injuriarum actio. Now, is this such an action? The reason of the exception in the case of an actio injuriarum is thus assigned by Vinnius:—"Actio injuriarum neque hæredibus neque in hæredes datur. Quod non datur in hæredes, hoc commune habet cum ceteris pœnalibus:" it is treated as a penal action—an action for punishment—"quod hæredibus non datur, ejus proprium est, et hanc rationem habet, quod in ea non principaliter de damno farciendo, sed de contumelia vindicanda agitur, quam vindictam, si injuriam passus lite non instituta decesserit, tacite remisisse intelligitur: de quo dixi, et hinc est quod actio injuriarum in bonis nostris non computatur ante quam litem contestemur." Now, if that be the ground of the law, it appears to be an arbitrary and artificial one. It may be a fair question of presumption, whether, according to the circumstances of each case, a party injured by a slander or libel has acquiesced: his having made no complaint,—but gone to his grave after some time without saying anything about it,—may afford grounds, when discovered and investigated, for relieving the party from the consequences of that which had been done, but which was not apparently felt as an injury. But to make an inflexible rule that the death of the injured party shall exclude the action, and that he shall be held to have condoned or remitted it, seems a forced, and, it may be, a very false assumption. It takes into account in no way the interval of time between the injury and the death, and in that way it prevents us from forming any probable or reasonable presumption in the matter. Some authorities say that actual litiscontestation must take place before the action will pass to the sufferer's heirs and representatives. That is a view altogether inconsistent with the other presumption, because the bringing of the action ought to extinguish the presumption of condonation, though it does not get the length of litiscontestation, and is also, in my humble opinion, an artificial and unfair rule. We do not attach the same importance to litiscontestation as the Romans did, and therefore I cannot think that we should be prepared to rest our judgment upon that view.

No. 51.

Dec. 16, 1874. Auld v. Shairp.

There is an obvious distinction in principle between an action of a penal or criminal character for punishment or for vindication of the law, and an action for money reparation to a party injured, who has died at a short or a long interval. The two things are quite different. The one is brought in the public interest; the other is in the interest of the private party. Money is the universal solvent; everything can be turned into money that is either a gain or a loss; money is asked and damages are due for reparation of every possible suffering and injury that a calumny or a libel can inflict on the party affected. In that view, the alleged extinction of personal actions is evidently inapplicable, or not in accordance with sound principle. Our own law, at least on one side of the question, is stated accurately, as I conceive, by Mr Bell, who, speaking of these actions, says:—"A delict is an offence committed with an injurious, fraudulent, or criminal purpose. Criminal law looks to the prevention of delict by punishment, example, and terror, without any view to indemnification; while civil jurisprudence, looking only to indemnification, without regard to punishment or example, raises, for this purpose, by construction of law, an obligation to repair the damage occasioned by the delict." He goes on to say,—"The civil action for reparation, grounded on delict, is not, like the penal action in criminal law, confined to the delinquent. The wrongdoer's representative is liable for reparation; in which we follow the rule of the canon rather than of the civil law."[1] Now, this is stated only with regard to the wrongdoer's representatives,—the civil action of reparation transmits against the wrongdoer's representatives. But the same reason seems to be plainly applicable also to the case of the sufferer's representatives. Looking to the distinction between criminality and reparation, a civil action for reparation is not like a penal action in criminal law. If an injury is done causing damage, a civil debt immediately arises which may be sued for in a civil Court, and that action passes against the representative of the party who did the injury, just as any other action of [1] Bell's Principles, secs. 544, 546.

No. 51.

Dec. 16, 1874.
Auld v. Shairp.

debt does. It seems to me that it must equally pass and transmit to the heir and representative of the injured party, who, unless his predecessor has forgiven it, which is not to be assumed, has acquired a right to a debt which may be enforced with all the usual diligences, arrestment on the dependence, and everything of that kind which can be used in any other action.

I observe that the Lord Ordinary has said that but for the authorities in our own law he would have been inclined to dismiss the action. I confess I have not that feeling. A person is injured by any act of wrongdoing—his character is damaged, his pecuniary affairs are affected, he loses a situation, he suffers a great deal of injury in many ways; why should that not be repaired by those that represent the actual wrongdoer, assuming always that there was wrong done? I cannot see any equity in that, and I doubt much if that is the result of the general jurisprudence of Europe.

It is particularly necessary to look at the nature of this action. I do not look upon it as an action for mere slander, or merely for the purpose of vindicating character. The statement substantially is that a line of conduct pursued by the defender, of which injurious representations were a part, but only a part, took place to the patrimonial loss and injury of the late Dr Auld, for which a debt arose to him,—a claim for reparation against the party who is said to have injured him. I cannot see how that should not transmit. Suppose a great patrimonial loss suffered—or take the special case of a situation being lost,—supposing that he had had a situation and lost it by an injurious act, partly founded upon slander, and partly otherwise,—why should his family, who partook of his fortunes, and would have succeeded indirectly to the benefit conferred, if he was in possession or was in expectation of a situation, be deprived of what might have been a just claim at his instance, and not be entitled to the benefit after his death in the same way as if he had survived litiscontestation? I cannot say that I think such a plea founded on equity or reason.

This action, in many respects may be found, when we get the length of considering the relevancy, a very difficult action to maintain on some points, for it involves very difficult questions. In particular, it seems to involve the question as to the alleged wrongful and illegal retention of the Humanity chair, which is at the bottom of the whole case. It will be a very difficult action to maintain if that contention is not well founded, and if Principal Shairp was entitled to hold the chair. The plea in law maintained by the pursuer is that the chair was vacant, but that by apparently filling it up, and by the letters written to the patron, the deceased Dr Auld was prevented from getting his appointment. The ground of action is a general line of conduct characterised as being wrongful in law, and injurious patrimonially, by occasioning the loss of one office and the giving up of another.

We have not yet got the length of relevancy, and I do not in the meantime go into that question. On the first plea we must hold the action to be relevant as laid, and consider whether, as so laid, the right has perished by the death of the injured party. Now, I cannot make up my mind to that defence even upon general principles; but I think that what I have stated is the law of Scotland. Mr Bell, in his Principles, cites two cases in the 15th volume of the Folio Faculty Col., which are deserving of attention—one of them the case of Macnaughton v. Robertson, February 17, 1809, where an action for reparation of actual patrimonial loss arising ex delicto was found competent against an heir lucratus by succeeding to the offender. And it is to be observed, as to that decision and some others, that what is meant is not that the particular offence had been the means of enriching the party, but that if there is a lucrative succession under which he is liable passive, he will be liable to repair the injury done.

No. 51.

Dec. 16, 1874. Auld v. Shairp.

There is another case in the same volume, Morrison v. Cameron, May 25, 1809, F. C., in which the rubric is, "Actions ex delicto pass against heirs if they are for damages, not punishment," and in a note annexed, I presume by the reporter, it is said—"The opinion of the Court was not rested on the circumstance that the action had proceeded a certain length before the death of the original defender, but on the ground stated above as in itself sufficient,"—that ground being that while criminal actions do not transmit against heirs, because their object is punishment, which could only answer its purpose by being inflicted on the delinquent himself, yet, where damages had arisen by delinquency, the right to reparation was a debt which was no more extinguished by the death of the debtor than any other debt; and I should presume also in the same way no more extinguished by the death of the creditor than any other debt; for a dying man transmits his claims, just as a man that has incurred a debt transmits his liability to his representative, if he has a representative that is passively liable. In that case it was said the pursuer, by the misconduct of somebody, had lost the benefit of his diligence, and in consequence suffered damage for which reparation was due. To this effect the action was held to transmit against the defender's representatives, and the reporter assigns this view as the ground, and not the fact that the action had proceeded a certain length, and he mentions another case of Mackenzie in which the same view was taken. The remarks made shew that, if there is any difference, there is greater difficulty in transmitting such actions against the representative of the wrongdoer, who may be wholly innocent, than there is in transmitting the right of action to the representative of the other party.

There is another well known case, the case of Neilson v. Rodger,[1] which seems to me to settle the case completely. It is a remarkable case altogether. The rubric is—"The pursuer of an action for injury sustained in the service of an employer died during the dependence of the action from the effects of the accident. Held that the right to recover damages transmitted to the executors of the deceased, and that they were entitled to carry on the action." Now, if we take the circumstance that the action having been brought was not considered to be essential, but that the question depended on the real relations subsisting between the parties, the opinions of the Judges in the case are very important. Lord Wood says,—"The claim for damages and solatium embraced by this action is one which had arisen to the original pursuer Margaret Neilson during her life, and which, by the institution of the action, she had given the best proof she did not mean to abstain from vindicating, as no doubt it was in her power to have done." Then he says,—"Upon the authorities I apprehend it cannot be denied that where a claim for damages and solatium arises on account of bodily injury, from any other cause, the right vests ipso jure and ipso facto prior to any proceeding or decree for its constitution, that it is a moveable claim,—is assignable either by positive conveyance or implied legal assignation, and that it passes to personal representatives." That was the opinion adopted by the majority of the Court. There was one opinion adverse to it, which is well worth studying, for it is rested on a ground peculiar to that action, and not at all involved in [1] Neilson v. Rodger, Dec. 24, 1853, 16 D. 325, 26 Scot. Jur. 156.

No. 51.

Dec. 16, 1874.
Auld v. Shairp.

this,—at least not in such a way as is likely to receive any effect here. The view of the Lord Justice-Clerk, who differed from the rest of the Court, was this: The party who had been injured in her person, brought her action, and then had died of the consequences of the injury, and the reasoning of the Lord Justice-Clerk there was, not that the claim, if she had died in some other way, might not have transmitted, but that as she, the original pursuer, had died in consequence of an act that was the foundation of the act of damages, the true and full remedy arose from her death, and vested in those only who would be entitled to sue for what had happened by her death, which it would seem did not belong to them as her representatives, but to themselves in their own right, as upon an assythment; in short, that her claim, though made the subject of an action for the smaller damage of being a damaged person during life, was extinguished by the larger claim competent to her relations on account of her death,—that the one was swallowed up in the other, because the act on which the action was rested had first produced temporary illness and disablement during her life, but had ultimately had its accomplishment in bringing her to her grave. I do not know that his Lordship would have had any difficulty in the case if it had not been for that. He says,—"To me it appears essentially necessary, since death ensued from the effects of the injuries before the action came to a close, to consider whether such a claim would exclude the claim of the relatives who are entitled to compensation for the death of their relative;" and he says it could not do so, and that the temporary action brought in her lifetime would not transmit, because the supervening event had thrown it into the shade. Now, that view is not applicable to this case. The case is rested by Lord Wood on the footing I have stated, viz., that the right to damages and solatium arises ipso jure and ipso facto by the infliction of the injury, and that, being a debt, it transmits against the heir of the delinquent, in the same way as it transmits to the heir of the party who had suffered the damage.

I do not think we need go further than that authority. Other cases have been founded on which seem to support the same view. There are niceties about the respective rights of husband and wife,—about whether a husband can put a veto on the wife's action, or whether the husband can raise it; these are not directly raised here, but I think nothing has occurred in any of the cases to throw doubt upon the principle laid down in the case I have referred to, and in other cases, that an action for reparation is not a criminal, or a penal action but is an action for debt, which arises by the infliction of the injury, and which transmits against the heir of the party who did the wrong, and to the heir of the party who suffered the wrong. I think that is a reasonable principle established in our law. There are diversities of view taken in the canon law and in the French law, and in the English law too it may be. The English law of libel and of slander,—certainly of slander,—is different from ours, and we cannot find any safe authority there. We must look to the general principle established by our own authorities, and to the reason of the thing, and I think both reason and authority are in support of the view that we are now taking. That disposes of the first plea in law stated for the defenders.

The second plea is to the relevancy. The Lord Ordinary's interlocutor is limited, and I think properly limited, to repelling that plea in so far as the same is insisted in as excluding the action altogether. If this action is brought as an action for damage to the pursuer herself, I confess I have great difficulty in thinking that there is any relevancy, but the matters are so mixed up that a

No. 51.

Dec. 16, 1874.
Auld v. Shairp.

this stage it seems impossible to say that the whole action can be thrown out. Indeed, with reference to the whole action, there is great difficulty about its ultimate relevancy. It seems to me very doubtful whether its relevancy and sufficiency can be sustained without that preliminary and difficult question being solved, whether there was an incompatibility between the principalship and the chair of Humanity in the circumstances that are here stated. If there was that incompatibility, and if that incompatibility was radical and could not be cured by acquiescence either of the college or of the patron, then the chair was vacant, and it was erroneously filled, apparently to the exclusion of Dr Auld, supposing that he would have got the presentation if it had been open. On the other hand, if there was no incompatibility, and Principal Shairp was entitled to occupy the chair, it is difficult to say that damages could arise. Another very important question occurs, whether there was privilege. It would be very difficult to say that professors are not interested, and a principal above all, in stating in bona fide objections to the qualifications of any person who was proposed to be brought amongst them to be entrusted with such an important class as that of Humanity.

On these grounds, but without going further, I am prepared to affirm the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

Lord Ormidale.—The reclaiming note which has now to be disposed of is at the instance of the defender against an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary repelling the defender's two first pleas in law, "so far as the same are insisted in as excluding the action altogether." The first of these pleas so repelled is that the pursuer has "no title to sue," and the other that "the averments of the pursuer are irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons."

In regard to the latter plea, it would be premature at present to deal with it; for if the pursuer has no title to sue the action it is unnecessary, and would be idle, to inquire whether her allegations, apart from the question of title, are relevant and sufficient or not. Whether, therefore, the pursuer is in titulo to sue the action is the question which must be in the first instance disposed of. Whether her statements, except in so far as it is necessary to look at them as bearing on the question of title, or, in other words, to ascertain the nature and character generally of the action, are relevant or not, is for after consideration, if her title to sue be sustained.

The pursuer's title, as stated by her, is of a twofold character; for the summons bears to be at her instance as executrix of her late husband, Dr Auld, decerning to testament-dative in her favour, and "as an individual, for all right competent to her personally in the premises." But as she has stated nothing whatever in the record in support of the latter branch of her title, and did not, as I understood, maintain her right to sue as an individual, independently of her representative character as executrix, the only question for consideration is, whether she has or has not a title to sue as the executrix of Dr Auld. That this is a very important question,—for its application to a large class of cases is obvious,—and is also one of nicety and difficulty, cannot be doubted. The Lord Ordinary himself says in the note to his interlocutor under review, that "if the question had been quite open his inclination would have been to give effect to the defence, and dismiss the action, but in the present state of the authorities in the law of Scotland he has found himself obliged to repel the defender's pleas, and to allow the action to proceed."

No. 51.

Dec. 16, 1874.
Auld v. Shairp.

In examining the authorities with reference to their bearing and effect on the present case it is essential to bear in mind that the pursuer's action now before the Court, as maintained by her, is one for solatium and damages in respect of slanderous or defamatory statements alleged to have been made by the defender of and concerning her late husband, Dr Auld; for although the pleas of the pursuer in the record are so expressed as to appear to point at a claim of damages in respect of acts and conduct of the defender, irrespective of the alleged slander, I did not understand that the action was to be insisted in except as one laid upon slander or defamation. The Solicitor-General so expressly stated in the outset of his very able address for the pursuer. And, at any rate, it is only on this assumption that any opinion has been formed and is now given.

In determining, then, whether the action is maintainable at the instance of the pursuer, it is not only necessary to keep in view that it is one for solatium and damages in respect of slander or defamation, but also that it was instituted by the pursuer upwards of two years after her husband, Dr Auld's death, although there is nothing to shew, and it is not said, that Dr Auld himself had, by raising action or otherwise, complained of the alleged injury.

In this state of matters I have, after a careful examination of the authorities, come to be of opinion, although certainly not without hesitation and difficulty, that the pursuer has no title to sue, and that the defender's plea to that effect ought to be sustained and the action dismissed.

If the action had been purely one for loss and damage to property, either heritable or moveable, sustained by the late Dr Auld, as in the case of The Representatives of Tulloch v. Davidson and Others, cited in the course of the debate, or, in the language of the civil law, an actio rei persecutoriæ, I should have had no doubt of the pursuer's title to sue in her representative character of executrix, and, in that view, there would not, I suppose, have been any dispute between the parties. In actions, indeed, laid upon injury to property, the claim can be sued for by or against the representatives just as any claim for an ordinary debt.

That, however, not being the nature of the present action, but, on the contrary, it being essentially one for vindication of character, where the injured party himself died without raising action or complaining in any form, the maxim, I think, applies—"Actio personalis moritur cum persona." It is true that in one sense patrimonial interests are involved, and necessarily so, to some extent, even in such an action; for not only must it, like every other action of damages for slander, if successfully prosecuted to a conclusion, result in pecuniary damages, small or great, but in many such cases, and possibly in the present, if it goes on, in a substantial sum in respect of special loss or damage sustained by the late Dr Auld; but I cannot think that this is sufficient to remove the case from the class of personal actions comprehended by the maxim referred to. It is not to be forgotten that here, as in all cases of its class, the ground of action or medium concludendi is injury to personal character, or, in the words of Lord Stair (i. 9, 4), injury to "fame, reputation, and honour," and that it is only in virtue of that medium concludendi, or ground of action, supposing it to be established, that any sum of damages whatever could be awarded. That such is the ground of action or medium in respect of which the pursuer concludes for damages in the present case is manifest from the statements in the 6th article of her condescendence, where she expressly charges the defender with having slandered the late Dr Auld, by "representing him to be a person unfit, both intellectually and morally, to fill the said chair,"—that is, the chair of Humanity in the University of St Andrews. The pursuer's claim for damages and solatium therefore cannot, I think, be properly said to be, in its nature, one for property, or necessarily attached to or involving property. The claim is, at any rate, in its chief and primary object, to have such redress as will clear and vindicate character, and this can generally be accomplished as well, and frequently much better, by retractation and apology, or nominal damages, as by the recovery of a large sum of money. There may be, and not unusually are, many circumstances strictly personal to the individual injured by slander which might render it not only undesirable but positively painful and detrimental to him to make it the subject of proceedings at law or of complaint at all. It would be, therefore, as I take leave to think, unreasonable and unjust to allow such an action to be brought, after the death of the injured individual, by his legal representative, who might not be a relative at all, or one having the slightest interest in his character, feelings, or reputation, but an entire stranger, such as an executor-creditor, having no other object but to recover a sum of money. I must own my inability to arrive at a conclusion involving such consequences. And I am all the less disposed to do so when I bear in mind that, having regard to the authorities cited on the part of the defender in the course of the discussion, such an action as the present could not be maintained according to the civil law, the law of France, or the law of England. And that the principles of the civil law, as bearing on such a question as the present, have been to some extent imported into the law of Scotland, is manifest, I think, from many of the cases reported in the Dictionary under the heading "Personal and Transmissible." I acknowledge, however, that it is by the authorities of our own law that we must be mainly, or, if they are clear and unambiguous, entirely governed.

No. 51.

Dec. 16, 1874. Auld v. Shairp.

The Lord Ordinary, while he states in the note to his interlocutor that he has found no case or even dictum in the institutional writers directly in point, has referred to various decisions which he considers sufficient to support the conclusion he has arrived at. But on examining the decided cases referred to they appear to me, with much deference, to be distinguishable from the present in two important particulars,—1st, in none of them was the action one for vindication of character, or, in other words, for solatium and damages in respect of slander or defamation; and 2dly, in all of them that can be said to be of any importance the action was raised by the injured individual himself, and was a depending lis at the time of his death. This was so in the case of Neilson v. Rodger,[1] by which the Lord Ordinary says he has felt himself bound; and besides, the action in that case was laid on the ground of injury, not to character, but to the person, and so, for the reasons I have adverted to, might not be held to be so strictly personal as to fall with the injured individual. At the same time, I am not to deny that an action for damages and solatium, in respect of injury to the person, is in its character and features so closely resembling an action of damages and solatium for vindication of character, that I might have held myself, as the Lord Ordinary appears to have done, bound by the decision in the case of Neilson v. Rodger, although only that of a majority of one of the Divisions of the Court, had it not been for the other distinction, to which I have referred, between it and the present, created by the circumstance that the action was in dependence, and had made some progress in Court at the instance of the injured party before that party died. That this was considered an im-

[1] Neilson v. Rodger, Dec. 24, 1853, 16 D. 325, 26 Scot. Jur. 156.

No. 51.
Dec. 16, 1874.
Auld v. Shairp.

portant consideration by the Judges in that case is clear, I think, from their reported opinions. Thus, Lord Wood, who appears to have been the most decided in support of the judgment, at the outset of his opinion deemed it right to notice and explain that the object of the representatives in sisting themselves as pursuers of the depending action was "not to enforce any different or larger claim than she could have done under the summons had she survived, but strictly to follow out and in no degree to alter or enlarge the claim which, had she survived, she would under the summons be entitled to make good. The question is," said his Lordship, "is this competent or not?" Lord Murray, again, begins with the observation,—"This action was commenced by the deceased during her lifetime, and I think it may be competently carried on by her representatives." And the Lord Justice-Clerk, who dissented from the judgment, and held that the action, although raised by the injured party herself, and in dependence at the time of her death, could not be competently carried on by her representatives, remarked, in the course of his lengthened opinion, without any challenge or contradiction that I can observe,—"It was not, I think, contended that the executors could, after the death, themselves raise an action to recover solatium for the sufferings of the party herself, although such right clearly existed in her."

It appears to me, therefore, that the decision in the case of Neilson v. Rodger is not a conclusive precedent for governing the present. Supposing the action in that case, although in reality different as regards its foundation and object from the present, to be closely analogous, there would still remain the distinction that it was brought by the injured party herself, and was in dependence at her death, while here no action was brought, and no complaint of any kind was ever made by the injured party. That this is an important distinction appears sufficiently, I think, from the opinions of the Judges in Neilson v. Rodger; and it was also a feature of the civil law, and has been recognised and given effect to in the law of Scotland. It was so in Montgomery v. The Representatives of Walker, 17th July 1752, Mor. 10,360, which was an action of damages for wrongous imprisonment, and the pursuer of which having died during its dependence, the Lord Ordinary transferred it against his representatives, and found them entitled to damages, appointing them at the same time to give in a condescendence thereof. This interlocutor having been reclaimed against, the report bears that although it was remitted back to the Lord Ordinary in respect of certain allegations made by the defenders, "meantime it is not amiss to observe that on this occasion it was admitted to be a point certain that even penal actions,—meaning actions arising ex delictu or quasi delictu, such as actions of damages for slander or injury to the person,—"transmit in hæredes ubi lis fuerit contestata cum defuncto." And in Calder v. The Children of Kenneth Mackenzie (No. 1 of Appendix to "Personal and Transmissible" in the Dictionary), 23d July 1776, the Lord Ordinary expressly, "in respect litis-contestation was made with the defunct," transferred the action against his representatives, and to that interlocutor the Court adhered.

The case of Haggart's Trustees v. Hope[1] was also no doubt one of damages for defamation, but it was raised by the injured party himself, and after his death taken up and prosecuted by his trustees in obedience to his express instructions to that effect. Besides, as the point now in question does not appear to have [1] Haggart's Trustees v. Hope, 2 Shaw's App. 125.

No. 51.
Dec. 16, 1874.
Auld v. Shairp.

been raised or considered in that case, little or no aid can be derived from it. The case, again, of Mein v. M'Call,[1] likewise noticed by the Lord Ordinary, was one for damages, but on what ground does not appear from the report; nor have the session papers been preserved in the Advocates' Library. But I have obtained access to copies of the summons and defences in the case, and from them it appears that the action was one of damages for an aggravated assault, or rather a series of assaults. Keeping this in view, and that the action was in dependence in Court at the instance of the injured party at the time of his death, it cannot be held to be adverse to my opinion in the present case.

The case, however, of Smith v. Stoddart,[2] likewise referred to in the Lord Ordinary's note, although not directly in point, has, I think, an important bearing on the question now under consideration. There it was held that a claim for damages in respect of a slander uttered against a married woman was of a character so strictly personal to the injured party that it did not pass jure mariti to her husband, but remained with herself, and could be competently sued for by her after his death, although a question might afterwards arise as to who had right to the damages recovered. It is true that in that case the Court appear to have proceeded very much on the ground that it would be against reason and justice to prevent the pursuer clearing her character from a gross slander which had been uttered against her. But that is just the principle which I think ought to be given effect to in the present case, viz. that the right to vindicate character from slander adheres so closely to the injured party that it is for that party, and that party alone, to sue an action for reparation, it being a different question altogether who may have right to the damages, if any, that may be recovered. Such, I think, is the effect of the opinions of all the Judges in the case of Smith v. Stoddart. Lord Mackenzie, who delivered the leading opinion, at the outset, after remarking that there was a material distinction between an action for vindication of character and the case of Milne v. Gauld,[3] the soundness of the decision in which he seriously questioned, proceeded to observe, with reference to the case with which he was more immediately dealing —"It is just a conclusion for vindication of character, which the law says cannot be in the form of a declarator, but can only be by concluding for pecuniary conclusions. It cannot be said that the right to vindicate the character is one of property which passes to the husband jure mariti." Lord Fullerton, who concurred with Lord Mackenzie, held not only that a right to vindicate character did not pass jure mariti, but was from its nature not communicable at all, remarking that there were "some grounds of action strictly personal to the wife herself," and "cannot be communicable, such as sensibility to personal wrongs, personal contumely, which are absolutely confined to her, and are in their nature inalienable." The other Judges, Lord Cunninghame and the Lord President, also concurred, the latter observing that he considered the action in Milne v. Gauld to be different in character altogether.

The subsequent case of Thom v. M'Queen,[4] where it was held that a claim of damages in an action for wrongous imprisonment at the instance of an individual, who became bankrupt and was sequestrated during its dependence,

[1] Mein v. M'Call, June 7, 1844, 6 D. 1112, 16 Scot. Jur. 486.
[2] Smith v. Stoddart, July 5, 1850, 12 D. 1185, 22 Scot. Jur. 532.
[3] Milne v. Gauld's Trustees, Jan. 14, 1841, 3 D. 345, 13 Scot. Jur. 151.
[4] Thom v. Bridges and M'Queen, March 11, 1857, 19 D. 721, 29 Scot. Jur. 311.

No. 51.
Dec. 16, 1874.
Auld v. Shairp.

passed to the trustee in the sequestration, is worthy of notice for the distinction, evidently pointed at by the Lord Justice-Clerk (Inglis), between such an action and one for reparation and solatium for injured character, when he prefaced his opinion by the remark,—"I say nothing as to a question of defamation, or a case where slander is involved, but speak merely of the case before us of solatium for imprisonment."

I have now examined the authorities in the law of Scotland, so far as they were cited in argument, and so far as I have myself been able to discover any of importance bearing on the question under consideration; and having regard to their true import and effect, they appear to me to be adverse to the pursuer's title to sue the present action. I am therefore of opinion that the defender's first plea in law ought to be sustained, the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary reclaimed against recalled, and the action dismissed.

Lord Gifford.—This case is an extremely important and an extremely interesting one; and after the best consideration that I have been able to give it, I have come to be entirely of the opinion expressed by Lord Neaves. I concur in every one of the observations which Lord Neaves has made, including the criticism which he made upon the note and interlocutor under review; for I do not think I would have expressed that note in exactly the same terms (although in substance I still adhere to it) if I had had the benefit of the extremely able and instructive argument which we have had in the Inner-House.

In the first place, I think I have, both in the interlocutor and in the note, failed sharply enough to distinguish between the two pleas with which the interlocutor deals. We must take them separately, and in their order. The question of title must be regarded separately from the question of relevancy. I have erred in mixing them together too much, both in the interlocutor, and to a certain extent in the observations contained in the note. The question of title is, Has the pursuer, upon her own shewing, a title to sue the claim which she here makes? And it is no answer to that to say that the claim is bad in law, for that is the meaning of the plea of irrelevancy. We must assume that she will make good her law when she comes to discuss the relevancy. But the plea of title is, that she is not to be heard to discuss anything, because, upon her own shewing, she has no claim to state. Upon the question of title, therefore, which has been the main question argued before us—although incidentally, and necessarily almost, reference has been made to the plea of relevancy—upon the question of title, I think the sole question has come to be, whether an action of damages for reparation for slander, as stated by the pursuer, transmits from the late Dr Auld himself, to whom undoubtedly it would have been competent, to his widow and executrix.

I concur with Lord Neaves that the action, being laid at her own instance as an individual as well as in her representative character as executrix, affords a separate ground for saying that she has a title to sue. She may have no claim in her individual character, but she certainly has a title to sue; and we can only repel her title to sue by finding that, in point of law, and assuming her statements to be all correct, she has no individual claim. But we cannot even get that length without sustaining the title to sue.

Apart from this specialty, however, and viewing the action, as it undoubtedly substantially is, an action of reparation for the injury which her husband sustained, and which she, qua his executrix, has sustained, I think the title to sue

No. 51.
Dec. 16, 1874.
Auld v. Shairp.

must be sustained. In the first place, this is not an action for pure solatium. I am not sure that the action, even if it had been in that character alone, would not have transmitted. But that is not the action with which we have to do. It is an action for reparation and damages, in which specific and very precise patrimonial loss is set forth by the pursuer. In considering the question of title to sue I assume—I must assume, because that is the condition of the argument—that patrimonially loss has been sustained—that a year or two's salary has been lost by the conduct of Principal Shairp, of which the pursuer complains. Of course, in my present observations, I do not in the least forejudge any of the defences which Principal Shairp has stated. For aught I know at present all these defences may be affirmed; but in considering the pursuer's title to sue I assume that the pursuer's statements are true, and that she will be able to substantiate them. Now, the loss complained of by the pursuer is undoubtedly a loss resulting substantially from slander. In that respect I agree with Lord Ormidale that it is hardly an action, looking at the pursuer's own statement, for wrongous acts so much as for wrongful words; but wrongful words may create very serious patrimonial loss, and I cannot think that there is any absolute law that has ever been admitted in Scotland that, if a person commits a verbal injury which results, it may be, in the most serious patrimonial loss to another, that other loses his action, and his estate loses it, because he may happen to die before raising an action to make his claim good. I cannot distinguish this case, which is an action based upon slander, from any other action of reparation and damages. Suppose that, instead of being an action for damages resulting from slander, it had been an action for damages resulting from personal injury,—such as was the case in Neilson v. Rodger,[1]—in both cases the pursuer's demand is for reparation to make good the loss which had been sustained from personal pain. I cannot distinguish between pain of the body and pain of the mind in principle. Solatium is due for the one as well as the other. Actual specific damage may be due for the one as well as for the other; and although there may be the element of vindication of character embraced in it that element arises only incidentally, because, as has been frequently remarked, reparation for injury to character can only be attained, apart from the old remedy of palinode, by concluding for a pecuniary sum. Now, viewing this as a case, where the pursuer here, as executrix of Dr Auld, says that the estate to which she has succeeded has been injured by the slanderous and wrongful actings of Principal Shairp, I can find no principle, either in equity or in our own law, to exclude that action at the instance of the executrix. It is true that in the Roman law an action for injury did not transmit either against the representatives of the injurer, or to the representatives of the injured. But I do not find that that principle has been adopted in our law. Even in the laws of other countries, which are fairly enough looked to in this respect, it seems to have been adopted with a measure of qualification, and I find no reason for holding that the Roman law, either as originally laid down and in force in Rome, or as modified by the common law, was ever adopted by the law of Scotland. In that respect, I would wish to modify the expression of opinion with which the note to my interlocutor commences.

If we turn to our own law, I think it quite clear that an action of reparation for personal injury transmits to representatives; and I go no further on that matter

[1] Neilson v. Rodger, December 24, 1853, 16 D. 325, 26 Scot. Jur. 156.

No. 51. Dec. 16, 1874. Auld v. Shairp.

than the case of Neilson v. Rodger. That was an action for personal loss, and it was held that the executors might sist themselves and carry on the action. I feel myself bound by that decision, and I cannot make a distinction between it and the present case, arising merely from the circumstance that in that case the action was raised before the original pursuer had died. Litiscontestation had not taken place, because the pursuer had died immediately after the summons was raised, and before any defences were lodged; and, therefore, if that circumstance alone were to be held to be the principle of the decision in the case of Rodger, it would be introducing a rule of the most arbitrary description, and fraught with consequences which might be exceedingly unjust. How long after the injury is sustained is the pursuer to be allowed to raise the action? If she survives two or three months and then dies without raising it, is that to cut her out? If she dies very soon after the raising of it, is that not to cut her out? Litiscontestation is out of the question as a test for the transmission, and the only principle sought to be fixed as determining this point of the case is whether there is presumed forgiveness to be inferred from the delay in raising the action.

It appears to me, however, that the forgiveness is always a question of evidence. In the present case it is said two years elapsed; but then we have this very material circumstance set forth by the pursuer, that she had not got access to the terms of the slander, and the slander was a slander committed, not in Dr Auld's presence or before his face,—assuming it to be a slander, for of course I am not saying whether there was a slander or not,—but it was a slander committed by Principal Shairp, as is alleged, secretly, behind Dr Auld's back, in a letter addressed to the patron, of which, if he knew anything, it might only be because of its being incidentally mentioned to him by somebody who knew of it. Now, the defender may have a defence on the ground that there has been condonation or forgiveness, but plainly that is not to be inferred from the mere fact of his having died before the action was raised. Unless a statutory rule had been introduced that a party who claims reparation for injury shall lose the claim if during life he does not raise an action for it, I feel myself quite unable to lay down such a principle as that. Therefore, the case of Neilson v. Rodger—that matter being out of view—is a direct authority in the present case, although there the injury was to the body, and here the injury is to the mind.

But there is the additional circumstance that in the present case we must assume that there has been separate patrimonial loss to Dr Auld's estate. That circumstance, by itself, I think, is conclusive on the question of title. It is sufficiently set forth upon the record that pecuniary loss has been sustained. It says that Dr Auld, in consequence of Principal Shairp's actings, was two years without employment—he was two years deprived, that is, of the emoluments of the chair, a presentation to which had been promised to him by the patron. There is the additional element that in consequence of Principal Shairp's intimation that he was only to teach for the remainder of that session, and then to resign as on a particular day, Dr Auld, on getting the intimation from the patron that he was to receive the presentation, resigned his position as teacher in the Madras College, and that he has not only therefore been deprived of the emoluments of the chair to which he expected to be presented, but he has been deprived of the emoluments and the situation which he then held. Now, I think it was almost conceded in argument that, although personal actions might not transmit, yet if there were pecuniary results—a claim for reparation or for making good pecuniary loss—they undoubtedly transmitted. Thus, even in the case of the Aberdeen Bank, where it was laid on fraud, the action was held to transmit against the representatives of the party held to be fraudulent.

No. 51.
Dec. 16, 1874.
Auld v. Shairp.

As to the argument that the present action cannot transmit because it is a penal action, it appears to me that the word "penal" is used ambiguously—that it sometimes means an action ex delicto or quasi ex delicto, but brought only for the purpose of obtaining reparation or indemnity, and the expression "penal action" sometimes means an action for the purpose of inflicting punishment. Now, I demur altogether to the idea that an action ex delicto will not transmit when brought only to obtain reparation. The infliction of punishment is not the object or meaning of the action. An action ex delicto undoubtedly transmits. An action for the recovery of stolen goods is the strongest case that can be put of an action ex delicto. But surely it never could be contended that a man whose goods had been stolen would not have an action against the representative of the thief to recover the stolen property. That is not a penal action; it is an action ex delicto, for there can be no greater delict than theft; but it is not a penal action. Now, it appears to me that the present action is not a penal action. It is not an action to inflict punishment on Principal Shairp, supposing him found to be liable in all that is sought against him. It is an action to recover what the pursuer says the estate that she represents has lost by that delict or quasi delict. In that sense it is not a penal action at all, and it is a fallacy and a delusion to say that penal actions or actions ex delicto do not transmit. Penal actions do not transmit because it is impossible to punish a dead person; but when the limitation of the action is ad civilem effectum to recover the loss which the delict has caused, then I think that is just a debt which transmits like any other debt against the party who has become the debtor, and in favour of the representative of the party who has become the creditor. In the present state of the argument, and in the present state of the case before us, therefore, I am of opinion that the plea of want of title to sue should be simply repelled, and the action held a competent action, to be insisted in by Mrs Auld as the representative of her husband.

The next question, which is also dealt with in the interlocutor, is as to the relevancy. Now, I repelled that plea in the Outer-House, so far as insisted in as excluding the action altogether. That is not a very happy expression, but my meaning was to repel it hoc statu, that it might be discussed, as these questions are most conveniently discussed, along with the issues. We will then see exactly what the pursuer insists for, and what issues she proposes to take. Issues have been lodged, but we have not had any argument on the terms of them. The argument was confined to the plea of title, and therefore, before saying how far this action is relevant, or how far the pursuer is entitled to any of the issues, or some of them, which she proposes, I would prefer hearing the parties further on these issues. And I am not disposed to go further just now than simply to adhere to the interlocutor—or rather to vary the interlocutor to the effect of simply sustaining the plea of title. We have already recovered the documents, which was another object I had in view in repelling the plea of non-relevancy hoc statu; and I think we should appoint parties to be heard on the issues and the relevancy, and we will then see what course the case is to take. I concur with the observations made both by Lord Neaves and Lord Ormidale as to the difficulty and nicety of some of the questions which we cannot avoid seeing a-head of us—in particular, how far it was competent for Principal

No. 51.
Dec. 16, 1874.
Auld v. Shairp.

Shairp to retain the Humanity chair after becoming Principal of the college. It is quite plain that, through that question, the pursuer's claim lies to a very large extent—so much so, that she has proposed a separate issue on that point. It was pressed upon us very strongly that that is not a question in any view for a jury. Perhaps it may be reached through a jury, but it is plainly a question of law, and considerations like that—and there are some considerations of a similar kind—strongly point to the expediency, if it is competent, of trying this question in some other form than by a jury.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is a very important case, and I must say I have found very great difficulty in coming to a conclusion upon it. We are now engaged, however, in considering only one question, viz., whether the pursuer has a title to sue this action; and to the extent of repelling that plea I concur with the opinion of Lord Neaves and Lord Gifford. But there is no doubt that although we only sustain the title in the meantime, so as to enable the action to proceed, we have to decide an abstract question of law, which, in terms, as far as I have been able to see, has never yet been the subject of direct decision,—I mean, whether it is the law of Scotland that a personal action dies with the person. If this be a personal action, and that is the law of Scotland, then of course the pursuer has no title to pursue. But I am of opinion that it is not the law of Scotland—that the brocard fails when applied in our system, both because we do not adopt the distinction between personal and real actions which prevailed in the Roman law, and also because it is not our law that an action, however personal, necessarily dies with the person. In regard to the first, there will be found in Lord Stair's Institutes, book 4, title 3, section 45, the strongest repudiation of the Roman distinction between real and personal actions; and that of itself would make it impossible to cite the Roman brocard as necessarily applicable to the law of Scotland But, in the second place, I can find no authority whatever, and no dictum in any one of the institutional writers, or in any decided case, to the effect that we have adopted the view of the Roman law that personal actions do not transmit, and I do not find that any of the Continental systems have adopted that law. The canon law has to so large an extent modified the views of Continental jurists on this matter that the civil law is not now regarded as an authority in that matter in any of the systems which have generally adopted the civil law as their basis. The law of England, singularly enough, does seems to coincide in result with the civil law, although the result is attributed to another principle, viz., that a personal action is not assignable or transmissible. At the same time, while it is very clearly laid down by the French authorities that a personal action may transmit against the heirs of the party doing the injury, it is the prevalent view of the Continental jurists that it does not transmit to the heirs of the party injured.

The question is, what is our law on that subject? Now, the authorities are unquestionably by no means very precise, and Lord Ormidale's very able review of them, I think, brings out the difficulty of the question in a very strong light. It is said that this is an action for vindication of character, and that there is a different rule to be applied to an action of that kind than that which would be applicable in a case of personal injury. I do not think that this is an action for vindication of character. Slander, no doubt, under the canon law, and still in England, may be the subject of penal prosecution, and, I believe, in the old Commissary Court the procurator-fiscal was wont to intervene in an action of that kind. The action might also with us have assumed the form of concluding for a palinode or retractation. That was a proper action of vindication of character. But if the party sued in the civil court, he did not conclude for vindication of character, but concluded for that which he desired, viz., a sum of damages in reparation of the injury; and however the injury arose, whether from injury to character, or person, or substance, is of no moment. The nature of the action is an action of damages for pecuniary reparation of an injury, and for nothing else. And, therefore, it is not a sound distinction in such a case, although quite a fair observation in a popular sense to make, that this is an action for vindication of character, as distinguished from an action of damages for reparation of a wrong. The present action, however, is an action for the reparation of a specific wrong, which is said to have been carried through and effected by means of slanderous imputation; and, in that respect, perhaps, it stands somewhat differently from an ordinary action for defamation. I see that this question may come up again in the course of the investigation of this case, and possibly may present itself in a different aspect, and therefore I wish not to indicate or express any opinion except as far as these principles are applicable to this specific plea. I can conceive considerable difficulties in holding that a pure action of defamation so transmits to executors that executors or creditors having no connection with the deceased at all, except the fact that they are executors, would be entitled to raise it after an interval of time. That is a question we need not go into. But this is an action for the specific damage suffered by Dr Auld in being excluded from the chair of Humanity by means of slanderous imputations made to the patron; and if these be a relevant ground of action, and the pursuer can bring sufficient proof of the ground of action such as would have enabled Dr Auld to have recovered damages during his lifetime, I cannot doubt that the present pursuer is entitled to insist in that action.

No. 51.

Dec. 16, 1874. Auld v. Shairp.

I have only one word to say on the cases of Smith v. Stoddart,[1] and Milne v. Gauld,[2] because I think the case of Smith v. Stoddart was pressed rather farther than the matter decided will bear, or than the Judges who decided it intended. They decided nothing but this, that where there are imputations made upon the character of a married woman, she has, whether married or a widow, a right and title to vindicate her own character. That does not conflict in any degree with the right passing to the husband to this effect, that the husband may sue for injury done to his wife—which I take to be a proposition not to be contested—or that his executors might have right to damages which the wife might recover; and one of the Judges expressly says that. I may mention for the information of parties that on turning to Voet, 47th book of the Pandects, title 10, section 6, there will be found a decision of the Dutch courts exactly applicable to that matter, coming to this, that while the husband, beyond all question, has a right to vindicate, as an injury done to himself, the character of his wife against aspersions, she also, if her character be personally involved, is entitled to sue on her own account. I have nothing further to add, except to say that the question of proof, and also the question in regard to the legal right of the principal to continue to hold this office for the purpose of excluding Dr Auld, are questions of great difficulty, and in the most part questions of law; and I concur in thinking that while we sustain the title to sue, it would be well to put the case in a position to be investigated otherwise than by sending it to a jury. But that is for

[1] Smith v. Stoddart, July 5, 1850, 12 D. 185, 22 Scot. Jur. 532.
[2] Milne v. Gauld, Jan. 14, 1841, 3 D. 345, 13 Scot. Jur. 151.

No. 51. the parties to consider; and we shall now repel the first plea in law for the defender, and appoint the parties to be further heard.

Dec. 16, 1874. Auld v. Shairp.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Having heard counsel on the reclaiming note for Principal Shairp against Lord Gifford's interlocutor of 30th June 1874, adhere to said interlocutor in so far as it repels the first plea in law for the defender, and appoint parties to be further heard, and in hoc statu reserve all questions of expenses."

THOMAS SPALDING, W.S.—TODS, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 52. WILLIAM PETRIE, Pursuer.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Mackintosh.
MISS EUPHEMIA FORSYTH AND ANOTHER, Defenders.—Asher—Paul.

Dec. 16, 1874. Petrie v. Forsyth and Another.

Sale—Bona fides—Reduction.—In an action brought to reduce the title of a purchaser of heritage at the instance of a prior purchaser from the same seller, held that it was not necessary for the pursuer to prove fraud on the part of the second purchaser, but only such knowledge as ought to have put him on his inquiry.

2D DIVISION. Lord Craighill.* I.

ON 3d March 1874 William Petrie, residing in New Elgin, raised this action against Miss Euphemia Forsyth, Elgin, and James Stewart, a lawyer's clerk in Edinburgh, concluding (1) for reduction of a disposition of certain heritable subjects in New Elgin, executed by Miss Forsyth in favour of Stewart, dated 6th and recorded in the Register of Sasines 8th August 1873; and (2) for implement by Miss Forsyth of a contract of sale of the same subjects to the pursuer at the price of £55, alleged to have been constituted by certain letters which passed between her and her agents, on the one hand, and the agent of the pursuer on the other, in May and June 1873.

The circumstances out of which the action arose, as disclosed in the record and at the proof, were as follows:—

Petrie was the nephew of Miss Forsyth, a lady aged eighty-six, who was possessed of a house and garden in New Elgin, in part of which house Petrie and his family lived.

In August 1872 it appeared that Petrie obtained from Miss Forsyth (as she averred, under compulsion), a document, which he described as a deed of gift, whereby she made over to him the house and garden at her death, and bound herself, if she should sell it during her lifetime, to pay him the sum of £80, and also relieved him of rent and taxes during her lifetime. This document was written by the defender Stewart, who was then resident in Elgin, and was duly tested.

In February 1873 Miss Forsyth instructed Messrs Grigor and Young, her agents in Elgin, to find out on what grounds Petrie claimed the subjects. Messrs Grigor and Young accordingly wrote on 4th February a letter, to which Petrie returned no answer.

Petrie, however, forwarded this letter and the so-called deed of gift to the defender Stewart, who had, in the meantime, gone to Edinburgh, and instructed him to employ an agent to act for him. Stewart accordingly employed Mr D. L. Shand, W.S., to act as Petrie's agent in the matter.

Shortly after the date of the letter to Petrie, Miss Forsyth's agents advertised the subjects for sale, and notice of removing was served on Petrie. Thereafter on 5th March 1873 Mr Shand wrote calling Grigor and Young's attention to Petrie's claims under the deed of gift.

Mr Shand and Grigor and Young continued to correspond upon the

* The interlocutor and note were prepared by Lord Mure.—See note, p. 217.

No. 52.

Dec. 16, 1874.
Petrie v. Forsyth and Another.

subject of Petrie's rights and the sale of the subjects, and during the course of the correspondence it was proposed that in order to solve the difficulties raised, Petrie should become the purchaser of the subjects at a reduced price. After various prices had been proposed and rejected by one or other of the parties Miss Forsyth wrote to Grigor and Young on 27th May as follows :—"Dear Sir,—I have considered the amended offer made by Mr Shand on behalf of his client, Mr Petrie ; and although I am willing to dispose of the property, I cannot do so at the price offered. I am, however, willing to divide the difference between the offer and the price asked by me, and accept of £55 as the purchase price, on the same arrangements as formerly intimated. Your communicating this to Mr Shand as my final determination will oblige.—I am," &c. This letter was communicated to Mr Shand, who, on 28th May, offered to give £52, 10s. This sum Miss Forsyth refused, and on 2d June Shand again wrote :—"Dear Sirs,—I am to-day in receipt of your favour of the 30th ult. It appears to be a pity to break off the whole negotiation for £2, 10s. of a difference between Miss Forsyth and my client; and I am therefore authorised to accept her offer, and to pay £55. Please, then, send me the title-deeds, that I may prepare the draft disposition." The title-deeds were accordingly forwarded to Shand.

A question then arose as to the terms of the disposition. Mr Shand was desirous that the true nature of the transaction should appear ex facie of the disposition, viz., that Petrie, in addition to paying £55, was waiving his claim for £80 under the deed of gift, and also that there should be a discharge of the deed of gift.

This, Miss Forsyth objected to, as she disputed her liability under the deed of gift, and on 10th June Grigor and Young wrote :—"Miss Forsyth will not agree to the deeds proposed by you, and it is needless to say more about it." While this question was still undecided, Stewart and Petrie, who, it appeared, had previously entered into some arrangement as to Stewart's father subsequently acquiring the subjects from Petrie, disagreed, and the dispute having come to Mr Shand's knowledge, he wrote to Petrie that he would no longer act as agent for him.

Mr Shand also communicated to Grigor and Young, by letter, dated 23d June, that he had ceased to act for Petrie.

On 24th June Grigor and Young wrote to Mr Shand :—"Dear Sir,—We wrote you on 10th current, to which we had no reply. Unless we have a reply in eight days we shall presume the whole matter is at an end.—Yours truly," &c.

Mr Shand having ceased to act for Petrie before he received the above letter sent it to Stewart and took no further notice of it, and nothing followed upon it. It appeared from Mr Shand's evidence that throughout the whole negotiations Stewart—who had been till May in the same office with Mr Shand—was duly informed of every letter received or written by Mr Shand on behalf of Petrie, and that on 22d July Mr Shand had told him that the bargain between Petrie and Miss Forsyth was a binding one, and that any attempt on his part to obtain the subjects from Miss Forsyth for himself would certainly "land him in the Court of Session." Stewart, however, denied that he had ever been informed that the contract was a binding and concluded one.

In August Stewart went to Elgin, and, according to his own statement, called on Miss Forsyth, and during his visit she stated that the transaction with Petrie was at an end, and asked him to buy the subjects himself. After some hesitation, but without any inquiry as to the truth of Miss Forsyth's averment about the breaking off of the bargain with Petrie, he consented to purchase the subjects at the price of £149, 10s.,

No. 52.

Dec. 16, 1874. Petrie v. Forsyth and Another.

and on 6th August he obtained a conveyance of the property. It appeared from the evidence that when Miss Forsyth heard that no answer had been sent to Grigor and Young's letter of 24th June she had remarked that "she was very glad, as she was now done with" Petrie for ever.

When this second conveyance came to Petrie's knowledge he raised this action.

Pleaded for Petrie;—(1) The pursuer having purchased the said subjects at the price of £55 from the defender Euphemia Forsyth, with entry at Whitsunday 1873, she is bound to execute and deliver to him a disposition containing all usual clauses on payment of said price. (2) The disposition to said subjects granted by the defender Forsyth in favour of the defender Stewart having been obtained by false and fraudulent representations on the part of Stewart, and without any price having been paid, ought to be reduced. (3) The said disposition in favour of Stewart having been fraudulently obtained by the latter from the defender Forsyth, after a sale by her to the pursuer, which was known to Stewart, ought to be reduced and set aside.

Pleaded for the defenders;—(1) The pursuer not being the author, or in right of the author of the deed sought to be reduced, has no title to sue. (2) The defender Miss Forsyth having, at the time of selling the subjects and granting the disposition sought to be reduced, full power to do so, the title of the defender Mr Stewart is valid and unchallengeable.

On 23d July 1873 the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds, 1st, That when the property in question was purchased by the defender Stewart, in August 1873, the transaction for the proposed purchase of that property, which had been carried on between the pursuer and the defender Miss Forsyth; was at an end, and was known to the defender Stewart to be so; and 2d, that the pursuer has failed to prove that the disposition granted by Miss Forsyth in favour of the other defender was obtained by false and fraudulent representations on the part of the said defender, and without any just or adequate consideration having been paid for the same: Therefore assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the action, and decerns: Finds them entitled to expenses," &c.*

---

* "NOTE.—A great deal of the evidence in this case relates to differences between the pursuer and Miss Forsyth, and to other matters, which appear to the Lord Ordinary to have no very direct bearing on the main question here at issue, viz., whether, at the date of the sale of the property to the defender Stewart, there was any subsisting transaction for the purchase of that property between the pursuer and Miss Forsyth, and some of which, as disclosed in evidence, are certainly not very creditable to the pursuer. And there is also a good deal of evidence of a contradictory and almost irreconcilable description, as to certain communications which are said to have passed between the parties, relative to some alleged wish on the part of the father of the defender Stewart to acquire that property from Miss Forsyth through the pursuer, and which also, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, has no very material bearing on the main questions at issue, except as affecting the credibility of the parties more immediately concerned, who give a very strange and conflicting account of the matter.

"Upon the main questions raised there appears to the Lord Ordinary to be a total failure of evidence to instruct that there was any fraudulent representations made by the defender Stewart to induce the other defender to sell him the property. It is, on the contrary, distinctly proved both by Miss Forsyth and others who were cognisant of her wishes and intentions, that she herself proposed to the defender to purchase the property, which he at first declined, but ultimately agreed to do; and that the purchase, as between them, was an

No. 52.

Dec. 16, 1874. Petrie v. Forsyth and Another.

Petrie reclaimed, and argued;—There could be no doubt in the circumstances that there had been a concluded contract of sale between Miss Forsyth and Petrie so binding that neither party could break it off. The letter of Miss Forsyth's agents could not therefore have the effect which the Lord Ordinary had given to it. That being so, and Stewart having been in the knowledge of this contract, could not be held to have been in bona fide in entering into the second purchase.[1] The want of bona fides was sufficient to entitle the pursuer to prevail.

Argued for the defenders;—The contract between Petrie and Miss Forsyth was not a completed one; it was an essential part and condition of the contract, as far as Miss Forsyth was concerned, that no mention should be made of the obligatory letter; and as Petrie's agent insisted in inserting it in the disposition, and also neglected to answer Grigor and Young's letter, the bargain must be held to have been broken off. Such certainly was the view of Miss Forsyth, and as she in accordance with that view informed Stewart that she was done with Petrie he was justified in purchasing the subjects from her. In order that such a purchase could be reduced it was necessary to prove fraud on the part of the second purchaser. Mere inadvertence and ignorance of the true legal effect of certain documents was not enough.[2] serous and bona fide transaction, made in the belief that the arrangements between the pursuer and Miss Forsyth were completely at an end. So that, in this view, the main question seems reduced to whether there were any sufficient grounds for this belief. The Lord Ordinary thinks that there were. Because, even assuming that, by the correspondence which took place between the parties up to the beginning of June 1873, there was a missive offer to sell for £55, and an acceptance, that proposal was substantially departed from on the part of the pursuer when he stipulated that the terms of the disposition should bear a different consideration from that contained in the offer. This was at once objected to by the defender, Miss Forsyth, and on the proposal as so qualified being renewed it was distinctly rejected on the 10th of June; and no farther communication having been received from the pursuer, the letter of the 24th of June was despatched, informing the pursuer's agent that unless an answer was received within eight days the agent for the latter would consider 'the whole matter at an end.' Now, no answer was received to this letter; and Mr Young, the then agent for Miss Forsyth, stated in evidence that having received no answer he considered the transaction to be at an end; and it is pretty plain that he must have informed Miss Forsyth that it was so, because, when she offered the property for sale to the defender Stewart she told him that she had done with the pursuer, as no answer had been received to the letter. In these circumstances, the defender Stewart was, it is thought, fully entitled to believe that the other defender was free to sell, as he had been made aware of the terms of the letter of the 24th of June, and that no answer had been sent to it; and the omission on the part of the pursuer's agent to communicate that letter directly to the pursuer cannot, it is thought, be held to prejudice Miss Forsyth in her right to dispose of her property.

---

"This case was fully heard before Lord Mure, and the prefixed interlocutor and note were prepared by his Lordship; but his removal into the Inner-House prevented them from being issued. In order to avoid the expense and delay of additional discussion both parties have agreed that I should issue the interlocutor and note without a new hearing, and on that footing I have accordingly signed them."

[1] Cases on Private Knowledge of a Prior Right, M. 1689-1696; Lang v. Dixon, June 29, 1813, F.C.; Marshall v. Hynd and another, Jan. 18, 1828, 6 Sh. 384; Morrison v. Somerville and others, Dec. 21, 1860, 23 D. 232, 33 Scot. Jur. 87.

[2] Interlocutor in Lang v. Dixon, supra.

No. 52. At advising,—

Dec. 16, 1874. Petrie v. Forsyth and Another.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The form of this action is a reduction to set aside an alleged sale by Miss Forsyth to the defender Stewart of certain subjects, on the ground of a previous sale to the pursuer, and also for specific implement of the prior contract of sale.

The defence is, first, that there was no contract of sale between the pursuer and Miss Forsyth.

The facts bearing on this plea seem to be these:—Petrie, the pursuer, was in possession of a document granted by Miss Forsyth, which he looked upon as an obligatory deed of gift. Under this he held that the subjects in dispute were declared to belong to him on Miss Forsyth's death; or in the event of her selling them during her life she was to be liable to pay him £80, and he was also to occupy his house—a portion of the subjects—rent free during his lifetime.

Miss Forsyth, under the circumstances in which it was granted, refused to admit her liability under the obligatory document, and gave Petrie warning to quit the portion of the premises occupied by him. Petrie thereupon sent the obligatory letter to the defender Stewart, who employed Shand to act as Petrie's agent, and accordingly when the subjects were advertised for sale Mr Shand wrote on 5th March 1873 to Messrs Grigor and Young, Miss Forsyth's agents, stating that Petrie had a claim over the subjects. A correspondence followed upon this, throughout which Miss Forsyth disclaimed any liability under the document, and Petrie asserted his rights.

While matters were in that state it occurred to the agents of the parties that the difficulty might be overcome by so far departing from the provisions of the letter as that Petrie should purchase the subjects out and out at a reduced price. Various sums were named as the price, until, on 27th May, the letter founded on as the accepted offer was written. It is true that some arrangements remained to be made as to the form and details of the disposition, and other matters not essential to the contract of sale. I cannot read this letter otherwise than as a specific offer to sell at a specified price. Mr Shand, on 2d June, wrote agreeing to pay the full price asked, and suggesting that the titles be sent him in order that he might prepare the draft disposition. He also made some proposals as to the manner in which the price should be stated in the disposition.

On the first question, as to whether these two letters constitute a concluded contract of sale, I am of opinion that they did. There was an unconditional offer to sell at £55, and an unconditional acceptance at that price. Nothing remained to be done as regarded the contract of sale. The terms of the disposition and other arrangements were not part of the contract of sale, but the consequences of it.

I am further of opinion that the letter of Mr Shand on 6th June does not and was not intended to qualify the acceptance.

It was argued to us, however, that though that was the form of the contract it was not the substance of it. There was another thing to settle, and that was the discharge of Miss Forsyth's obligatory letter. I am, however, of opinion that no such thing remained over. It is true that Petrie got exactly the same advantage as if the obligatory letter had been fully acted upon, but Miss Forsyth was not willing to acknowledge and admit the obligatory letter, and wished to let matters stand as they appeared from the missives. It was for her to say whether she wished the discharge of the letter or not, and the purchaser had no interest to insist that it should be discharged.

No. 52.

Dec. 16, 1874. Petrie v. Forsyth and Another.

If we go further we see the real difficulty, and that is one having nothing to do with the contract of sale at all. Mr Shand was at first afraid that the stamp-office might object to the form of the disposition. Miss Forsyth, however, said that she would only sell on her own terms. Mr Shand suggested that it would appear very peculiar in the case of a re-sale at a full price. That suggestion, although irrelevant in the mouth of the purchaser, throws a light on another point of the case, because Mr Shand's thinking of a re-sale shews that he did understand that Petrie was to re-sell to Stewart when he got the conveyance, and hence he was desirous that the whole transaction should appear on the face of the conveyance. That, however, had nothing to do with the contract of sale, as the acceptance was unqualified. I am therefore of opinion on these two letters that there was a completed contract of sale which could be enforced by either party.

The only point now to consider is the fact that Stewart afterwards bought the subjects from Miss Forsyth. That raises a point of some difficulty.

The only answer Miss Forsyth can make to Petrie's demand to implement the contract under the conclusions of this summons is to say that she is divested in favour of a bona fide purchaser. Unless there be such a purchaser she must make good her previous bargain with Petrie.

Stewart's actings, I am clearly of opinion, cannot be held to have been in good faith, in the sense of having been taken in ignorance of the prior title, although they may not necessarily infer moral delinquency. It is not, however, necessary to go into nice distinctions in this matter.

The question is this, whether in the position in which Stewart stood he was entitled without communication with Petrie to complete a bargain with Miss Forsyth. There is a conflict of evidence as to the extent of his knowledge. Mr Shand's and Stewart's evidence are diametrically opposed on this point. I have, however, come to be of opinion that Mr Shand's evidence is entirely credible from beginning to end, and that nothing he did was liable to censure or remark. I am not going into the details of the matter. It is plain to me that his evidence is consistent with all the real evidence, and evidence from other quarters in the case.

It is, I think, proved that Stewart represented to Shand that an arrangement had been proposed between Petrie and Stewart that Petrie should hand over to said Stewart, in consideration of certain debts due to him, the property whenever he became proprietor of it. That some such arrangement was proposed Petrie himself says. When, then, Petrie and Stewart began to quarrel, Mr Shand not unnaturally came to the conclusion to have nothing more to do with the matter, and he accordingly wrote the letter of 23d June 1873 withdrawing from the agency. It is impossible to read the letters which passed between Petrie and Shand without coming to the conclusion that there had been some arrangement proposed.

Supposing Mr Shand's account to be true, then let us see the result. We must assume that Stewart was cognisant of all that happened up to the date of Shand's resignation of the agency. Mr Shand distinctly says in his evidence that he told him the contract between Petrie and Miss Forsyth was a binding one, and that he warned him not to try to get the property in his own or his father's name, as that would assuredly land him in the Court of Session. It thus appears that the second purchaser bought in the full knowledge that the agent employed by himself to act for the first purchaser had entered into a concluded bargain on behalf of the first purchaser.

No. 52.
Dec. 16, 1874.
Petrie v. Forsyth and Another.

If bona fides means ignorance of any prior right it is quite clear that Stewart could not be in bona fide, because he knew the exact state of matters. Less than has been proved would, in my opinion, have been enough to put him in a position in which he could not with propriety have made the purchase.

The Lord Ordinary's view is that there never was a concluded agreement, and that all negotiations were broken off. I do not think all negotiations were broken off. The mere fact of Mr Shand giving up the agency could not break the agreement.

Stewart was also in the same town with Petrie when he was in communication with Miss Forsyth's agents, and if he did not know what was the true state of matters he was bound to know.

Although I am of opinion that the pursuer should prevail I can pronounce no eulogium on his conduct. I think this unfortunate lady's position is a most unpleasant one to contemplate.

With regard to the authorities cited I do not think it necessary to say more than that a question of bona fides like this is always one of circumstances.

Lord Neaves.—I concur.

The case is of considerable importance, and at first sight of considerable nicety.

I think that the Lord Ordinary's view proceeds on a consideration of the transaction in a different aspect from what the truth of the case really requires.

For a considerable time a transaction was going on between the pursuer and Miss Forsyth, who was apparently willing to sell the subjects to the pursuer at a low price, and he seems to have been ready to take them at her price, intending to waive all his claims under an obligatory letter by her which he held.

The parties were in correspondence through their agents, and the whole subject of the correspondence was the sale of the subjects and the price. The parties came very near to each other—at least there was only £2, 10s. between them, and eventually Miss Forsyth offered the subjects, in a letter to her agents, Grigor and Young, at the price of £55, and, after one or two letters had passed, Mr Shand, on behalf of the pursuer, accepted that offer. The letters founded upon seem to me to create a concluded contract. The only matter ever in dispute was as to the price to be paid, and that was definitely settled, and accordingly the title-deeds were forwarded to Mr Shand.

The second stage of the transaction now arrived, namely, how to carry out this concluded contract. On this point there was some correspondence, Miss Forsyth objecting to certain terms proposed to be introduced into the conveyance, but the contract of sale had been completed, and was enforceable from the date of the acceptance, and is so now.

Miss Forsyth, however, afterwards conveyed the subjects to Stewart, and although that is an obstacle in the way of her implementing her obligation to Petrie it can make no difference as to the obligation itself.

The point of law next arises, how far is Stewart, the second purchaser, to be made to give way in favour of the first contracting party?

For this purpose I do not think it necessary that there should be absolute fraud on the part of the seller who conveys subjects to a second purchaser. It is enough if it be done in error, and contrary to the legal rights of the first purchaser. The fact that the seller can have no good defence to an action raised upon the first contract fixes the seller's obligation.

No. 52.

Dec. 16, 1874. Petrie v. Forsyth and Another.

As to the position of the second purchaser, it is quite possible that although there was no fraud on the part of the disponer there may have been gross fraud on the part of the second purchaser. While the disponer may have been in good faith, the second purchaser may have been in pessimâ fide.

What was Stewart's position here? It is clear from the letters that he was cognisant of the true state of matters. Not only so, but he himself was the principal obstacle in the way of the first bargain being carried out. He complained to Mr Shand that Petrie was treating him badly, and Mr Shand being unwilling to be mixed up any longer with the affair, threw up Petrie's agency at a critical moment, and that without communicating with Petrie, trusting to Stewart to tell him. But although Stewart was afterwards in Elgin he never saw Petrie or communicated with him.

Stewart then, although aware that the first contract was still binding, took a disposition to himself of the subjects, and so disabled Miss Forsyth from implementing the first contract, which, in the opinion of this Court, was then, and still is, binding.

We must, therefore, break off this second bargain, and find Petrie entitled to specific implement as against both the defenders.

LORD ORMIDALE.—This case is undoubtedly one of importance to the parties, and also of considerable importance with regard to some principles involved in it.

The first question is, was there a concluded and binding sale of these subjects in dispute to Petrie? The second is, if there was such a sale, was it subsisting at the time the defender Stewart entered into the transaction founded on by him with Miss Forsyth in August 1873, whereby he says he obtained the subjects for himself? And, thirdly, is there any sufficient reason, in the circumstances of the present case, why the ordinary principle of law, that a second purchaser, in the knowledge of a previous sale still subsisting, is not entitled to insist on implement as against the first purchaser, should not be given effect to?

On the first question I think it unnecessary, after the full and accurate exposition of the facts given by both your Lordships, to dwell upon the evidence. It is clear to me that there was a concluded contract of sale to Petrie, and that the only matter in dispute was not as to there being such a contract, but merely as to the terms of the disposition which was to follow upon it. The parties were agreed as to the subject, the price, and every essential particular, and differed only as to the terms of the formal written instrument by which the transaction was to be carried into effect.

With regard to the second question, whether the defender Stewart entered into the second contract with Miss Forsyth in the knowledge that the subjects had been already sold to Petrie the only matter of dispute is whether Stewart has been clearly proved to have been in the knowledge of the previous sale. It is impossible, I think, to come to any other conclusion than that he was in that knowledge. Mr Shand had told him of it, and he, indeed, admits that he knew there had been, at one time, such a transaction. Mr Shand distinctly says—and I credit his evidence entirely—that he warned Stewart in July, only a very short time before he made his alleged purchase, not to try to get the subjects for himself, as any such attempt would assuredly land him in the Court of Session, for they had been already sold to Petrie. But then the defender says that before he made his own purchase from Miss Forsyth he had been informed by her that the first sale to Petrie was off. All, however, that Miss Forsyth appears in effect to have told him was that she was done with Petrie, when she heard that Mr Shand had ceased to act for him. That certainly was no sufficient ground upon which the defender was entitled to conclude that a binding contract of sale had come to an end. And it is important to keep in view that Stewart made no inquiries for himself in the proper quarter as to the true state of the matter. He made no inquiries at Petrie, although he was in the same town with him. And he did not even go to Miss Forsyth's agents, who had conducted the whole business, and who were also in the same town with him, to ascertain from them how the affair really stood. In place of doing either of these things he entered into a transaction of purchase of the subjects for himself with Miss Forsyth, an old lady of upwards of eighty years of age, and this he did only a few days after the emphatic warning which had been given to him by Mr Shand.

No. 52.

Dec. 16, 1874.
Petrie v. Forsyth and Another.

I have, in these circumstances, no hesitation in holding that Stewart acted in mala fide in entering into the second purchase, and that, in point of law, is enough to vitiate the transaction, and render it of no effect in a question with the first purchaser.

Three important cases were cited at the debate, viz., Lang v. Dixon, Marshall v. Hynd, and Morrison v. Somerville.[1] The case of Lang is a peculiar one, but the important circumstance connected with it is that the second purchaser was proved to have known that the subject then in dispute had been previously sold when he attempted to purchase them for himself. If, then, the Court be right in holding that in this case there was knowledge by Stewart of the prior sale to Petrie, Lang's case is quite in point. But it was argued that the seller here could not have been in mala fide, because Miss Forsyth told him the prior sale to Petrie had come to an end, and that although she may have been wrong in that she honestly thought she was right, and, at any rate, that he, Stewart, was entitled to rely on her statement. The case of Marshall v. Hynd, however, is conclusive in regard to this against the defender Stewart. There Glengarry informed Hynd of the previous sale, but that he had rescinded it, and therefore that it had come to an end. The Court, however, unanimously held that although Glengarry had made such a statement Hynd was not entitled to rely upon it, but was put upon his own and farther inquiry. Now, if ever there was a case in which an intending purchaser in the knowledge of a prior sale was put upon his inquiry so as to have the matter thoroughly cleared up, the present was one of that description. Marshall v. Hynd seems to me, therefore, to be the strongest possible authority in the pursuer's favour, and against the defender. I consider it unnecessary to enter into a consideration of the circumstances of the case of Morrison v. Somerville, as it was of a very special and complicated description, but I think it clear enough that the principles of decision in that case are equally applicable here, and strongly support the proposed judgment.

On the grounds now adverted to I am of opinion with both your Lordships that the pursuer is entitled to prevail.

Lord Gifford.—I come to the same result, although I cannot say that on some of the questions raised I have not felt more difficulty than your Lordship in the chair.

[1] Supra, p. 217.

No. 52.
Dec. 16, 1874.
Petrie v. Forsyth and Another.

There was here a completed bargain, and one which might have been enforced by either party. It is impossible to read the offer and acceptance without coming to that conclusion. Parties were at one as to the subject and the price. The missives are probative, written by agents duly authorised. There was no error—no misrepresentation—nothing to vitiate the agreement, and all that remained was to carry it into effect.

There then arose, as often does, some difficulty and some correspondence as to the terms of the disposition to be granted.

The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that in consequence of what took place during that correspondence the bargain came to an end. But a completed bargain cannot come to an end unless both parties agree to its terminating. The agents for Miss Forsyth could not end it as long as the pursuer adhered to it, and a dispute as to the terms of the formal conveyance does not put an end to a contract of sale. If matters remained entire there could be no doubt that as between the purchaser and seller the sale must be enforced, the terms of the disposition being adjusted by a conveyancer or by the Court.

But the real difficulty arises in consequence of the second sale to the defender Stewart, and the question is whether the defender Stewart is entitled to insist on obtaining implement of his second purchase and the disposition following on it, notwithstanding the concluded bargain between Petrie and Miss Forsyth?

Various expressions are used in the authorities as to what will vitiate a second purchase such as this. Sometimes it is said fraud is necessary—we find it in issue in the case of Morrison v. Somerville[1]—sometimes mala fides is stated as sufficient, and sometimes it seems to be indicated that mere knowledge in the second purchaser of the first sale will be enough to invalidate the second. It seems to me to be a question of circumstances. The facts must be such as to create a personal bar against the party seeking to become a second purchaser. He must be so placed as to be in the full knowledge of the prior bargain, and bound to recognise it, or at least bound to do nothing to defeat it.

It is by no means easy to define by a general proposition the whole law as to what will bar a second purchaser from obtaining implement of his bargain. It must come up to something like this. He must have full and adequate knowledge of the prior purchase, not a mere suspicion or hearsay knowledge of it. The right of the first purchaser must have been intimated to him or something equivalent thereto, or the relation of the parties must be such as to make it the duty of the second purchaser to communicate with the first purchaser, so as to give him an opportunity of completing his title under his bargain. These elements are very strongly against Stewart in this case. Upon the whole evidence, I am of opinion that Stewart was personally barred here, and can in no light be looked on as a bona fide second purchaser.

On these grounds I am of opinion that the conveyance in favour of Stewart must be set aside, so that the first purchaser may get his bargain implemented.

THE COURT on 15th December pronounced this interlocutor:—"Alter the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary complained of: Find by the missive letters, Nos. 19 and 51 of process, that the defender, Miss Forsyth, agreed to sell the property in question and the pursuer agreed to purchase the same at the price of £55, with entry at the [1] Supra, p. 217.

No. 52.

Dec. 16, 1874. Petrie v. Forsyth and Another.

term of Whitsunday 1873, the price to be paid on delivery of the disposition, and that the defender, Miss Forsyth, is still bound to convey the said subjects to the pursuer in terms of the said concluded agreement: Further, find that the defender, Stewart, having been cognisant of the said agreement between the defender, Miss Forsyth, and the pursuer, and in respect of his knowledge thereof, was not entitled to conclude with the defender, Miss Forsyth, a contract for the purchase of the said subjects on his own account, and that the conveyance in his favour libelled in the summons cannot affect the right of the pursuer to obtain a disposition thereof from the defender Miss Forsyth, and to that effect and extent reduce, decern, and declare in terms of the reductive conclusions of the summons, reserving all questions of repetition or otherwise between the defenders; and further decern the defender, Miss Forsyth, to implement her part of the contract of sale of the said subjects entered into between the pursuer and her, in terms of the other conclusions of the summons: Find the pursuer entitled to expenses," &c.

ALEXANDER GORDON, S.S.C.—J. J. & A. FORMAN, W.S.—Agents.

No. 53.

Dec. 17, 1874. Phillips v. M'Innes.

JAMES PHILLIPS, Pursuer and Respondent.—R. V. Campbell.
JOHN M'INNES, Defender and Appellant.—Millie.

Master and Servant—Truck Act, 1831 (1 and 2 Will. IV. c. 37), secs. 6 and 25—"Employers"—"Artificers."—Held that a foreman at a slate quarry, although bound by the terms of his engagement to assist the workmen when he saw any of the operations "falling back" or "in need of being pushed forward," was not an "artificer" but an "employer" in the sense of the Truck Act, 1831.

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Dumbartonshire. M.

JAMES PHILLIPS was lessee of the Luss slate quarries, and he also carried on separately the business of general merchant and grocer at Luss. John M'Innes acted as foreman to Phillips at the slate quarries for about two years from 26th February 1871.

The terms of the engagement were set forth in the following letters:—"Ballachulish, December 17, /70. Dear Sir,—In pursuance of my promise I now write to you. I shall be very much obliged if you will let me know the conditions on which you wish to engage me. 1st, What duties would you require of me, what I should have to do? 2d, What wages do you intend giving?—Awaiting your reply, I am, &c. JOHN M'INNES." "Luss, December 22, 1870. Mr John M'Innes.—Dear Sir,—I duly received your letter of 17th inst. inquiring as to conditions, with the view of coming to Luss, and the duties expected of you. As to duties expected I mean to state those as plainly as I possibly can. In the first place, then, I mean you to take charge of the men employed in the quarries, and to conduct the different operations in the working of them to the best of your ability, and with the view of making the quarries profitable. You to keep a faithful account of the men's time, for which a book will be given you for the purpose, and at the end of each week you give the time over to me, or any clerk that I may appoint. You to keep also an account of all slates carted or boated from the works, and to hand a note of them to me at earliest opportunity, so that they may be properly booked. I would be very glad to see the working of the quarries extended, so that the man taking charge would be fully employed in superintending; but so long as the quarries continue to be wrought in a small moderate scale, I will expect the foreman to be foremost at everything, leading the men on, and taking a turn at any of the operations that he may see falling back or are in need of being pushed forward. In this way men get on much better when the foreman can shew them a good example. He may take on men or dismiss them when he sees immediate need, such as inferior workmen or their being insubordinate. But in most cases to submit all wrongs or disputes to me, and he will always find me ready to assist and advise for the best. As to the question of wages, in all cases I like to pay a man what they are worth, and to a man attending properly to his duties I will give £60 a-year, but were the workings extended and doing well the matter of wages could be revised. There may be some other small matters to mention, but from what I have stated you can form a good idea of the duties expected; but should I have omitted anything, or should you wish any farther explanation I will willingly give it.—Hoping to hear from you in return, I am," &c. "JAS. PHILLIPS."

No. 53.

Dec. 17, 1874.
Phillips v. M'Innes.

During the period of M'Innes's employment at Luss he received furnishings of groceries and other alimentary necessaries from Phillips, against which the latter retained a considerable portion of his salary as foreman. There remained a balance of about £18 due by M'Innes for these furnishings, for which Phillips raised this action against him in the Sheriff-court of Dumbartonshire.

The defender pleaded;—(2) The pursuer has no right of action for the goods alleged to have been supplied by him to the defender while in his (pursuer's) employment. See Act 1 and 2 Will. IV. c. 37 (Truck Act), sec. 6.

The Sheriff-substitute (Steele), on 31st July 1874, pronounced an interlocutor finding "that the plea of the defender founded on the provisions of the Truck Act was inapplicable in the circumstances of the case, and could not be sustained."

The Sheriff (Blackburn), on 5th September 1874, adhered.

The defender appealed to the Court of Session.

Argued for the appellant;—The question was whether he was an artificer in the sense of the Truck Act or not.* The only cases bearing on the interpretation of that Act were English cases, and from a consideration of them it appeared that (1) where personal labour is stipulated for in the contract the person employed is an artificer; but (2) where the contract is not for labour but for the result of labour, or where the wage is not the wage of labour but the contract price of work to be done, the person employed is not an artificer. These were the only rules that could be laid down, and accordingly, as the terms of his employment contemplated that he should give his personal labour when and as required, he must be held an artificer in the sense of the Act. Though a foreman in relation to the workmen he was an artificer in relation to his employer.[1]

Argued for the respondent;—The English cases founded on by the appellant all referred to questions about piece labour. They ruled that a

* The Truck Act, 1 and 2 Will. IV. c. 37, sec. 25, enacts,—"That in the meaning and for the purposes of this Act all workmen, labourers, and other persons in any manner engaged in the performance of any work, employment, or operation of what nature soever, in or about the several trades and occupations aforesaid, shall be and be deemed 'artificers,' and that within the meaning and for the purposes aforesaid all masters, bailiffs, foremen, managers, clerks, and other persons engaged in the hiring, employment, or superintendence of any labour of any such artificers shall be and be deemed to be 'employers.'"

[1] Ryley v. Warden, Feb. 11, 1848, 18 L. J. Ex. 120; Weaver v. Floyd, Feb. 11, 1852, 21 L. J. Q. B. 151; Bowers v. Lovekin, May 30, 1856, 25 L. J. Q. B. 371; Ingram v. Barnes, Jan. 13, 1857, 26 L. J. Q. B. 82 and 319; Sleeman v. Barrett, Nov. 21, 1863, and Jan. 21, 1864, 33 L. J. Ex. 153; Whiteley v. Armitage, Nov. 26, 1864, 13 Weekly Reporter, 144.

No. 53.

Dec. 17, 1874.
Phillips v. M'Innes.

piece worker was not protected by the Truck Act, but they did not touch the question of the position of a foreman under its provisions. The defender might be expected to labour with his hands when required, but the terms of his employment shewed that he was truly engaged in the superintendence of labour, and therefore, under sec. 25, could not claim protection as an artificer.[1]

LORD PRESIDENT.—The only question which we need consider in this case is, whether the Sheriff-substitute and the Sheriff are right in holding the defender not to be an artificer within the meaning of the Truck Act.

It is necessary to attend to the terms of the contract under which he accepted employment. He wrote on 17th December 1870 asking the pursuer to let him know "the conditions on which you wish to engage me,—1st, What duties would you require of me; what I should have to do? 2d, What wages do you intend giving?" Even in this first letter it seems plain to me that the man so offering his services was not a workman in the ordinary sense of the term. He speaks of his duties, and wishes to know their scope and nature. That is not the position usually taken by an ordinary workman. Accordingly, the answer which the pursuer makes to him is as follows:—(Reads letter pursuer to defender, December 22, 1870, quoted supra, p. 224). This was accepted on the part of the defender, and the contract was completed. Now, the man so engaged, with the duties thus specified, appears to me to be a proper foreman of works employed on a yearly engagement at an annual salary. No doubt he was expected to lend a hand at manual labour when he saw any of the operations "falling back" or "in need of being pushed forward." But that does not interfere with his being a foreman in the proper sense of the term. Every man knows that a farm grieve, who undoubtedly is a foreman, takes a turn at manual labour, and works with or at the head of the men. But that does not interfere with his position as foreman, or make him any the less superintendent of their labour.

If, then, the defender was thus engaged, can he be held an artificer in the sense of the Truck Act? The clause with which we are specially dealing is clause sixth. Now, in this and all the other sections of the Act the artificer and employer are spoken of as persons belonging to two different and opposing classes between whom contracts of service may exist, the one paying and the other receiving wages for purely manual labour. But the 25th section of the Act defines more particularly what is to be understood by the term "artificer" in the meaning and for the purposes of the Act,—"All workmen, labourers, and other persons in any manner engaged in the performance of any work, employment or operation, of what nature soever, in or about the several trades and occupations aforesaid, shall be and be deemed 'artificers.'" On the other hand it provides that "all masters, bailiffs, foremen, managers, clerks, and other persons engaged in the hiring, employment, or superintendence of the labour of any such artificers shall be and be deemed to be 'employers.'" It thus includes among employers any person who is engaged in the "superintendence of the labour of any such artificers." A person who stands in that position cannot be an artificer himself. The two terms "artificer" and "employer" are put in con-

[1] Monteith and Co. v. Blackie, Feb. 2, 1827, 5 S. 280; Finlayson v. Braidbar Quarry Co. July 1, 1864, 2 Macph. 1297, 36 Scot. Jur. 647; Davies v. Berwick, Jan. 23, 1861, 30 L. J. Mag. Ca. 84; see also 4 Geo. IV. c. 34, and 30 and 31 Vict. c. 141, sec. 2.

No. 53.

Dec. 17, 1874.
Phillips v. M'Innes.

trust for the purposes of the Act. Now, the defender is a foreman put in superintendence of the work of those who are artificers in the sense of the Act, and therefore not an artificer himself. That is a sufficient ground of judgment in this case, and I do not therefore go into any of those nice and delicate questions which have been raised in the cases cited from the Common Law Courts in England, which, I confess, seem to me somewhat unsafe guides in this matter.

LORD DEAS, LORD ARDMILLAN, and LORD MURE concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find in fact that the defender (appellant) was when the goods sued for were supplied to him by the pursuer (respondent), the now deceased James Phillips, a foreman employed by the pursuer on an engagement for a year at a salary of £60: Find in law that the defender was not at such time, in a question with the pursuer, an artificer within the meaning of the statute 1st and 2d Will. IV. c. 37: Therefore refuse the appeal, and decern: Find the appellant liable in expenses," &c.

W. & J. BURNESS, W.S.—THOMAS CARMICHAEL, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 54.

Dec. 18, 1874.
Jacobsen v. His Creditors.

1ST DIVISION.
M.

HENRY JACOBSEN, Pursuer.—Lancaster.
THE UNION BANK OF SCOTLAND AND OTHERS (Jacobsen's Creditors), Defenders.—J. P. B. Robertson.

Process—Cessio Bonorum—6 and 7 Will. IV. c. 56, sec. 2.—Henry Jacobsen, grain and commission merchant, formerly of Glasgow, raised a summons of cessio bonorum. His creditors objected to the competency of the summons, inasmuch as it did not set forth, in terms of A. S. 24th December 1838, sec. 1 (to regulate proceedings in processes of cessio bonorum),* any ground entitling the pursuer to cessio under the statute.†

The only fact founded on in the summons was that Jacobsen had been charged to pay a debt on 10th November 1873, but as the summons was raised on 18th November, before the inducice had expired, no warrant of imprisonment had or could have issued against him.

THE COURT held that as the pursuer was not in any of the situations enumerated by the statute, the objection must be sustained, and dismissed the summons as incompetent.

JOHN WRIGHT, W.S.—J. & F. ANDERSON, W.S.—Agents.

---

* "Summonses of cessio bonorum raised before the Court of Session from and after the 12th day of January 1839 shall set forth the particular description of diligence for civil debt against the pursuer on which he founds his right to claim the benefit of the cessio, and when produced in Court shall be accompanied by the necessary evidence of the said diligence so set forth."

† 6 and 7 Will. IV. c. 56, sec. 2,—"If a debtor has been or shall be charged to pay a civil debt, and a warrant to imprison him has been issued, or if he be liable to imprisonment under a decree of a Small-debt Court, or be in prison or imprisoned and afterwards liberated in respect in these several cases of a civil debt, it shall be competent to such debtor . . . to apply for interim protection and for decree of cessio bonorum in the manner hereinafter mentioned."

No. 55. THE SCHOOL BOARD OF THE PARISH OF KELSO, Petitioners and Appellants. —D.-F. Clark—Darling.

Dec. 18, 1874. Kelso School Board v. Hunter.

GEO. DUNCAN HUNTER, Respondent.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—J. P. B. Robertson.

School Board—Schoolmaster—Education Scotland Act, 1872, sec. 23—Interdict—Sheriff.—A petition in the Sheriff-court by a school board against the teacher of a public school praying to have him interdicted "from preventing or excluding the said school board, or members thereof, under the authority of the board, from entering the school during school hours, whenever and so often as they may deem necessary in the discharge of their duties under the Act of Parliament (the Education Act, 1872), or in any other way obstructing the school board in effectually carrying out the visitations referred to," refused (dub. Lord Ardmillan), on the ground that the right of visitation claimed was not clear on the face of the statute.

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Roxburgh, &c. M.

THE school board of the parish of Kelso presented this petition for interdict in the Sheriff-court of Roxburgh against G. D. Hunter, teacher of the Kelso Public School. They averred "that Kelso Public School is vested in and under the management of the petitioners, the school board of the parish of Kelso, who are bound to maintain and keep the same efficient, in terms of 'The Education (Scotland) Act, 1872.'

"That George Duncan Hunter, the respondent, is the teacher thereof.

"That the petitioners found it necessary, in the discharge of the duties devolving on them under said Act, to establish a system of visitation to the schools under their charge, including the school before mentioned, such visitations being made at irregular intervals during school hours, and by two or more members of the board, under the authority of the board, at a time.

"That the respondent objected to such visitations being made to the said school of which he is teacher; and on or about the 13th day of March last he refused to admit to the schoolrooms two members of the board, Mr Charles Robson and Mr James Brunton, although they intimated to him, agreeably to the fact, that they had been deputed by the board to make such visitation, for the purpose of inspecting the school, and ascertaining, for the information of the board, that the work therein was being properly conducted. That in consequence of such refusal the said visitation is frustrated.

"That the unwarrantable and illegal course of conduct thus pursued by the respondent not only obstructs and hinders the petitioners from efficiently or properly discharging the duties imposed on them by the Act of Parliament, but injuriously affects the educational interests of the parish, and frustrates the provisions and intentions of the said Act.

"In these circumstances the present application has become necessary."

The prayer was in these terms:—"To interdict, prohibit, and discharge the said George Duncan Hunter, or others in his employment, from refusing admission to the said school board, or members thereof under the authority of the board, into the said school during school hours, whenever and so often as they may deem necessary, in the discharge of their duties under the Act of Parliament, or in any other way obstructing the school board in effectually carrying out the visitations referred to."

The defence stated was "that there was no authority in the Education Act of 1872, or in the education code for Scotland, authorising a school board to make visits of surprise to a school under their charge, or to interfere with the schoolmaster appointed to a public school before the passing of that Act, otherwise than directed by that Act."

No. 55.

Dec. 18, 1874.
Kelso School Board v. Hunter.

The Sheriff-substitute (Russell) granted interdict.*
On appeal the Sheriff (Pattison) dismissed the petition as incompetent.†
The petitioners appealed to the Court of Session.
The appellants were allowed to amend the prayer of their petition. Instead of the words "from refusing," &c., it was altered to "from preventing or excluding the said school board, or members thereof under the authority of the board, from entering the said school," &c.
The appellants founded on the Education Act, 1872, section 23,[1] and sections 26, 27, 28, 29, 31, 36,[2] 60, 66, 74, were also founded on by the parties.
The respondent argued;—Under section 23 the school board had only succeeded to the powers of the heritors and minister. They had no power of visitation. That belonged only to the presbytery of the bounds.[3]
At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an application for interdict by the school board of Kelso of a rather singular description, and presented under peculiar circumstances.

* This interlocutor, after other findings, proceeded,—"Finds as matter of law that, in terms of the provisions of the said Act, the said school being under the management of the said school board, and it being their duty to maintain the same and keep it in a state of efficiency, and to satisfy themselves that the rules applicable to it are duly observed, it is lawful to the said board, by means of managers duly appointed by them in terms of the Act, or by means of any committee or deputation of their number, or otherwise in any reasonable manner, to visit the school during school hours so often as they shall deem it their duty to do so: Therefore repels the defences," &c.

† "NOTE.— . . . . An application to interdict a person from refusing to do something is quite new in the Sheriff's experience. It comes in effect to a prayer to compel the person against whom it is directed to do what he is said to have refused to do. This is a prayer or demand inappropriate to a process of interdict, the proper and legitimate object of which is to continue or protect from innovation a lawful or established and existing possession." . . . .

[1] 35 and 36 Vict. c. 62, sec. 23—"The parish and other schools which have been established and now exist in any parish under the recited Acts, or any of them, together with teachers' houses and land attached thereto, shall be vested in and be under the management of the school board of such parish, or, if situated in a burgh, then of the school board of such burgh, unless such parish school is the parish school of the landward district of a parish partly landward and partly burghal, in which case it shall be under the management of the school board of such district from and after the election of such school board; and the said school board shall thereafter, with respect to school management and the election of teachers, and generally with respect to all powers, obligations, and duties in regard to such schools now vested in or incumbent on the heritors qualified according to the existing law, and the minister of the parish, supersede and come in the place of such heritors and minister, and all jurisdiction, power, and authority possessed or exercised by presbyteries or other church courts with respect to any public schools in Scotland are hereby abolished: Provided that nothing in this section contained shall defeat or prejudice any right or title to the land whereon any such school or teacher's house shall be built, other than that of the heritors or others, being managers of such school, or shall defeat or prejudice any charge, burden or liability to which such land or houses may be subject." . . . .

[2] Sec. 36—"The school board of every parish and burgh shall maintain and keep efficient every school under their management, and shall from time to time provide such additional school accommodation as they shall judge necessary." . . . .

[3] Stat. 1693, c. 22; 43 Geo. III. c. 54, sec. 19; Presbytery of Elgin v. Magistrates of Elgin, Jan. 16, 1861, 23 D. 287, 33 Scot. Jur. 141; Dunlop's Parochial Law, 519.

No. 55.

Dec. 18, 1874. Kelso School Board v. Hunter.

It is quite a competent mode of proceeding to ask for interdict against any one obstructing a party in the exercise of an undoubted right or the discharge of a clear duty. But I apprehend that to justify such a course the right or the duty must be very clear. We are not to try doubtful questions in a process of interdict. That must be done in a different form.

Now, in what position do the petitioners stand in that respect? It is assumed that the board are entitled to send any of their members at any time, and without notice, for the purpose of inspecting the school, and ascertaining whether the teacher is doing his work well. In short, the very duty which, by the Education Act, seems to be lodged in Her Majesty's inspectors, is said to form part of the functions of the board. Now, is this clear? I confess that to my mind it is anything but clear. I cannot find words expressly conferring such a power; and I am not disposed to imply or infer it from ambiguous provisions, because I should have thought, à priori, that the school board was a very bad depositary of such powers. I do not think it was intended that the school boards should superintend the management of the schools, but rather that the object of the constitution of those local boards is to look after the rights and interests of the ratepayers, and to protect their pockets on the one hand, and on the other to provide sufficient school accommodation for the requirements of the parish or district.

As to the right of the board or its members to visit the school I entertain no doubt. They have duties to discharge which make it indispensable that they should visit the school, and that at all times, including school hours. Whether they are entitled to do so without giving notice I do not think it necessary to give an opinion. The purpose of their visits is to enable them to perform the duties expressly imposed upon them, such as providing accommodation. Those duties cannot be performed without personal inspection. Therefore the idea of excluding them absolutely is out of the question; and if the master had proposed to do so I should have had no hesitation in holding that he was acting contrary to his duty and to the Act of Parliament, and that the board were entitled to every legal remedy. But, in this case, they came to the school for the purpose of doing a thing which apparently was not contemplated by the Act of Parliament. I do not express a decided opinion upon that question. It is an important one, and may afterwards require to be more solemnly decided. But, at all events, it is not made clear to me that the board have the functions which they have here assumed.

The first section founded on by the appellants is the 23d—(reads). Now, the visitatorial powers of the presbytery are not transferred to the school board, but abolished by this section. The duties of the heritors and minister of the parish jointly, or of the minister individually, are said to be transferred to the board; and it is maintained that the minister before the passing of the Act had a statutory right to inspect the school whenever he thought fit.

The fact that the visitatorial duty of the presbytery is abolished and not transferred is important. It leads one to conclude that the Legislature did not intend that that duty should be performed by the school board. Again, it is very doubtful whether any duty performed by the minister individually was intended to be transferred. It would rather appear that what was intended to be transferred was only the class of powers and duties which fall to be exercised and discharged by the heritors and minister jointly. And still further, if it were maintained successfully that any duty which the minister was empowered to perform will pass to the board, the inquiry meets us what statutory power the minister had, and I think the only answer is that he had none. We all know that in practice the minister took a great charge of the school. He was enjoined to do so by various Acts of the General Assembly. But there is no statutory authority giving the minister, as an individual, any such power of superintendance or interference. The practice of the minister inspecting the school and taking a great charge of it is easily accounted for, because he was a constituent member of the presbytery—the member living nearest to the school, and always on the spot. But there is no authority for saying that he had any statutory duty. The argument of the appellants, therefore, derives no countenance from this 23d section.

No. 55.

Dec. 18, 1874.
Kelso School Board v. Muster.

The 26th section, again, which only provides that the schools shall be "vested in and under the management of" the board, does not advance their argument.

The 27th section enables the school board to adopt various means for securing that the educational requirements of the parish shall be met.

The 36th section was also founded on. It provides that the school board "shall maintain and keep efficient every school under their management, and shall from time to time provide such additional school accommodation as they shall judge necessary;" and if they fail to do so, the Board of Education is empowered to prosecute them. There is no doubt that the board are charged with the duty of maintaining the efficiency of the school, and providing such accommodation as may be required. But it does not follow that the individual members are to superintend the teacher and inspect the school. That duty is devolved upon another officer.

The 60th section contains a provision of considerable importance in its bearing on this question. If the school board shall consider that any "teacher is incompetent, unfit, or inefficient, they may require a special report regarding the school and the teacher from Her Majesty's inspector;" and, on receiving such report, they "may, if they see cause, remove such teacher from office." Now, it is said that if the power of removing a teacher for inefficiency is vested in the board, they must have some means of personally ascertaining whether he is inefficient or not. But this very clause supplies the means. If any representation is made to them, or they have themselves any reason to suppose that the teacher is inefficient, they can immediately call for a report by the inspector, and on that report, and not on any personal inspection, they are empowered to proceed. So that this section instead of aiding the argument of the appellants seems to have rather the opposite effect.

On the whole matter, I am of opinion that the school board have not, on the face of this statute, so clear and undoubted a right to visit this school for the purpose of inspecting it—that is to say, superintending the teaching, and examining the scholars—as to induce me to grant interdict against any one molesting them in the exercise of that right. I therefore come to the same conclusion as the Sheriff, and am for refusing the interdict.

LORD DEAS.—I agree in the result arrived at by your Lordship. A good deal has been said upon the construction of the Act of Parliament. But the only question we can decide here is the granting or refusal of this interdict.

It is essential to keep in view the very peculiar nature of a process of interdict, which differs materially from every other civil suit, and may not inaptly be termed quasi-criminal. If the party interdicted fails in any particular to observe the interdict he is liable to be brought to the bar, and subjected summarily to censure, fine, and imprisonment, or any of these punishments, as well as to be mulcted in expenses. An interdict is thus of the nature of an extraordinary remedy, not to be given except for urgent reasons, and even then not as a matter of right, but only in the exercise of a sound judicial discretion. If granted at all it must be in terms so plain that he who runs may read. The responsibility of making it so lies upon the party asking the interdict, and the Court is not called upon to relieve him of that responsibility. He may be allowed to amend his prayer, but if interdict cannot be granted in accordance with the original or amended prayer it cannot be granted at all.

No. 55.

Dec. 18, 1874. Kelso School Board v. Hunter.

In the present case the complainers have amended their prayer. As amended it runs thus,—"To interdict, prohibit, and discharge the said George Hunter, or others in his employment, from preventing or excluding the said school board or members thereof under authority of the board, from entering into the said school during school hours, whenever and so often as they may deem necessary in the discharge of their duties under the said Act of Parliament, or in any other way obstructing the school board in effectually carrying out the visitations referred to."

It must further be kept in view that there is a difference between what can be done in a suspension and interdict in this Court and what can be done under an application, such as we have now before us, to the Judge Ordinary of the bounds. In a suspension and interdict certain questions of right may be discussed and determined upon the passed note, whatever becomes of the prayer for interdict. But under an application like this to the Judge Ordinary, unless interdict be finally granted, nothing can be done at all. This is not a process for determining debateable rights or deciding new or undecided questions. Nor does the process change its nature by being brought into this Court by appeal from the Sheriff. Our duty is to do in it what the Sheriff could and ought to have done, and nothing more,—that is to say, simply to grant or refuse the interdict.

Interim interdict to prevent the object of a depending action from being defeated may be incidentally granted in any case, but that is a different sort of proceeding from this, and need not be here discussed.

An application to regulate possession, where two or more parties are interested in that possession, is also a different sort of proceeding from this, and is generally competent before the Judge Ordinary. Possibly it may be thought,—although I do not go into that question,—that there are joint rights of possession here. The school board have, on the one hand, important duties to perform which may require them to visit the school. The schoolmaster, on the other hand, has his profession to exercise in the schoolroom, his livelihood to earn, and his character to sustain. The finding of the Sheriff-substitute that the school board may visit the school during school hours "in any reasonable manner," and the observations in his note as to the presumption that the school board will shew "due regard to the position and feelings of the teacher so as neither needlessly to interfere with his teaching nor wound his susceptibilities," would be extremely to the purpose if this were an application to regulate possession, but into the terms of an interdict the qualification of "reasonable," or any other element of uncertainty, cannot be allowed to enter.

The object of the school board seems to be to vindicate their right to make visits of surprise during school hours. The inspector of schools has that right expressly conferred on him by the statute. If the school board also have it they have it only by implication. I cannot say the implication is so perfectly clear as not to be debateable. At all events, I think that it is not a question to be solved by placing the schoolmaster de plano under the ban and peril of the proposed interdict.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I regret extremely that this dispute between the school board and the schoolmaster of Kelso has arisen. I trust the misunderstanding may be only temporary, for if the dispute is not reconciled the result will be most injurious to the cause and the interests of education, in the promotion of which both parties have duties to discharge.

It appears that the respondent, a schoolmaster appointed prior to the Act of 1872, refused to admit into the school two members of the school board who had been specially appointed and directed to visit the school. In consequence of this procedure the school board have presented an application for interdict, the terms of which are certainly so general as to create difficulty in granting or enforcing interdict.

It is alleged by the board that the circumstances of the case and the conduct of the respondent have made this application for interdict necessary.

The question is, has the school board the right to visit the school, or has the schoolmaster the right to exclude members of the board proposing to visit it? Can he exclude them absolutely, or can he exclude them in respect of want of previous notice of their intended visit? This question is certainly one of great importance, but I cannot say that I have any difficulty in replying to it.

In the first place, I entertain no doubt of the right of the school board to visit the parish school, or to appoint members of the board to visit the school; and I have no doubt of the right of these members of the board to enter the school. They are in the discharge of their duty in visiting and entering the school. The excluding or obstructing the entrance of these members of the board into the school—the closing of the door of the school against them by the schoolmaster—is, in my opinion, illegal. The statute of 1872 entrusts to the school board important duties, extensive management, and the power appropriate and required for the discharge of these duties. It is not contended that in regard to the question before us any specialty is created by the fact that the teacher was appointed prior to the statute of 1872. In regard to this matter of visiting or preventing visits the principle is the same and the law is the same whether the teacher was appointed before or after the Act. We are called on to dispose of the general proposition that the schoolmaster of the parish school is entitled to close the door of the school against members of the school board appointed and authorised to visit. The school board have the right to dismiss new teachers, and to complain of any teacher. It is said that the act of dismissing or of complaining cannot be preceded by personal inquiry, but that the schoolmaster is entitled to bar them out. I have no hesitation in negativing that proposition. I think that to give judicial sanction to such a proceeding would be subversive of the objects and the principles of the statute. The suggestion made by the respondent that all the school board may come in at once and interrupt the teaching, and sit down permanently in the school, is simply extravagant. Nothing of the kind has been attempted or can be contemplated. Two deputed members proposed to visit and enter the school, and admission was refused—as I think wrongfully refused.

In the second place, I am of opinion that one of the duties committed by the

No. 55.

Dec. 18, 1874.
Kelso School Board v. Hunter.

Legislature to the school board is to "maintain and keep efficient every school under their management," and in the present case to "maintain and keep efficient" this parish school of Kelso. I do not think that the duties of the school board are limited to the protection of the pecuniary interests of the ratepayers. To my mind it is clear that the school board have duties in regard to education apart from these interests of ratepayers. I am further of opinion that, on a sound construction of the statute, the word "efficient," as applied to a school, connot be limited to mere structural or accommodational efficiency, such as stability of building, capacity to accommodate, draining, or ventilation, as was argued to us. I have no doubt at all that the word "efficient" in this statute, and in this clause of the statute, has a more extended and comprehensive meaning. The very words of the 36th section, fairly and reasonably construed, must mean more than mere sufficiency of building. The word "maintain" is sufficient to meet the exigencies created by defective building, insufficient accommodation, or ventilation, or draining, but the words "keep efficient," as applied to the school, and as distinct from the providing of accommodation, must, in my opinion, have a wider meaning. But when we look to the other sections of the statute, where the words "efficient" and "efficiency" are applied to education as well as to the school, any critical difficulty suggested by the respondent on the mere words of the 36th section entirely disappears. In the 26th, 27th, 30th, 34th, 35th, and other sections—all fairly cognate and relative to the 36th section—the limitation of the word, so as to exclude education, as now contended for by the respondent, would be out of the question. It is the duty of the school board to keep the school efficient, and they are bound to satisfy the Board of Education in regard to the efficiency of the school, surely not of the mere building, but of the school as an educational institution. I cannot accept the respondent's narrow and hypercritical interpretation of the words of this Act. He is using subtlety of construction where it is quite inapplicable. In the interpretation of the fettering clauses of an entail I have heard of a construction so severe as to be termed malignant. But I never did hear such a construction applied to the language of a remedial and reforming statute.

In the third place, I am of opinion that if the school board are entitled to visit the school, or to send members to visit the school, in order to ascertain the efficiency of the school as an educational institution, and not merely as a building, then they may so visit without giving previous notice.

I think that giving previous notice of such a visit would frustrate and defeat its object. Every one accustomed to take a part in the direction, management, or superintendence of schools is aware of this. The notice of a coming visit would give time for the preparation and getting up of a show. Such a visit would be a mere form. It would be no test of efficiency. It might be only an occasion for presenting a delusive picture. When the visitors retired from the school with complimentary remarks, the attractive and adjusted exhibition would terminate, and the current of undiscovered mismanagement might flow on as before. A really good teacher, and there are many such, and I hope the respondent is one of them, would welcome a visit at any time, and would not complain of the want of previous notice. I feel convinced that this respondent would on reflection withdraw his demand for previous notice. It is a demand unworthy of an efficient and conscientious schoolmaster.

Thus viewing the question before us as one of power,—as involving the school board's right to enter the school without previous notice on the one hand, and the

No. 55.

Dec. 18, 1874.
Kelso School Board v. Hunter.

schoolmaster's right to shut the door and exclude the members of the school board from the school on the other hand,—my opinion is in favour of the school board. I have anxiously and carefully considered the matter, and am of opinion that the board has the right of entrance; and that the schoolmaster has no right to exclude.

But I wish to add the expression of my regret that this dispute has arisen, and also my regret that this interdict in its very broad terms has been applied for.

The prayer for interdict, even as proposed to be amended, is too general and indefinite. An interdict, the breach of which involves serious liability, ought never to be granted in terms otherwise than definite and precise. Some of the observations of the Sheriff on this point are well founded. The requiring of a definite and precise prayer is according to the settled practice of this Court.

I do not perhaps feel the objections to this prayer to be as strong as some of your Lordships do, because the circumstances out of which those proceedings arose are very peculiar. But it is fairly open to criticism, and it might have been better expressed, and your Lordships, concurring with the Sheriff, think it defective.

If your Lordships, looking to the defective prayer of the petition as too wide and general, are of opinion that it ought to be refused, on the ground that interdict in these general terms, to be followed it may be by penalties for breach of interdict, is not the appropriate remedy under the circumstances of the case, I am not prepared to dissent from that conclusion, though I could not concur in it on the footing of holding the respondent right, or even of holding it doubtful whether he is right or wrong, for I think him wrong; and if we were dealing with the question in an action of declarator, my opinion, on the merits, would be in favour of the school board.

If the refusal of this interdict, giving time for calmer consideration, shall lead to the adjustment of differences, it will do much good. In carrying practically out the provisions of a statute for national education it is most important that those engaged in working the measure should act harmoniously and with discretion. I cannot help thinking that this dispute ought not to have arisen, and that it ought to be settled, and indeed, that it would be settled, if both parties, setting aside jealousy, prejudice, and irritation, would meet to adjust it with good sense and good temper. I have already explained that, speaking generally, it is my opinion that the school board does possess the powers which they here claim. But in the exercise of these large powers it is their duty and their interest to be temperate, and discreet, and considerate towards the schoolmaster. In that view, I think that the school board would act wisely in not attempting to press as matter of right their personal examination of pupils, and in abstaining, as far as possible, from direct and unacceptable interference with the schoolmaster's special duty of teaching. Exceptional cases may, from time to time, occur; and as I have already explained, I think the power is with the board. But some confidence should be placed in the teacher; friendly relations with the teacher should, if possible be preserved; undue interposition by the school board can scarcely do good, and may lead to discord in working and failure in result. I think that it was according to the intention of the Legislature and the meaning of this statute to give to the school board all the power which is here claimed; and I do not think that the appointment of an inspector, as provided by the Act, operates a restriction or diminution of those powers. But the inspector is also a statutory officer, to whom important duties are committed; and in the duty common to both, of promoting in different spheres the work of

No. 55.

Dec. 18, 1874. Kelso School Board v. Hunter.

Legislature to the school board is to "maintain and keep efficient every school under their management," and in the present case to "maintain and keep efficient" this parish school of Kelso. I do not think that the duties of the school board are limited to the protection of the pecuniary interests of the ratepayers. To my mind it is clear that the school board have duties in regard to education apart from these interests of ratepayers. I am further of opinion that, on a sound construction of the statute, the word "efficient," as applied to a school, connot be limited to mere structural or accommodational efficiency, such as stability of building, capacity to accommodate, draining, or ventilation, as was argued to us. I have no doubt at all that the word "efficient" in this statute, and in this clause of the statute, has a more extended and comprehensive meaning. The very words of the 36th section, fairly and reasonably construed, must mean more than mere sufficiency of building. The word "maintain" is sufficient to meet the exigencies created by defective building, insufficient accommodation, or ventilation, or draining, but the words "keep efficient," as applied to the school, and as distinct from the providing of accommodation, must, in my opinion, have a wider meaning. But when we look to the other sections of the statute, where the words "efficient" and "efficiency" are applied to education as well as to the school, any critical difficulty suggested by the respondent on the mere words of the 36th section entirely disappears. In the 26th, 27th, 30th, 34th, 35th, and other sections—all fairly cognate and relative to the 36th section—the limitation of the word, so as to exclude education, as now contended for by the respondent, would be out of the question. It is the duty of the school board to keep the school efficient, and they are bound to satisfy the Board of Education in regard to the efficiency of the school, surely not of the mere building, but of the school as an educational institution. I cannot accept the respondent's narrow and hypercritical interpretation of the words of this Act. He is using subtlety of construction where it is quite inapplicable. In the interpretation of the fettering clauses of an entail I have heard of a construction so severe as to be termed malignant. But I never did hear such a construction applied to the language of a remedial and reforming statute.

In the third place, I am of opinion that if the school board are entitled to visit the school, or to send members to visit the school, in order to ascertain the efficiency of the school as an educational institution, and not merely as a building, then they may so visit without giving previous notice.

I think that giving previous notice of such a visit would frustrate and defeat its object. Every one accustomed to take a part in the direction, management, or superintendence of schools is aware of this. The notice of a coming visit would give time for the preparation and getting up of a show. Such a visit would be a mere form. It would be no test of efficiency. It might be only an occasion for presenting a delusive picture. When the visitors retired from the school with complimentary remarks, the attractive and adjusted exhibition would terminate, and the current of undiscovered mismanagement might flow on as before. A really good teacher, and there are many such, and I hope the respondent is one of them, would welcome a visit at any time, and would not complain of the want of previous notice. I feel convinced that this respondent would on reflection withdraw his demand for previous notice. It is a demand unworthy of an efficient and conscientious schoolmaster.

Thus viewing the question before us as one of power,—as involving the school board's right to enter the school without previous notice on the one hand, and the

No. 55.

Dec. 18, 1874.
Kelso School Board v. Hunter.

schoolmaster's right to shut the door and exclude the members of the school board from the school on the other hand,—my opinion is in favour of the school board. I have anxiously and carefully considered the matter, and am of opinion that the board has the right of entrance; and that the schoolmaster has no right to exclude.

But I wish to add the expression of my regret that this dispute has arisen, and also my regret that this interdict in its very broad terms has been applied for.

The prayer for interdict, even as proposed to be amended, is too general and indefinite. An interdict, the breach of which involves serious liability, ought never to be granted in terms otherwise than definite and precise. Some of the observations of the Sheriff on this point are well founded. The requiring of a definite and precise prayer is according to the settled practice of this Court.

I do not perhaps feel the objections to this prayer to be as strong as some of your Lordships do, because the circumstances out of which those proceedings arose are very peculiar. But it is fairly open to criticism, and it might have been better expressed, and your Lordships, concurring with the Sheriff, think it defective.

If your Lordships, looking to the defective prayer of the petition as too wide and general, are of opinion that it ought to be refused, on the ground that interdict in these general terms, to be followed it may be by penalties for breach of interdict, is not the appropriate remedy under the circumstances of the case, I am not prepared to dissent from that conclusion, though I could not concur in it on the footing of holding the respondent right, or even of holding it doubtful whether he is right or wrong, for I think him wrong; and if we were dealing with the question in an action of declarator, my opinion, on the merits, would be in favour of the school board.

If the refusal of this interdict, giving time for calmer consideration, shall lead to the adjustment of differences, it will do much good. In carrying practically out the provisions of a statute for national education it is most important that those engaged in working the measure should act harmoniously and with discretion. I cannot help thinking that this dispute ought not to have arisen, and that it ought to be settled, and indeed, that it would be settled, if both parties, setting aside jealousy, prejudice, and irritation, would meet to adjust it with good sense and good temper. I have already explained that, speaking generally, it is my opinion that the school board does possess the powers which they here claim. But in the exercise of these large powers it is their duty and their interest to be temperate, and discreet, and considerate towards the schoolmaster. In that view, I think that the school board would act wisely in not attempting to press as matter of right their personal examination of pupils, and in abstaining, as far as possible, from direct and unacceptable interference with the schoolmaster's special duty of teaching. Exceptional cases may, from time to time, occur; and as I have already explained, I think the power is with the board. But some confidence should be placed in the teacher; friendly relations with the teacher should, if possible be preserved; undue interposition by the school board can scarcely do good, and may lead to discord in working and failure in result. I think that it was according to the intention of the Legislature and the meaning of this statute to give to the school board all the power which is here claimed; and I do not think that the appointment of an inspector, as provided by the Act, operates a restriction or diminution of those powers. But the inspector is also a statutory officer, to whom important duties are committed; and in the duty common to both, of promoting in different spheres the work of education, their labours should be conducted in a friendly spirit. The duties of the inspector in the examination of pupils, and in that respect in the ascertainment of the educational efficiency of the school, must be of great service to the school board; and the assurance that these duties of the inspector are well discharged may encourage the board to refrain, with wisdom and courtesy, from too frequent or too peremptory interposition in the department of teaching.

No. 55.

Dec. 18, 1874. Kelso School Board v. Hunter.

I make these remarks as one friendly to the cause of national education and hopeful of the results of this statute. On the question of power, my opinion is in favour of the board, and my view is in accordance with that of Lord Young, whose interpretation of this statute cannot be otherwise than important. His Lordship's views have been clearly stated in a note to a recent decision.[1] On the question of procedure by interdict I do not venture to differ from your Lordships; and I trust the result may be, that time, and better consideration, and kindlier feeling, may lead to an amicable settlement.

LORD MURE.—This is an important question as affecting the statutory powers and duties of school boards, and I agree with Lord Ardmillan in regretting that the appellants have proposed to try it in a process of interdict. For if interdict were granted, even in terms of the amended prayer, it would lead to inconvenience, and mutual annoyance, and probably to farther litigation.

If the rights and duties of school boards in the matter of visiting and inspecting schools were clearly laid down in the statute I am not prepared to say that it might not be proper that these boards should be allowed by means of an interdict, provided it were framed in very definite and distinct terms, to place themselves in a position to discharge these duties. But it appears to me, that the rights and duties of school boards in these respects, and more particularly for the purpose of seeing whether "the work in schools is being properly conducted," as claimed in this application, are by no means clearly defined. It is not at all clear to me what their precise nature is, and this ought, I think, to have been ascertained and defined in some other way than by means of an application for interdict, before that remedy was resorted to. I agree with your Lordship in the chair that the 23d section does not of itself confer any such powers as are here in question, because I am not aware that any such power was vested in the minister and heritors. That being so, and even assuming that the word "efficiently" when used in the statute, includes efficiency in education, there is machinery provided by the statute by which that efficiency can, I believe, be ascertained. By section 66 the inspectors are authorised to enter the school at all times. Now, we are here dealing with a statutory matter, and when we have a clause expressly conferring such a power on one set of officials, and a total absence of any similar enactment with regard to school boards, it is not easy to say what or whether any precise duty in the matters of inspection was intended to be conferred upon them, and I am satisfied that their right and duty in this respect is not made so clear and distinct as to warrant us in granting an interdict in terms of this prayer.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute of 22d June 1874, and the interlocutor of the Sheriff of 31st October 1874; refuse the prayer of the petition, and decern: Find the appellants liable in expenses," &c.

J. S. DARLING, W.S.—D. HUNTER, S.S.C.—Agents.

[1] Hunter v. Kelso School Board, decided by Lord Young 16th December 1874, and by Inner-House 5th March 1875, reported infra.

No. 56.

MRS MARY MITCHELL OR SPALDING, Pursuer and Appellant.—Balfour—Young.
WILLIAM LAURENCE YOUNG, &c. (Spalding's Trustees), Defenders and Respondents.—Scott—Jameson.

Dec. 18, 1874. Spalding v. Spalding's Trustees.

Parent and Child—Trust-Disposition—Aliment.—A person conveyed certain lands, and generally his whole estate, heritable and moveable, with the exception of his household furniture, to trustees for the following purposes, to pay the expenses of management and all debts due by the granter at the date of the deed, to pay the income to the granter during his life,—after his death to pay an annuity to his widow, and aliment and educate A, B, and C, his children, and eventually to convey the estate to the said children upon the youngest attaining majority. The deed was delivered to the trustees on the day of its execution, and was recorded in the Register of Sasines three months thereafter. The granter died about five months after executing the deed, and a posthumous child was born nine months after the date of the deed. Held (diss. the Lord President) that the posthumous child was entitled, as a creditor, to aliment out of the trust-estate.

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Perthshire. M.

ON 10th March 1873 Charles Spalding executed a trust-disposition in the following terms:—"I, Charles Spalding, considering that I have full trust and confidence in the persons afternamed for executing the trust hereby constituted, do therefore, and for other good causes and considerations, give, grant, assign, and dispone to and in favour of William Laurence Young, &c. . . . . heritably and irredeemably,—First, All and Whole the town and lands of Burnside of Kilrie; . . . . also, Second, All and Whole these three acres of land or thereby lying to the south of Loanhead, . . . as also the whole other estates and others, heritable and moveable, belonging to me, together with my whole right, title, and interest, present and future, in the subjects hereby conveyed, but always excepting from the above conveyance my household furniture; but declaring always that these presents are granted by me in trust only, and for the ends, uses, and purposes aftermentioned, viz.—(First), That my said trustees shall, out of the means and estate hereby conveyed to them, pay all expenses incurred by them in the management and administration of the trust hereby constituted, and also pay all just and lawful debts at present due by me: (Second), That my said trustees shall, during my life, pay to me the whole free income, interest, or annual produce of the means and estate hereby conveyed to them: (Third), I direct and appoint my said trustees, after my death, from the means and estate hereby conveyed to them, to pay to Mrs Mary Mitchell or Spalding, my wife, an annuity of £10 sterling, ... which annuity in favour of my said wife shall be in lieu of all terce of lands, legal share of moveables, and everything that she jure relictæ or otherwise could ask, claim, or demand of me, my heirs, executors, or representatives through my death, in case she shall survive me, and which annuity I consider to be an ample aliment for her, in her position and habits of life, and that a larger income would not be for her advantage, and which provision in favour of my said wife is hereby declared to be purely alimentary, and not to be assignable by her or attachable by her creditors: (Fourth), My said trustees shall, after my death, aliment, clothe, and educate my children, Mary Ann Spalding, James Mitchell Spalding, and John Spalding, in a manner suitable to their station and prospects in life, until the youngest of them attain the age of twenty-one years, and my said trustees on my death shall be the sole judges of where they shall reside and receive their education, I myself being bound, out of the income of the estate payable to me as aforesaid, to aliment, clothe, and educate my children during my life: (Fifth), I

No. 56.

Dec. 18, 1874. Spalding v. Spalding's Trustees.

direct my said trustees to make over and convey to my said son, James Mitchell Spalding, on my youngest child attaining the age of twenty-one years complete, the heritable subjects above conveyed, under burden of—(1st), £100 sterling to be payable to my daughter Mary Ann Spalding, and (2d), £100 to be payable to my son John Spalding, and failing him by predeceasing me, then to such other of my children as I may direct by any writing under my hand, and failing such direction by me, then to my son John, under burden of the said £100 payable to my daughter Mary Ann Spalding, and failing him, then to my son Dr William Spalding, Gorebridge, and his heirs, under said burden of £100 payable to my daughter as aforesaid: (Sixth), Any accumulations which my said trustees may make until the youngest of my said children attain the age of twenty-one years complete I direct and appoint them to divide equally among the said Mary Ann Spalding, James Mitchell Spalding, and John Spalding, and the survivors of them; and declaring further that the said provisions to the said Mary Ann Spalding, James Mitchell Spalding, and John Spalding shall be in full satisfaction to them of any share they can demand as legitim, bairns' part of gear, portion-natural, or of their mother's jus relictæ, excepting only what I may leave to them of my good will; and declaring farther that my children, the said Dr William Spalding and Arthur Robert Spalding have already received their portion from me, and are not entitled to anything from my said estate; . . . . declaring that my said trustees shall have all the powers and privileges conferred on trustees by the Acts 24 and 25 Vict., cap. 84, and 30 and 31 Vict., cap. 97; . . . . as also with powers of sale, by public roup or private bargain, or borrowing on loan on said property, in so far as necessary for carrying out the purposes of this trust, and of which my said trustees shall be the sole judges, with power to my said trustees to sell the said heritable property above specially conveyed, if they should deem it expedient, of which they shall be the sole judges, excepting that during my lifetime my consent must be first had and obtained; and declaring that the money so realised from the said estate shall be held by my said trustees on the like trusts and for the like purposes as the said estate; and with power to my said trustees to invest the same on such securities or shares as they may consider safe; . . . . and I nominate and appoint my said trustees, and such other person or persons as may be assumed as trustees, and the survivors or survivor of them who shall accept, to be tutors or curators to the said Mary Ann Spalding, James Mitchell Spalding, and John Spalding, during their respective pupillarities and minorities; . . . . and I revoke and recall all settlements or testaments made by me at any time heretofore; and having delivered these presents to my said trustees, I consent to registration hereof for preservation."

The deed was registered in the Register of Sasines on behalf of the trustees on 3d June 1873.

Mr Spalding was twice married. By the first marriage he had two sons, one of whom received £1000 and the other £1500 from him in his lifetime. Of the second marriage three children were born during his lifetime. He died on 31st August 1873, and on 20th December following a posthumous son was born.

His widow raised the present action against the trustees named in the trust-disposition, concluding for £5 as inlying expenses, and £20 per annum for aliment of the posthumous child until it should attain five years of age.

The only property left by the deceased appeared to have been his heritable estate, which was sold by the trustees after his death under the powers of the trust-deed.

The pursuer pleaded;—The pursuer's late husband, the deceased

No. 56.

Dec. 18, 1874.
Spalding v. Spalding's Trustees.

Charles Spalding, being the father of the child, aliment for which is concluded for, and the said Charles Spalding having died possessed of considerable means and estate, at all events having died leaving means and estate in the hands of the defenders, as trustees for behoof of his children, the pursuer is entitled to receive aliment for said child out of said estate, and the sum concluded for being fair and reasonable, decree therefor ought to be pronounced, as concluded for, with expenses. The deceased Charles Spalding having conveyed his whole estate, both heritable and moveable, to the defenders, as trustees for behoof of his children, Mary Ann Spalding, James Mitchell Spalding, and John Spalding, the children alive and born of the marriage between him and the pursuer at the date he executed said trust-deed, these children, or the defenders as representing them, are bound to aliment the posthumous child, for whom aliment is claimed.

The defenders pleaded;—(2) There being no power in the trust-disposition to pay the sums claimed, the trustees cannot apply the trust-fund to purposes different from those specified in the deed. (3) The income of the trust being only sufficient to aliment the beneficiaries under the trust, and the pursuer being an able-bodied woman, she has no claim against the trustees.

The Sheriff-substitute (Barclay) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the defenders, admitting that they were and are sole trustees, appointed by and during the lifetime of the said Charles Spalding, and that since his death they have sold his heritage, and now are in possession of the price or produce thereof, they therefore represent him, and are liable to pay his debts, and are not precluded by any directions contained in said trust-deed: Therefore repels the defenders' first, second, and third pleas in law."

The Sheriff (Adam) pronounced this interlocntor:—"Finds that under and in terms of the said trust-disposition the defenders are directed to pay all just and lawful debts of the said Charles Spalding due by him at the date when the said trust-disposition was executed and delivered as aforesaid, but finds that they are not thereby directed to pay debts subsequently incurred by him: Finds that the alleged debt sued for was not due by him at the date when the said trust-disposition was executed and delivered as aforesaid: Finds that the defenders do not represent the said Charles Spalding, and are not liable for debts and obligations incurred by him subsequent to the said date: Finds, further, that by the said trust-disposition, the defenders are directed to aliment, clothe, and educate certain children of the said Charles Spalding therein specially named, but that they are not directed, and are not bound to aliment the child born on the 20th December 1873, of which he is alleged to be the father: Therefore assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the action: Finds them entitled to expenses," &c.

The pursuer appealed, and argued;—The trust-disposition was a mortis causa deed, and could not affect the rights of creditors, in which position the pursuer stood. In any view, the father was not divested of the heritable estate until the trustees put the deed on record in June. By that time the child was in utero, and its rights were fixed.[1]

[1] Somerville v. Somerville, May 18, 1819, F. C.; Miller v. Dickson, July 11, 1826, 4 S. 822; Barbour v. M'Minn, July 7, 1826, 4 S. 806; Fyfe v. Kedslie, March 6, 1847, 9 D. 853, 19 Scot. Jur. 380; Lowther v. M'Laine, Dec. 15, 1786, M. 435; Morrice v. Sprot, June 27, 1846, 8 D. 918, 18 Scot. Jur. 248; Duguid v. Caddall's Trustees, June 29, 1831, 9 S. 845, 3 Scot. Jur. 557; Ersk. 3, 8, 46, and 1, 6, 58; Bell's Prin. secs. 1776, 1777, and 1632; 1 M'Laren on Wills, 259; Smitton v. Tod, Dec. 12, 1839, 2 D. 225, 12 Scot. Jur. 241; Hastie and

No. 56.

Dec. 18, 1874. Spalding v. Spalding's Trustees.

The defenders argued;—The trustees did not represent the father, and were, therefore, not liable for his debts contracted subsequent to the deed. They were infeft before the truster's death, and, therefore, did not take the property by succession. The object of the deed was payment of debts already contracted by the truster. The deed was neither testamentary nor revocable. The truster did not give all that he possessed. He reserved his furniture. He did not give acquirenda. The entry was declared to be at the date of the deed. He was solvent at the time, and was entitled to divest himself of his property, and having done so no subsequent creditor could recover from his trustees.[1]

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This action has been raised by Mrs Spalding, and the object is to obtain aliment for a child born four months after the death of her husband. It is directed against certain trustees appointed by the late Mr Spalding under a trust-disposition dated 10th March 1873. The trustees maintain, among other pleas, that the trust conveyance to them was inter vivos and irrevocable, that the funds in their hands are specially appropriated, and that they have no funds which can be applied to payment of the debts of the deceased, or at least of debts contracted subsequent to the date of the trust-deed. They maintain that the claim of the posthumous child is a subsequent debt. The case involves a very important question, which turns on a construction of the deed itself, and its effects on the estate conveyed. It is maintained that, suppose the estate is irrevocably settled by the deed, and is not liable for debts, yet the posthumous child is entitled to share in the provision made by the deed for the other children. But it is most convenient to consider, first, whether the estate in the hands of the trustees is liable for debts contracted subsequent to the constitution of the trust.

I. There can be no doubt that the child has the right of being alimented out of the executry estate of his father. This was decided by the early cases of Hastie in 1671, M. 416, Muirhead in 1706, M. 5927, and other subsequent cases. But all these cases were pronounced on the assumption that the persons liable were the representatives of the deceased father. The question here is, whether the trustees are the representatives of the deceased father, and are liable for debts subsequent to the date of the trust-deed. I deal with the demand of the pursuer as of a creditor, a favoured creditor no doubt, but nothing higher than a creditor.

It appears to me that the effect of the trust-deed was to divest Spalding of the fee of his heritable estate, and to vest it in the trustees for the purposes of the trust. It is not said that there is any other estate. No doubt there are words of general conveyance, as follows:—"As also the whole other estates and others, heritable and moveable, belonging to me, together with my whole right, title, and interest, present and future, in the subjects hereby conveyed, but always excepting from the above conveyance my household furniture." Now, if there was any moveable estate, it might have been carried by these words, but it is not said that there is any. It was contended that the meaning of the clause was to convey the estate as it stood at the time of his death, but I do not so receive the words.

Keir v. Hastie, Nov. 10, 1671, M. 416; Turnbull v. Tawse, April 15, 1825, 1 W. and S. 80; Wright v. Harley, June 2, 1849, 9 D. 1151, 19 Scot. Jur. 500.

[1] 1 Bell's Com. (M'Laren), p. 35, (old ed.), p. 36; Leckie v. Leckie, Nov. 22, 1776, M. 11,581; Oliphant, Bell's Folio Cases, p. 126.

No. 56.

Dec. 18, 1874.
Spalding v. Spalding's Trustees.

because they are "belonging to me," not "which shall belong to me at the time of my death." But even suppose that the words could be so construed, they do not apply to the only estate which is in the hands of the trustees. It is quite possible that in one part of the deed there may be a conveyance of a part of the estate which is testamentary and revocable, while in another part of the deed there is an absolute conveyance. The only part which we have to deal with is that which conveys the heritable estate. The first purpose of the deed is,—"First, that my said trustees shall, out of the means and estate hereby conveyed to them, pay all expenses incurred by them in the management and administration of the trust hereby constituted, and also pay all just and lawful debts at present due by me." The second purpose of the deed is,—"Second, that my said trustees shall, during my life, pay to me the whole free income, interest, or annual produce of the means and estate hereby conveyed to them." The third purpose is to pay a liferent annuity to the widow of £10, with an allowance for mournings. The fourth purpose is,—"My said trustees shall, after my death, aliment, clothe, and educate my children, Mary Ann Spalding, James Mitchell Spalding, and John Spalding, in a manner suitable to their station and prospects in life, until the youngest of them attain the age of twenty-one years, and my said trustees on my death shall be the sole judges of where they shall reside and receive their education, I myself being bound, out of the income of the estate payable to me as aforesaid, to aliment, clothe, and educate my children during my life." The fifth purpose is,—"I direct my said trustees to make over and convey to my said son, James Mitchell Spalding, on my youngest child attaining the age of twenty-one years complete, the heritable subjects above conveyed, under burden of—First, one hundred pounds sterling to be payable to my daughter Mary Ann Spalding, and second, one hundred pounds to be payable to my son John Spalding, and failing him by predeceasing me, then to such other of my children as I may direct by any writing under my hand, and failing such direction by me, then to my son John, under burden of the said one hundred pounds payable to my daughter Mary Ann Spalding, and failing him, then to my son Doctor William Spalding, Gorebridge, and his heirs, under said burden of one hundred pounds payable to my daughter as aforesaid." The sixth purpose is,—"Any accumulations which my said trustees may make until the youngest of my said children attain the age of twenty-one years complete I direct and appoint them to divide equally among the said Mary Ann Spalding, James Mitchell Spalding, and John Spalding, and the survivors of them; and declaring further that the said provisions to the said Mary Ann Spalding, James Mitchell Spalding, and John Spalding, shall be in full satisfaction to them of any share they can demand as legitim, bairn's part of gear, portion-natural, or of their mother's jus relictæ, excepting only what I may leave to them of my good will." This contemplates the possibility of his making a further testamentary disposition. Then there is the following direction:—"And declaring farther that my children, the said Doctor William Spalding and Arthur Robert Spalding, have already received their portion from me, and are not entitled to anything from my said estate." We know that one of them had received £1500 and the other £1000. Then there is a power of sale, the exception to which is that "during my lifetime my consent must be first had and obtained." Then there is a right of entry given to the lands "with entry to the whole lands and others specially and generally above conveyed, and with right to enter into possession of the personal and moveable

No. 56.

Dec. 18, 1874. Spalding v. Spalding's Trustees.

estate hereby conveyed, all at the date hereof." Then there is a declaration that the deed was delivered to the trustees. Upon this deed being executed it was, in point of fact, delivered, and in addition to that the trustees took infeftment upon it. The effect of this was entirely to denude Mr Spalding of the fee of the heritable estate. The liferent was reserved, but was not what is properly called a liferent by reservation, as the liferenter was merely to receive the income through the hands of the trustees. If the effect of the deed was to divest the truster, the estate will not be liable for his debts contracted subsequently. No power of revocation could exist if the granter was divested. It appears to me that if the conveyance had been directly to James Mitchell Spalding and the other substitutes, under burden of payment of £100 to each of the sisters, that would have completely divested the truster, and it is clear on legal principle the same result will follow if the same thing is done through the medium of a trust. A great number of cases was referred to in the argument, but I shall only refer to a few of them.

The first of these is the case of Leckie v. Leckies, decided on 22d November 1776, reported in the Folio Dictionary, and also in Morrison, p. 11,581. This report sufficiently brings out the point in the case, though there is also a longer report in the Appendix, Presumption, No. 1 :—"Leckie executed a deed, disponing an heritable subject to his youngest daughter Elizabeth and her husband, and their son, reserving his own liferent. By the same deed, he assigned to the same persons all his moveables at his death; and, of the same date, he granted them a bond for £400, which he delivered to them. This disposition contained a clause dispensing with the delivery, but it was registered by the granter. Some years afterward, Leckie, by another deed, disponed the heritable subject, and all his moveables, among his three daughters equally. After the father's death, the youngest daughter brought a reduction of the latter settlement, on the ground that the former being put upon record, was thence to be held a delivered deed, and was consequently irrevocable. The Lords found, that the first deed, in so far as regarded the moveables, could operate no transference of these till the granter's death, and therefore, to that extent, it was revoked by the posterior settlement; but with regard to the heritage, they found that the registration of the deed was equivalent to delivery, and therefore reduced the latter settlement quoad the heritage." That is a very instructive case in many respects. It shews that a disposition, with a reservation of the granter's liferent, is a divestiture of the granter as soon as delivered. It further shews that a deed may contain in one part a disposition of a part of the estate which is revocable and ambulatory till the granter's death, and in another part may contain an irrevocable disposition.

It has been represented that the authority of the case of Leckie has been shaken by the case of Somerville v. Somerville (May 18, 1819, F. C.); but I think, on the contrary, that the case of Somerville confirms the case of Leckie. The Judges are careful to point out the differences. In Somerville's case the deed was a conveyance in favour of the granter's daughter, her husband, and her son, and was executed in 1805. The deed proceeded upon the narrative of the granter "being resolved to execute a settlement of his affairs." It conveyed, under the reservation of his own liferent, to Janet and her husband in liferent, and to their son and a certain series of substitutes in fee, in which John and William, and the heirs of their bodies, were introduced immediately after the heirs of the bodies of the sons of Janet, and before the heirs of the bodies of her daughters

No. 56.

Dec. 18, 1874. Spalding v. Spalding's Trustees.

"all and sundry lands, heritages, houses, tenements, and other heritable subjects, and all goods, gear, debts, and sums of money, or other moveable subjects whatever, which shall pertain and belong to or be due or addebted to me at the time of my decease, in any manner of way; and in particular, without prejudice to the aforesaid generality, the following lands"—Then follows the description of a particular subject. The Lord Ordinary (Pitmilly) pronounced this interlocutor:—"In respect the general disposition executed by the late Mr Somerville in November 1805 proceeds on the narrative of the granter having resolved to execute a settlement of his affairs, and after conveying in general all heritable and moveable property which should belong to him at the time of his death, dispones, in particular, without prejudice to the foresaid generality, the lands of Ampherlaw, finds that the conveyance of these lands was thus expressly qualified, and in the same manner as the general conveyance of the disponer's property, heritable and moveable, was qualified, with the condition that the lands and other property disponed was only such as should belong to the disponer at the time of his death, and that it therefore remained in his power equally as it did with regard to the rest of his property, heritable and moveable, to dispose of the lands of Ampherlaw onerously or gratuitously during his lifetime." When the case came before the Inner-House the Judges found great difficulty, and the case was heard more than once. "Upon advising a second reclaiming petition, with answers, the Court appointed a hearing in presence; after which, Lords Justice-Clerk, Glenlee, and Craigie, were still for adhering (though not without hesitation), upon the ground that the deed was, from its whole construction, a mortis causa settlement, comprehending the lands of Ampherlaw as part of that arrangement; in which circumstance their Lordships considered this case to differ from that of Leckie, where there was a special independent conveyance of the heritage. Lord Craigie was also still moved by an impression against the deed, from the manner and circumstances in which it had been prepared and executed. Lord Robertson was also for adhering, but without expressing special reasons. Lord Bannatyne was of opinion that the conveyance of Ampherlaw was an independent conveyance inter vivos (as in the case of Leckie), rendered irrevocable by delivery. The Court adhered to their former interlocutor." That was throughout a very hesitating judgment, but I am not disposed to dispute its substantial authority. The deed was construed as a conveyance to take effect only at the death of the granter. The case of Leckie was an independent and separate conveyance inter vivos, as in the present case.

If any doubt still existed as to the effect of such a deed as the present, when divested or feudalised, it was set at rest by the judgment of the House of Lords in the case of Turnbull v. Tawse, 15th April 1825, 1 W. and S. p. 80; and in the Court of Session, 12th December 1822, 2 S. p. 1. The Court of Session found that Mrs Turnbull was entitled to execute the second deed, as the first was revocable, and did not divest the granter. The House of Lords reversed this judgment. The nature of the first deed may be gathered from the judgment of Lord Cringletie, who 'finds that she and her husband, having got into pecuniary embarrassment, took the resolution to extricate themselves therefrom by paying off their debts, and to secure the free residue to their children; and accordingly, on the 18th of April 1804, they executed a trust-deed in favour of the defenders, the narrative of which details the difficulties in which they had been involved, and mentions that, from these considerations, and 'in order that the debts due by us may be speedily discharged at the least possible expense, and the residue of the property

No. 56.

Dec. 18, 1874. Spalding v. Spalding's Trustees.

belonging to me, the said Elizabeth Anne Hay (i.e. Turnbull) may be effectually secured to me and my said husband under the declaration after-mentioned, and the longest liver of us in liferent, and to our daughters after named in fee, our said son having already received much more than his proportion of the property and effects belonging to us, we have resolved, after full deliberation and mature consideration, to grant the trust right and disposition underwritten': Finds that, accordingly, Mrs Turnbull conveyed her whole property to the defenders, with full power to feu, sell, or dispose thereof either by public or private sale, but under trust always, 1st, for payment of the expense of executing the trust, and of all debts and sums of money, whether heritably secured or otherwise, which shall have been contracted by me, the said Elizabeth Anne Hay, preceding the date thereof, and particularly a debt due to the defender, John Tawse, of £258, 16s.; 2dly, the trustees were to pay to Mrs Turnbull, exclusive of her husband's right, such surplus as could be afforded of the rents and feu-duties of her property for her maintenance; and 3dly, after the death of the longest liver of the said Mrs Turnbull and her husband, the trustees were taken bound 'to dispose and convey the free residue of the property hereinbefore disponed, or to pay and apply the proceeds thereof to the use and behoof of the said Alexander Turnbull, our son, and Mary and Elizabeth Jane Turnbull, our daughters, in such shares and proportions as shall be directed by me, the said Mrs Elizabeth Anne Hay, by any writing under my hand,' failing such writing, then to the two daughters equally between them: Finds that the trustees, defenders, were infeft on said disposition, conform to instrument of sasine dated 9th October, and registered 19th November 1804; and therefore, as this trust was executed for payment of debts contracted at its date, after the discharge of which the residue was to belong to the said Mrs Turnbull and her husband in liferent, and to their children nominatim in fee, and as their mother did not reserve to herself any power of contracting other or farther debts, the fee of the residue was vested in the trustees for behoof of the children, and could not be injured or impaired without their consent." He then finds that the attempt to get rid of the first deed was not effectual. The Second Division took a different view. They held that as there was no direct conveyance to the parties interested, but merely a trust-conveyance to be carried out after the truster's death, that the fee was vested in the trustees, not in the beneficiaries, and that the deed was testamentary and revocable. When the case came before the House of Lords they took a different view. I shall refer to two passages only in the opinion of Lord Gifford, in one of which he says, "It was also admitted, and, I apprehend, cannot be disputed, on the cases cited, that if this disposition had been a disposition to Mrs Turnbull herself, and the children nominatim, that would have vested the fee in the children. But it is said that this being a mere trust-deed, the effect of these trusts is not the same as if it had been a disposition to the children immediately, but that, looking at the whole structure of this trust, the Judges seem to have been of opinion that the fee was not so parted with by Mrs Turnbull, that the trustees were trustees for the benefit of the children, but that there still remained in her that fee to be disposed of by her, and therefore it was competent for her to execute this second trust-deed." He says, a little farther down,—"Now, if, as it then stood, Mrs Turnbull could have done this by an immediate disposition to the children, it appears to me that still more could she do so by means of a trust executed in this way. Of the fee she clearly divested herself, and it was vested in the trustees." Now, it appears to me that the case of Turnbull v. Tawse confirms the doctrine of the case of Leckie. When a man conveys to trustees it is the same as if he conveyed to the beneficiaries themselves.

No. 56.

Dec. 18, 1874.
Spalding v. Spalding's Trustees.

There is another case still further confirming this doctrine, and shewing the view which the Court took of the judgment of reversal in the case of Tumbull v. Tawse,—that is the case of Smitton v. Tod, Dec. 12, 1839, 2 D. 225—"A proprietor infeft executed a conveyance of his heritage, and also of the whole moveable estate then belonging to him, in favour of trustees, on the narrative that there had been no written contract of marriage between his wife and him, nor any provision for her and the children of the marriage, and that, from natural facility, he was incapable of profitably conducting his affairs. The purposes of the trust were to pay his debts; to provide an alimentary annuity to his wife, exempt from the jus mariti, and, on her death, an alimentary annuity to himself; after the death of the longest liver the trustees were to hold the subjects equally for behoof of the children born or to be born of his present or any subsequent marriage. Two children were already born at the date of the deed; the trustees were empowered to provide for the education and maintenance of his children, even during his life; the warrandice was from fact and deed; the deed was delivered, and the trustees took infeftment. Held that, quoad the children, the deed was irrevocable."

The leading opinion was given by Lord Mackenzie, and was as follows:—"I do not consider the deed to be a postnuptial contract at all. It is simply unilateral, and was spontaneously granted by the pursuer. It is true that he recites the want of an antenuptial contract; but that is merely to shew the reason for his executing his deed. He might, nevertheless, after that recital, have made a provision for the interests of his wife and children, not amounting to anything more than a legacy, or a trust expressly revocable at pleasure. He might have done so; but I do not think he did so. He executed a de præsenti conveyance of his estate, a deed of immediate disposition inter vivos, and delivered the deed to his trustees, for the purpose of enabling them to take infeftment on it, which they did, and duly registered their infeftment. At the date of this transaction there were children already born, for whose behoof this delivery of the deed, and this registered infeftment took place. No power of revocation was inserted in the deed. It did not bear to be a settlement, or to be granted mortis causa; on the contrary, it was to have, and it actually had, instant and immediate effects. It was not a deed which conveyed acquirenda, or included the whole property of the disponer which might belong to him at his death; it merely carried his existing property as at its date. In point of form, therefore, the deed was plainly an irrevocable and completed conveyance, and it would require the occurrence of something very strong in the ends and purposes of the trust to make the deed be revocable. But these ends and purposes rather afford an opposite inference. The purposes could not well be executed, nor the ends of the deed be secured, if it was revocable. The purposes were to provide for payment of all the pursuer's debts; of an annuity to his wife during her life, and to himself after her death; and to provide for the education of his children, and for their provision after his death. All these objects were to be secured by the trust, on account of the pursuer's facility. How could that be done if the deed was revocable at his pleasure? In that case his property remained as much subject to the acts of his facility as ever, and the duration of it, down to the time of his death, could not be relied on so as to make the purposes executable. The ends and purposes of the deed, therefore, afford the reverse of any reason for

No. 56.

Dec. 18, 1874. Spalding v. Spalding's Trustees.

conjecturing revocability. And as the deed is in form irrevocable, I think we cannot find it to be otherwise.

"In the case of Somerville, I was of counsel for one of the parties, and I do not think it a parallel case to this. What was chiefly pressed there was, 1st, that the deed revoked was declared to be in its preamble a 'settlement;' and, 2d, that it conveyed all the granter's property 'as at his death.' Nor, perhaps, was the construction of it wholly free from the impression produced by its being liable to the suspicion of undue impetration, under the colour of getting the granter to make a mere revocable settlement. A case which comes much nearer to the present than Somerville's does is the case of Turnbull. Looking to the decision of that case in the House of Lords, the principles laid down by Lord Gifford, in delivering judgment seem to me to be sufficient for the decision of this case. I think, therefore, that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should not be altered."

On these authorities, I cannot resist the conclusion that the deed here is an irrevocable deed, and that posterior creditors have no claim. The pursuer is in no better position than a creditor.

II. But it is said that although the child may not be entitled to aliment as a claim of debt against the trustees, yet that the deed may be so read as to admit the pursuer's claim under the provision to the other children. It is maintained that the conditio si sine liberis applies. It might be that a deed was so conceived as to let in the claim of a posthumous child, which was not in the contemplation of the granter. But cases of that kind are rather to be referred to the legal category of "implied will," and are founded upon the notion of pietas paterna. The only case bearing on this branch of the argument was the case of Oliphant, 10th December 1794, Bell's Folio Cases, p. 126. That was a very singular case. "John Lord Oliphant succeeded to the estate of Bachilton under a strict entail, but he was thereby empowered to provide his younger children, other than the heir who shall succeed to the lands and estate, &c., with suitable and competent provisions, not exceeding three years' free rents of the estate for the time.

"Lord Oliphant had two sons and two daughters, but his second son dying without issue, his Lordship in 1776, in virtue of the powers given him by the entail, gave a provision of £1000 to his two daughters, Margaret and Eleonora, defenders in this case, and to the survivor and to her or their heirs and assignees. The deed contains a power of altering or revoking.

"Lord Oliphant afterwards entered into a second marriage, and lived till 1781. Of this marriage there was a son, John the present Lord Oliphant, born two years before his father's death, and a posthumous child, Janet, the pursuer of this action. Although John was born two years before the death of his father, and was at that time to be considered a younger child, being excluded from the titles and the estate by the son of his eldest brother, yet Lord Oliphant made no change in the bond of provision in favour of younger children. Upon the death of Lord Oliphant he was succeeded by his grandson, and his death happening soon after, John, the son of the second marriage, succeeded to the title and estate, but being at the time of his father's death a younger child he contended in an action for their provisions brought by his two sisters of the first marriage that he was entitled under the character of one of the younger children to retain a share of the £1000 sterling. This claim the Court overruled.

"But an action being brought by Janet, the posthumous child, the question came simply to be, whether she had right to one-third of the provision secured to the younger children by Lord Oliphant's bond of provision granted in 1776." Now, this provision was £1000 to Margaret and Eleonora nominatim. The judgment of the Court seems to have been delivered by Lord President Campbell, and no doubt that gives great weight to the decision. He says,—"This is not a question of interpretation, it is the case of an extension of will; and there have been cases in which you have gone further than you are required to go here. There is a case mentioned in the answers, where, by the contract, one daughter was to be provided in fourteen thousand merks, two in twenty thousand merks, and three in thirty thousand merks, and nothing is said of the case of a fourth. There was a fourth, and the question was, whether she could have any share of these sums. It was found that she was entitled to a share. You brought in the fourth daughter, though omitted." Now, it is a very remarkable circumstance that the case here referred to, Anderson v. Anderson (1729, 18th July, M. 6590) was reversed on appeal (13th March 1734, 1 Craigie, p. 136). It is still more remarkable that this was not known to Lord President Campbell, though we are all aware, as matter of fact, that in the last century the judgments of the House of Lords in Scotch cases were little known in Scotland. I confess that I am not surprised at the reversal, because the cases of Anderson and Oliphant carried the doctrine of implied will very much further than any other authorities.

No. 56.

Dec. 18, 1874.
Spalding v. Spalding's Trustees.

Let us consider how the doctrine could be applied here. If the pursuer is right in maintaining that she is within the rule of the case of Oliphant, she must carry her demand further than what is contained in the summons. It must amount to a demand to share in the provision to the other children. These provisions are given in the form of a burden on the estate. James Mitchell Spalding is to get the estate on paying £100 to each of the younger children. How is the posthumous child to be let in to share in these provisions? Is the fund of £200 to be divided into three parts, or is the eldest son to give another £100? The trustees may burden the estate for the aliment of the three children, but they are not entitled to aliment any more than three. To force them to do so might throw the whole trust into confusion. I am as little inclined to adopt the second ground on which the pursuer's case is founded as I am to adopt the first ground.

I therefore agree with the Sheriff. Being aware that I stand in a minority of one, I give my opinion with diffidence; but I cannot resist the force of the authorities.

LORD DEAS.—The facts of this case, so far as judicially ascertained, may be very shortly stated. The late Mr Spalding had been twice married. His age is not stated, but it was not disputed that he was an old man. He left two sons by his first marriage, and three children by his second marriage. A fourth child of this marriage was born between three and four months after his death. He made provision for the sons of the first marriage by giving the one £1500 and the other £1000. He thereafter made provision for his three children of the second marriage by executing the trust-deed now under consideration. By that deed, which is dated 10th March 1873, he conveyed his whole means and estate, heritable and moveable, excepting his household furniture, to trustees, of whom the defenders are the acceptors and survivors, for the following purposes:—1st, For payment of expenses, and "all just and lawful debts at present due by me; 2d, That my trustees shall during my life pay to me the whole free income, interest, or annual produce of the means and estate hereby conveyed to them;" 3d, To pay to his wife, if she survived him, an annuity of £10 sterling, half-yearly, in full of all legal claims, and also to pay her £10 for mournings; 4th, That the trustees should, after his death, aliment, clothe, and educate the three children of his second marriage, Mary, James, and John, until the youngest attained the age of twenty-one, "I myself being bound, out of the income of the estate payable to me as aforesaid, to aliment, clothe, and educate my children during my life;" 5th, To make over to his said son James, on his attaining the age of twenty-one, the heritable subjects specially conveyed by the deed, under the burden of £100 to his son John, if he survived the truster (which he did); 6th, Any accumulations before his youngest son attained the age of twenty-one to be divided among his said three children equally, and the survivors of them,—the said provision to his said three children to be in full of all legal claims, declaring that the two children of the first marriage had already received their portion and were entitled to nothing more. The deed contained a power of sale of the heritable property, but not to be exercised during the truster's life-time except with his consent. It contained also authority to the trustees to take possession of the estate as at the date thereof, a clause of resignation for infefting the trustees in the heritable subjects, and a nomination of them to be tutors and curators to his said three children then in minority. The deed further bore—"And I revoke and recall all settlements or testaments made by me at any time heretofore; and having delivered these presents to my said trustees, I consent to registration hereof for preservation." The deed contained no express declaration of irrevocability.

No. 56.

Dec. 18, 1874. Spalding v. Spalding's Trustees.

The trustees caused the deed to be recorded in the Register of Sasines on 3d June 1873. The truster died on 1st August same year, survived by his widow, by his three children of the second marriage, as well as by his two children of the first marriage, who have made no claim on the estate. The widow gave birth to a male posthumous child on 20th December 1873, and she has instituted this action for behoof of herself and the posthumous child, concluding for £5 sterling of inlying expenses, and £20 per annum of aliment for the child till it attains five years of age, reserving to apply for an increased aliment at the lapse of that period.

The trustees deny all liability for aliment, however limited, as well as for inlying expenses. The Sheriff-substitute repelled the plea of non-liability, without prejudice to the question of amount, but the Sheriff recalled that interlocutor, and assoilzied the trustees from the conclusions of the action, with expenses, his ground of judgment being, as stated in his note, that the "trustees do not represent the truster generally, and are not liable for any debts or obligations which they are not directed to pay by the deed under which they act."

It is conceded on all hands that the posthumous child must be held to be legitimate, but the Sheriff says that the aliment sued for, assuming it to be due by the truster, was not due by him (meaning, I presume, not incurred by him) at the date of the deed. That, however, is far from clear. In the first place, the aliment was a debt due by the law of nature. The truster was bound ab initio to aliment all the children he might beget, so long as, by reason of infancy, they could not aliment themselves. In the next place, the posthumous child was born only nine months and ten days after the date of the deed and six months and seventeen days after the deed had been recorded. The child must therefore have been begotten prior to the latest of these dates, and the law, which in questions of legitimacy allows ten months between conception and birth (Erak. 1, 6, 50), holds that the child may have been begotten before the earliest of these dates. It can hardly, I think, be said that liability had not been incurred, at the date of the deed, for the aliment of a child which the law presumes to have been already begotten, and this view, therefore, would of itself obviate the Sheriff's ground of judgment, that the debt was not a prior but a subsequent debt.

No. 56.

Dec. 18, 1874. Spalding v. Spalding's Trustees.

Apart, however, from this matter of dates, I think the Sheriff does not sufficiently keep in view that the question at issue is really not the liability of the trustees, but the liability of the deceased's estate, of which the trustees are the mere administrators for behoof of the children of the second marriage, who are the gratuitous beneficiaries under the deed.

I doubt extremely whether the deed was to any effect an irrevocable deed. The authority mainly relied on in support of its irrevocability was the case of Leckie, 22d Nov. 1776, M. 11,581. In that case the father had disponed a particular heritable subject to his youngest daughter and her husband and their son, reserving his own liferent. By the same deed he assigned to them all his moveables at his death. He placed this deed on record, and likewise delivered to the same parties a bond for £400. Afterwards he disponed the heritable subjects and all his moveables to his three daughters equally. The youngest daughter brought a reduction of this second disposition after the granter's death, on the ground that by recording the first disposition he had made it irrevocable. The first disposition was held to be irrevocable as to the special heritable subject, but revocable as to the moveable estate. The question raised was purely a question of revocability, and that question obviously turned upon the terms in which the special heritable subject had been conveyed by the particular deed, for although the plea that registration was equivalent to delivery applied to the moveable estate equally as to the heritable subject, "the Lords found that the first deed, in so far as regarded the moveables, could operate no transfer of these till the granter's death."

That this decision must have proceeded upon the terms of the particular deed, taken in connection with the circumstances, becomes quite clear on attending to the fact that in the subsequent case of Somerville, 18th May 1819, F. C., although Leckie's case was cited, and no doubt whatever was cast upon its soundness, a different result was arrived at as to the heritable estate specially disponed by Somerville from what had been arrived at with reference to the heritable estate specially disponed in the case of Leckie. The deed in the case of Somerville conveyed to the granter's daughter Janet and her husband in liferent, and to their son and a series of substitutes in fee, the granter's whole means and estate, heritable and moveable, which should belong to him at his death, and in particular the lands and estate of Ampherlaw, with procuratory and precept for infefting his disponees. The granter reserved his own liferent, but the deed contained no power to revoke. On the back there was a docquet, holograph of and signed by the granter, bearing that the deed had been delivered to his daughter, and Lord Pitmilly's interlocutor, which was adhered to by the Court, proceeded expressly on the footing that the deed had been delivered. The case was discussed upon a first and second reclaiming petition, and the result was, after a hearing in presence, that the deed was held revocable out and out, on the ground that it was to be regarded, from its whole construction, as a mortis

No. 56.

Dec. 18, 1874. Spalding v. Spalding's Trustees.

causa settlement, comprehending the lands of Ampherlaw as a part of the general arrangement. That case appears to me to come much nearer to the present than the case of Leckie.

I attach, of course, no weight to the decision of this Court in the case of Oliphant (Bell's Folio Cases, 126), which proceeded on the supposed authority of a previous case of Anderson, the judgment in which had been reversed in the House of Lords on grounds which recommend themselves to my mind as sound and satisfactory—(Craigie and Stewart, 136).

I have fully considered the other cases quoted at the bar, and in particular Turnbull v. Tawse, as decided in the House of Lords, 1 W. and S. 80; Smitton v. Tod, 2 D. 225; Morrice v. Sprot, 8 D. 918; and Wight v. Harley, 9 D. 1151; but I am satisfied that these cases were all of a special nature and do not sufficiently bear upon the present case to justify my detaining your Lordships by going over them.

It may be that, in the present case, the granter, while making what was in substance a mortis causa settlement of his affairs, had a sinister object in view, viz., to exclude the legal claims of his wife if she should happen to survive him, and at the same time to leave a door open to himself to plead revocability if he happened to be the survivor. This would account for the equivocal language of the general conveyance of the whole other estates and others, "heritable and moveable, belonging to me, together with my whole right, title and interest, present and future, in the subjects hereby conveyed," in place of saying in plain terms "presently" belonging to the granter, and distinctly excluding all idea of any "future" interest in the estate remaining vested in him.

All the purposes of the trust which follow this general conveyance are precisely of such a nature as might be expected in a mortis causa deed. The first purpose as to debts is no doubt limited in its language to "debts presently due by me," and if there had been a competition on a deficient estate between prior and subsequent debts, the effect of these words might have been brought into controversy. But it has not been suggested that this was a trust, by an insolvent party, for behoof of creditors,—nor by a facile party, for the purpose of interdicting himself from contracting future debts.

The second purpose, that the trustees should, during the granter's life, pay to him the whole free income of the estate, is just, in another form, a reservation of his own liferent, usual in mortis causa deeds. For although he created an immediate trust, it was a trust, during his own lifetime, for his own benefit exclusively.

The third purpose, viz., for payment after his death of an annuity to his widow, with a sum for mournings, in full of all claims against his representatives, is, of course, in its terms a purpose appropriate to a mortis causa deed.

The fourth purpose, which leaves the burden upon himself of alimenting, clothing, and educating his children during his life, and lays that burden on the trustees only after his death, is also such as might be expected in a mortis causa deed.

So is the postponment in the fifth purpose of the period of division among the beneficiaries till his youngest child should attain the age of twenty-one years; and likewise the provision in the sixth purpose, which provides for accumulation, till that same period, of the income, so far as not expended, for the maintenance and education of the children. Apparently there is to be no vesting till the youngest child attains the age of twenty-one, and in the meantime,

No. 56.

Dec. 18, 1874.
Spalding v. Spalding's Trustees.

by a subsequent clause, the trustees are to be tutors and curators to the children. A power of sale of the heritable property is likewise conferred on the trustees, and it is declared that the money thereby realised "shall be held by my said trustees on the like trusts and for the like purposes as the said estate," thus massing the whole estate, heritable and moveable, in one undistinguishable succession. Even this power of sale, however, was only to emerge after the granter's death, for the condition is that "during my lifetime my consent must be first had and obtained."

These purposes, certainly, are very unlike what might be expected in a deed the object of which was fairly and fully to divest the granter, and at once to place the favoured beneficiaries in his full room and stead. On the other hand, it was a deed calculated, in the circumstances, to serve, and which did serve, all the purposes of a mortis causa settlement of the granter's entire estate at his death. He obviously expected to have nothing more to leave, and he had, in point of fact, nothing more to leave at his death than he had disposed of by the deed.

I cannot think that such a deed would have excluded creditors from attaching the fee of the estate, if necessary, for payment of their debts, although subsequently contracted. Whether the beneficiaries would have had a jus quæsitum to object to revocation as to the surplus, beyond what was necessary to satisfy debts, past and future, might have been made a question, which has not perhaps been hitherto raised and decided in that precise form, and into which I do not propose here to enter farther than I have already done, because I do not think it necessary for the solution of this case to do so. My opinion is, in the first place, that the debt in dispute was a debitum naturæ, and in that sense a prior debt in a question with the gratuitous beneficiaries under this deed; and, secondly, that, at all events, it became a debt so soon as the child was begotten, which the law holds it may have been ten months before the birth.

For this last proposition we have the express authority of the case of Hastie and Ker v. Hastie, Nov. 10, 1671, M. 416, in which a father, having a son and a daughter, disponed a small portion of his means to the daughter, and the rest, which was very considerable, to the son. It is not said whether the deeds were inter vivos or mortis causa. But assuming them to have been the latter, the case is still important. The widow having brought forth a posthumous child, sued the son for her inlying expenses, and aliment for the child. It was answered, as to the inlying expenses, that there was no ground for the claim in law, especially seeing the defender's disposition was long before the granter's death. It was replied that these expenses were a debt, "for which the father was liable, whom the defender represents as lucrative successor by the disposition posterior to the conception of this child, nam in beneficiis qui in utero est pro jam nato habetur." The report bears,—"The Lords sustained the libel, and modified, in respect of the reply and disposition." The report farther bears, with respect to the aliment,—"The Lords found the defender, as representing the father by disposition of his goods, liable to aliment the posthumous child during his minority, as he was without calling or means to aliment himself, but would not extend it after majority."

It is not stated in the report whether the disposition by Hastie was mortis causa or inter vivos, but that is immaterial to the purpose for which I cite the case, viz., that liability was incurred both for the inlying expenses and the aliment, not later, at all events, than the date of conception, "nam in beneficiis

No. 56.

Dec. 18, 1874. Spalding v. Spalding's Trustees.

qui in utero est pro jam nato habetur." That maxim, thus authoritatively applied, brings both sums sued for under the category of prior debts, and so within the very words of the first purpose of the deed, if that were assumed to be necessary (which I am not prepared to say that it is), to warrant us in recalling the Sheriff's judgment, and pronouncing decree for the £5 sued for as inlying expenses, and for the child's aliment, also sued for, to such limited amount as your Lordships may, in the circumstances, think it right to modify.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I rest my opinion on this very difficult question on a ground which I think is apart from most of the difficulties of the case,—I mean on the sacred duty and high legal as well as moral obligation which rests on a father to support his child. I think that obligation is one which God lays on him, one which humanity appreciates and law recognises and enforces (Ersk. i. 6, 56). I think, farther, that it is a just and becoming extension of the same obligation that, in a certain sense, it exists from the date of marriage. The father is bound to look forward and to provide for the aliment, the support necessary to protect from starvation, of an expected child. Before the child is actually born, nature, with the sanction of law, recognises the right of the child to support from parents whenever it comes into the world. And if the right is with the child the obligation is on the father. The duty of the father is very clear. The claim of the child is equally so. Both obligation and claim arise from the relationship, and ex debito naturali.

I am speaking of a lawful child, and we must hold this child to be the lawful child of Charles Spalding. It is a posthumous child, but I think the case before us is really the same as if the child had been born before the father's death and the demand for aliment been made against himself, his defence being that by this deed he had denuded himself in favour of these trustees. I think that the father could not on that plea have successfully resisted that claim.

The child is a creditor to whom nature gives the right. The father is a debtor on whom nature lays the obligation ex debito naturali. The right of a favoured creditor,—a highly favoured creditor,—arises when the claim is for bare aliment, for a few pounds a-year to keep the child from starving. That is the extent to which alone I would go. I go no farther. I do not proceed on the case of Oliphant, or on the principle of implied will. I do not think that this child is entitled to share as a beneficiary by appointment in the provisions of this trust. It is as a creditor for that support which is necessary to keep it alive, which is a debt of nature, that I am in favour of sustaining the claim. The principle on which the father's obligation to aliment a child rests is clear, and the extension of the principle to a posthumous child has long been settled and is not now disputed.

The trust-deed before us is a general—a universal—conveyance of heritable and moveable estate. In so far as regards the creation of the trust, the deed took immediate effect. But, except the payment to the truster of the whole proceeds during his life and the payment of his present debts, the administration of the trust and the disposal and distribution of the estate is postponed till after his death. The deed was gratuitous, unilateral, and postnuptial. It is an attempt to set his estate aside and protect it from his subsequent creditors, without parting with the benefit or enjoyment of it himself. Such an attempt to provide for children by a gratuitous deed to the exclusion of creditors, but without excluding himself, is not equitable, and is not favourably viewed by law. If the trust provision for the children named in the deed were ascertained to be reasonable, and could be sustained on that ground, then the reasonableness of the provision would equally apply to the aliment of the child subsequently born. If the question of the reasonableness of the provisions which only take effect after his death is excluded, and they are held as unreasonable and as exhausting the estate, then I should be disposed to share the doubt, expressed more than once by Lord Fullerton, whether subsequent onerous creditors would be excluded by such a deed,—a deed saving the interests of the granter and gratuitously disposing of his whole estate.

No. 56.

Dec. 18, 1874.
Spalding v. Spalding's Trustees.

I quite admit that this trust-deed could not be revoked by the truster gratuitously or at his pleasure.

But the point now before us, involving only the claim of a child for necessary aliment is different. The claim which had arisen, during the father's life though after his deed, is peculiarly strong.

I appreciate the weight of the authorities, of which your Lordship has favoured us with a most instructive exposition, and these authorities, supported by your Lordship's opinion, certainly prevent my holding with any confidence that this trust-deed was generally revocable by the granter. Lord Deas thinks this a mortis causa deed, and therefore revocable. There is much force in his observations, but I am disposed to rest my opinion on the ground of the peculiarity of this alimentary debt.

The debts of Mr Spalding were to be paid. This child, which we must hold as lawful, must be held as truly a creditor, and Mr Spalding himself as truly a debtor, to the extent of necessary aliment.

As an illustration I may suggest the case of a claim for deathbed and funeral expenses of Mr Spalding. Of course these expenses were a debt subsequent to the deed. But the debt, the obligation imposed, as Mr Bell says, "by nature and by decency," to furnish from his estate, if he had any, the means of decent burial, existed at the date of the deed, and continued till he died.

So also, in my opinion, did the debt, the obligation to aliment the children he had and the child to be expected, and which was afterwards born. We must deal with this case just as if the child had been born before Mr Spalding's death. The child, before the truster died, had reached a maturity of gestation which indicated life. It must be held pro nato, and the obligation to aliment, which is the debt of the father, existed in binding force, pressing on him before the time for its enforcement emerged.

On this ground, and to no further extent than necessary aliment, I think the claim of the child should be sustained.

Lord Mure.—I have come to the same conclusion as the majority of your Lordships, although I have done so with very considerable diffidence and hesitation, as I was aware, when considering the case, that the opinion which I was disposed to form was at variance with that entertained by your Lordship in the chair. The claim as laid in the summons is simply one for the inlying expenses incurred by the birth of a posthumous child, and for the aliment of that child until it attains the age of five years complete. It is therefore a claim founded substantially upon the natural obligation which all parents are under to provide for their children, and is one of a description which has been held in a variety of cases to transmit, upon the death of a parent, to the parties lucrati by the succession. As regards one of the questions here raised, viz., the liability of

No. 56.

Dec. 18, 1874.
Spalding v. Spalding's Trustees.

the representatives or successors of a party deceased to implement such an obligation, I do not think I can better express the result to be deduced from the authorities than in the words of Lord Ivory in a note to Mr Erskine, i. 6, 58, where he says,—"It would seem that in every case the representatives of a person deceased, whether the degree of relationship be nearer or more remote, and whether the succession by which they are lucrati consist of heritables or moveables, are out of this succession liable in aliment to those whom the deceased himself was under a natural obligation to maintain." It is also, I think, clear from the decisions that this rule applies whether the representatives have succeeded to the property in the ordinary course of law, or have taken it by a conveyance from the father. The latter point was so settled in the case of Hastie, November 10th 1671, D. p. 416, and of Scott, 8th March 1759, D. App. Parent and Child, No. 1. And that the trustees under a father's trust-settlement are, in the ordinary case, under the same liability, is shewn by the decisions in Riddell, 6th March 1802, D. App. Aliment, No. 4, and Ormiston, 22d December 1838, Jurist, vol. xi. p. 232.

In this state of the law the main point raised for decision is whether there is anything in the terms of the present trust which must be held to exclude the operation of the rule. This question is one of difficulty. But after considering the matter in all its bearings I have come to the conclusion that there is not. For I concur with Lord Deas in thinking that this deed is essentially mortis causa, in so far as the interest of the children of the truster are concerned. There is no doubt a special de præsenti conveyance to the trustees of the heritable estate. But that is followed by a conveyance of "the whole other estates, heritable and moveable" to trustees, who are to enter into the possession and management, and, after discharging the debts then due by the truster, to pay the whole free income to him during his life. They are, however, during his life to do nothing more, for they are not to sell the heritable estate, except with his consent, and it is only after his death that the other purposes of the trust, which consist of provisions for the truster's family, are to come into operation. There is thus a conveyance of the whole estate belonging to the truster, with the exception of the household furniture, and I do not think that this clause must be read as limited to the estate then belonging to him. It is not qualified by the word "presently" belonging to him, which is not an unusual word of style when such a restriction is intended. And when the clause is read in connection with that where power is given to the trustees to complete titles, not only to the heritable estate specially conveyed, but to any estate to which they "may at any time have right as falling under or accruing from the trust hereby created," I am unable to put any other interpretation upon the very general terms of the conveyance than that it was intended to include acquirenda. The deed, moreover, as I read it, is, and was, I think, plainly intended to operate as a general settlement of the truster's affairs. For by it provision is made for his second wife, and the whole of the existing children of his second marriage, as in full satisfaction of their legal rights; and the testator gives as his reason for settling everything he had upon those children, that his two sons by his first marriage had already received their portions. Then the deed concludes with a revocation of "all settlements or testaments" before made by him, and this appears to me to be as distinct an indication that the object and intention of the truster was to make that deed the settlement of his affairs as the declaration to that effect in the narrative of the trust-deed in the case of Somerville.

18th May 1819, referred to in the argument. I am therefore of opinion that as the estate is here held in trust for parties who are lucrati by the succession, the defenders are liable to make good the pursuer's claim.

No. 56.
Dec. 18, 1874.
Spalding v. Spalding's Trustees.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute of 7th May 1874, and the interlocutor of the Sheriff of 24th June 1874: Repel the defences, and decern against the defenders for payment to the pursuer of £5 of inlying expenses; and, further, decern in terms of the libel for payment of aliment at the rate of £14 per annum: Find the petitioner entitled to expenses, both in the inferior Court and in this Court: Allow," &c

DRUMMOND & REID, W.S.—GEORGE BEGG, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 57.
Dec. 19, 1874.
Bertram & Co. v. Stewart's Trustees.

JOHN A. BERTRAM & Co., Pursuers.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Trayner.
ROBERT SMART AND OTHERS (William Stewart's Trustees), Defenders.—D.-F. Clark—Rhind.

Triennial Prescription—Act 1579, c. 83—Reference to Oath—Oath of Manager.—Held that the Act 1579, c. 83, in limiting a person suing for payment of a prescribed account to a proof "by writ or oath of his party," excludes the oath of the manager of such party.

Oath—Reference.—Held that, when a reference is made to the oath of two parties jointly, it is not competent to sustain it as a reference to the oath of one of them.

THIS action was raised on 15th June 1874 by John A. Bertram and Co., wine-merchants, Leith, against Robert Smart, James Stewart, and William Ferguson, trustees of the deceased William Stewart, and also against George Scott, hotel-keeper, Portobello. The summons concluded (1) for payment by Stewart's trustees and Scott of an account amounting to £8, 6s. 9d. incurred, prior to November 20, 1869, for wines furnished to the deceased William Stewart and Scott, as partners carrying on the business of hotel-keepers in the Crown Hotel, Edinburgh; and (2) for payment by Stewart's trustees of an account amounting to £62, 4s. 3d. for wine furnished to the Crown Hotel prior to March 5, 1870, during a period when the business was carried on by George Scott as manager for the trustees.

1ST DIVISION. Ld. Curriehill. M.

George Scott did not enter appearance, but decree in absence was not taken against him.

Mr Stewart's trustees appeared and denied the debt, and pleaded the triennial prescription.

The Lord Ordinary (Gifford) on 18th July 1874 pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the accounts sued for have undergone the triennial prescription, and that the pursuers can only prove resting owing by writ or oath, and continues the cause."

Thereupon the pursuers put in a minute of reference to oath in these terms:—"Trayner, for the pursuers, referred and hereby refers the whole cause to the oath of the defenders, including the oath of the said George Scott as manager for the other defenders.

The Lord Ordinary (Curriehill), on 4th December 1874, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard parties' procurators on the minute of reference to the oaths of the defenders, Sustains the same, so far as made to the trustees of the deceased William Stewart, and appoints them to appear and depone accordingly, and answer all pertinent interrogations: Quoad ultra refuses to sustain the reference, and grants leave to the pursuers to reclaim against this interlocutor."

No. 57.

Dec. 19, 1874. Bertram & Co v. Stewart's Trustees.

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—The reference should have been allowed to the oath of the manager for the trustees as well as to that of the trustees themselves. His writ would have been as binding on them as their own, and the statute made no distinction between writ and oath. The case of a wife was analogous. Her oath might be referred to in any matter falling under her præpositura.[1] The case of a factor was also analogous. Mr Dickson's doctrine on the point[2] was not supported by decisions.[3] Reference to the oath of a bank agent had been allowed, and Mr Scott occupied the same position toward the trustees in the present case.[4]

Argued for Mr Stewart's trustees;—(1) Mr Scott was not properly a party in the sense of the Act of 1579, c. 83, for, first, he was only called as a defender so far as a very small part of the account sued for was concerned; and second, so far as called he did not appear. (2) This being the case, he had no interest in the real substantial sum in dispute. It was on the ground of interest, and interest alone, that reference to oath was admitted where parole proof was excluded.[5] (3) Mr Scott had ceased to have any business connection with them for more than three years, and to allow a reference to his oath would really be to put them at the mercy of a single witness, and one, it might be, who was ill-disposed towards them, in a case in which parole testimony was excluded. (4) The doctrine that reference to a factor's oath was incompetent, if not very clearly decided in the cases cited for the pursuers, was supported by Lord Cringletie's opinion in Cromar v. Duke of Gordon,[6] and appeared to be indisputable from the earlier cases.[7] (5) Although reference to the oath of a wife might be competent where she was præposita, it could be so only because she is eadem persona with her husband.[8] (6) As the oath of a cedent did not bind his assignee, nor that of a principal his cautioner,[9] neither could that of a manager bind his employers. (7) But the case most in point was that of Duncan v. Forbes, in which it was held that reference could not be made to the oath of a ship's-husband, though himself a joint owner, so as to bind the other owners.[10]

At advising,—

Lord President.—The account sued for in this case consists of two parts. First, there is a sum of £8, 6s. 9d., which represents alleged furnishings by the [1] Fraser's Per. and Dom. Relations, i. 312; Ersk. 3, 7, 18, note *; Young and Co. v. Playfair, Dec. 2, 1802, M. 12,486.

[2] Dickson on Evid. sec. 1591.

[3] Cromar v. D. of Gordon, Jan. 20, 1830, 8 S. 353, 2 Scot. Jur. 166; Mackay v. Ure, March 7, 1849, 11 D. 982, 21 Scot. Jur. 357; Hunter v. Dun, July 6, 1809, Hume, 584; Smith v. Falconer, Feb. 17, 1831, 9 S. 474, 3 Scot. Jur. 294.

[4] Dickson v. Ker, Dec. 2, 1830, 9 S. 125, 3 Scot. Jur. 69.

[5] Pattinson v. Robertson, Dec. 4, 1846, 9 D. 226, 19 Scot. Jur. 74.

[6] Supra, note 3.

[7] Kendal and Co. 1776, M. 12,351; Gilmour, 1797, M. 12,042; Kirkwood v. Wilson, June 26, 1823, 2 S. 425 (N. E. 378); Stein's Assignees v. E. of Mar, Nov. 13, 1827, 6 S. 1.

[8] Lord Gillies in Duncan v. Forbes, March 4, 1831, 9 S. 540, 3 Scot. Jur. 348; Lang v. Hislop, June 8, 1854, 16 D. 908, 26 Scot. Jur. 475.

[9] Ersk. 3, 5, 9; Dickson on Evid. secs. 1471, 1593-4; Mein v. Towers, July 11, 1829, 7 S. 902, 1 Scot. Jur. 369; Ferrier v. Graham, Feb. 10, 1831, 9 S. 419, 3 Scot. Jur. 257; Borthwick v. Christie, June 12, 1838, 16 S. 1136, 10 Scot. Jur. 491; Adam v. Maclachlan, Jan. 29, 1847, 9 D. 560, 19 Scot. Jur. 235; Guthrie, 1724, M. 12,485.

[10] July 2, 1829, 7 S. 821, and supra, note 8.

No. 57.

Dec. 19, 1874.
Bertram & Co. v. Stewart's Trustees.

pursuers to the firm of Scott and Stewart, hotel keepers. As regards that first part of the account Mr Scott and the trustees of the late Mr Stewart are called as defenders. Mr Scott does not appear, but I understand decree in absence has not been taken against him. Second, there is a sum of £62, 4s. 3d. As regards this larger sum the trustees of the late Mr Stewart are the only defenders. The account is alleged to have been incurred by them. But it is also averred that at the time it was incurred Mr Scott was managing the hotel for the trustees.

Both accounts have undoubtedly undergone the triennial prescription, and the Lord Ordinary, by his interlocutor of 4th December 1874, has sustained that defence. The pursuer thereupon put in a minute of reference to oath in these terms:—"Trayner, for the pursuers, referred and hereby refers the whole cause to the oath of the defenders, including the oath of the said George Scott, as manager for the other defenders." Now, the Lord Ordinary, by the interlocutor reclaimed against, sustains the reference "so far as made to the trustees of the deceased William Stewart, and appoints them to appear and depone accordingly, and answer all pertinent interrogatories: Quoad ultra, refuses to sustain the reference," &c. Now, I think that that interlocutor is incorrect and must be recalled, because it sustains a reference which has not been made. The reference as regards the sum second sued for proposed is not to the defenders, but to the defenders and Scott jointly. The Lord Ordinary has sustained a reference to the defenders, excluding Scott. That is quite a different reference, and till such reference be made it cannot be sustained.

But the real question is, whether the reference as made ought to be sustained or not. Now, on this matter it is necessary to keep in view the precise terms of the Act of 1579, c. 83. It ordains that all accounts for certain classes of debts shall be pursued for within three years, "otherwise the creditour sall have na action except he outher preife be writ or be aith of his partie." Now, the question is whether reference can be made not only to the oath of the party but also to that of the manager of the party. I give no opinion as to what might occur in other classes of cases. In the present case the limitation of proof is purely statutory. The statute says "his party," that is, his adversary in the action, and we cannot allow reference to the oath of any one else. Mr Scott does not hold that position.

LORD DEAS.—I agree with your Lordship that on a proper construction of the Triennial Prescription Act the reference here proposed cannot be sustained. The only reference we can allow is to the oath of the trustees themselves. If that reference is made, a question may arise as to whether we are then confined to the depositions, or whether their effect depends on extrinsic facts which may competently be inquired into. The case of Cooper v. Hamilton, decided in the House of Lords March 14, 1826, 2 W. and S. 59, is instructive on that point. But as the question does not yet arise I need not say anything further upon it.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I have no difficulty in concurring with your Lordship. The triennial prescription is just a statutory limitation of proof to writ or oath of party, as the only kind of evidence whereby an account can be supported after the lapse of the years of prescription. By "party" I understand the person who is defender in the action,—the person on whom a claim is made,—and who will have to pay if it is sustained against him.

Some very delicate questions have arisen with regard to the ascertainment of

No. 57.

Dec. 19, 1874. Bertram & Co. v. Stewart's Trustees.

the meaning of an oath taken on reference. And even in the present case, assuming the defenders to be examined, there might arise some difficulty in construing their oaths. Whether other evidence might then be let in, in consequence of the nature of the depositions and to explain the terms of their oaths, is a question which we need not now consider. I do not at present see my way to admit such evidence. But it will be time enough to consider this question when it arises. In the meantime I agree with your Lordship that the only parties to whom reference can here be made are those who are the real defenders in the case, Mr Stewart's trustees, who will have to pay if the claim is sustained against them.

LORD MURE.—A reference to oath is proposed to be made in this case to a person who is not properly a defender, but only the defenders' manager, under a statute which expressly limits the creditor's proof to the "writ or oath of his party."

I have looked into all the cases referred to in support of this proposal, but I do not find any of them which sanction such a construction of the statute as would warrant its being acceded to. The case of Dickson v. Ker, 9 S. 125, where reference to the oath of a bank agent was sustained, appears at first sight to come very near the present. But this did not occur under the Triennial Prescription Act, but in an ordinary reference made in a suspension of a charge upon a bill to the oath of the bank agent who had discounted the bill, and who alone was cognisant of the matter in dispute.

On the other hand, the case of Duncan v. Forbes, referred to by the defenders, 7 S. p. 821, and 9 S. 540, and which was a case under the Act, appears to me to be directly negative of the pursuers' contention, for in it the Court refused to allow the deposition of a ship's-husband, to whom a reference had been made as one of the owners of the ship of which he was ship's-husband, to be used against the other owners, because he was not, as ship's-husband, the party in the sense of the statute to whom a reference could be made so as to bind the other joint owners.

I therefore agree that the trustees are the only parties here to whose oath this debt can be referred.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the said interlocutor: Refuse to sustain the reference contained in the minute, No. 10 of process: Find the defenders entitled to expenses since the date of the said interlocutor reclaimed against," &c.

PATRICK S. BEVERIDGE, S.S.C.—FERGUSON & JUNNER, W.S.—Agents.

No. 58.

Dec. 19, 1874. Brand's Trustees v. Brand's Trustees.

WILLIAM ROBERTSON AND OTHERS (Robert Brand senior's Trustees). Pursuers and Real Raisers.
JOHN BRAND AND OTHERS (Robert Brand junior's Trustees), Defenders and Claimants.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Mackintosh.
WILLIAM BAIN AND OTHERS (Alexander Brand's Trustees), Defenders and Claimants.—D.-F. Clark—Readman.

Heritable and Moveable — Principal and Accessory — Lease — Heir and Executor.—Held (rev. judgment of Lord Shand) that when the tenant of minerals under a lease of ordinary duration erects upon the land fixed machinery for the purpose of working the minerals, and dies during the currency of the lease, the machinery is to be considered as moveable in a question as to the tenant's succession.

No. 58.

Minor—Heritable and Moveable.—The rule that a minor cannot convey heritage does not apply to subjects which are merely heritable destinatione.

Observations on the case of Fisher v. Dixon, March 6, 1843, 5 D. 775, 15 Scot. Jur. 394; H. of L., June 26, 1845, 4 Bell's App. 286, 17 Scot. Jur. 568.

Dec. 19, 187
Brand's Tru tees v. Brand
Trustees.

2D DIVISION
Lord Shand.
R.

ROBERT BRAND senior, coalmaster, Wishaw, died on 26th January 1873 leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 7th January 1873. By this deed he left his whole means and estate, heritable and moveable, to trustees in trust for payment of certain legacies and annuities, and thereafter directed that the trustees should manage and preserve the whole residue of his estate, heritable and moveable, for the use and behoof of his only son, Robert Brand junior, until he attained majority, when the whole residue was to be conveyed over to him.

The truster's son, Robert Brand junior, who was a minor at the date of his father's death, only survived his father a few months, and died unmarried on 3d July 1873, without having attained majority. He had, however, on 28th June 1873 executed a trust-disposition and settlement, disposing of his whole means and estate to certain trustees.

Robert Brand junior was not served heir to his father.

The property of which Robert Brand senior died possessed consisted of upwards of £18,000 in deposit-receipts and other personal property, a nineteen years' lease of the coal and fire-clay on the estate of Coltness, of which eleven years still remained to run at his death, the plant and machinery used in connection with the coal-pits which he had opened in the course of the lease, including the rails laid down for the conveyance of the minerals, and also houses and properties of the annual value of about £400.

The nearest male relative of the deceased Robert Brand senior and Robert Brand junior, at the date of the death of the latter, was Alexander Brand, a miner in Wishaw, the immediate younger brother of Robert Brand senior. Alexander Brand completed a title by service as heir-at-law and of conquest to his brother, and heir-at-law to his nephew, and claimed the heritable property of Robert Brand senior, including the lease of the minerals on Coltness. Alexander Brand died on 5th November 1873 leaving a trust-disposition and settlement of his whole estate in favour of trustees.

The trust-settlement of Robert Brand junior having been executed by him in minority, and he having died without attaining majority, was ineffectual to convey heritage. The trustees of Robert Brand senior carried on the colliery after the deaths of Robert Brand senior and Robert Brand junior, with the concurrence of all parties interested, and realised considerable profit.

On 15th November 1873 the trustees of Robert Brand senior raised this action of multiplepoinding to have all the questions arising out of the succession of Robert Brand senior settled. The trustees of Robert Brand junior and of Alexander Brand both lodged condescendences and claims, as also did the beneficiaries under Robert Brand senior's trust-deed.

While the action was still pending, an agreement was entered into between the trustees of Robert Brand senior, of the first part, the trustees of Alexander Brand, of the second part, and the trustees of Robert Brand junior, of the third part, whereby on a narrative of the facts as above set forth, and on the basis that "Robert Brand junior had a vested interest in his father's heritable and moveable estate which he was entitled to test upon, except in so far as regards the heritage, but that certain questions have arisen between them as to whether certain portions thereof are heritable or moveable, and as to which trust has right to the rents and profits of the colliery which accrued subsequent to the death of the said Robert Brand senior, in regard to which they have been unable to agree," it was contracted and agreed (1) that the whole heritable property, including the mineral lease, should be made over to Alexander Brand's trustees; (2) that the residue of the moveable estate should be made over to Robert Brand junior's trustees; (3) that the profits of the colliery and the rents of the heritable property which had accrued in the interval between the death of Robert Brand senior and the death of Robert Brand junior should be consigned in bank until it should have been decided in the multiplepoinding who was entitled to them; (4) that Robert Brand senior's trustees be exonered and discharged; and (5) that the whole plant and machinery of the colliery be made over to Alexander Brand's trustees, on the condition that if it should be found in the multiplepoinding that any portion thereof was moveable, and, as such, belonged to Robert Brand junior's trustees, the value thereof should be paid to them by Alexander Brand's trustees according to a valuation by certain valuators therein appointed.

No. 58. Dec. 19, 1874. Brand's Trustees v. Brand's Trustees.

In the competition Alexander Brand's trustees claimed the whole heritable estate of the late Robert Brand senior or Robert Brand junior, including the colliery, plant, machinery, and equipment, except in so far as they might be held to be moveable, and also the whole profits from the colliery and rents of the heritable subjects from the date of Robert Brand senior's death, under deduction, if so found, of such sums as had been specially paid to or set apart for Robert Brand junior.

The trustees of Robert Brand junior claimed the profits and rents which had accrued in the interval between the deaths of Robert Brand senior and Robert Brand junior, and also the whole free residue of the moveable estate of Robert Brand senior, including in the moveable estate the colliery, plant, machinery, and equipment, except in so far as they might be found to be heritable.

The Lord Ordinary, on 28th March 1874, before answer, remitted to Mr John Geddes, mining engineer, Edinburgh, to report upon the precise nature, character, and construction of the machinery, &c., in dispute, and also to report all facts and circumstances which might appear to him to be material in connection with the machinery and the conflicting claims of the parties.

Mr Geddes's report bore:—"The lease is for nineteen years, and now about half run; but the working plan of the colliery instructs that two or three years will exhaust the coal let, when the tenant must remove. The proprietor has then a right, 'if he thinks proper, to take the whole engines, machinery, and apparatus connected with all or any of the pits or mines, according as the value may be ascertained by reference.'

"The lease permits a break in favour of the tenant every fifth year, on his giving six months' notice to the proprietor.

"The tenant's occupation of the subjects let has thus no permanency, while the machinery (all of iron) is necessarily so constructed as to be readily taken down in detail and erected elsewhere. There is nothing in the character of this colliery plant, or its application, to render it heritable, excepting the brickwork of the chimney and boiler seats; but these, at the termination of the lease, if required, must be left to the proprietor.

"In the present case, the machinery is not annexed to the ground by stone and lime, as appears was the case in the blowing-engines and heavy gear in Dixon v. Fisher.[1] Moreover, Dixon was owner of the land and iron-works and mineral field at Calder, and iron-making might then, as now, fairly be held to be a permanent industry in the country; but Brand

[1] Fisher v. Dixon, March 6, 1843, 5 D. 775, 15 Scot. Jur. 394; H. of L., June 26, 1845, 4 Bell's App. 286, 17 Scot. Jur. 568.

No. 58.

Dec. 19, 1874. Brand's Trustees v. Brand's Trustees.

is only lessee of a single seam of coal and accompanying fire-clay, the lease of which is near its termination, and the machinery erected by the late Mr Brand senior can be transferred at small expense to another locality; so that the ultimate disposing of it seems very much a case between proprietor and tenant at Greenhead.

"On the other hand, as this machinery is the means whereby the mineral lease has been profitable, and since the lease itself is heritable, so in the view of some should be the appropriate engines and apparatus erected thereon by the lessee for turning to good account the minerals embraced in the leasehold."

On 4th August 1874 the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor in the competition between Alexander Brand's trustees and Robert Brand junior's trustees:—"First, Finds that the claimants, the trustees of the late Robert Brand junior, have right to the profits of the colliery business which belonged to the late Robert Brand senior, and which was carried on by his trustees after his death; and have also right to the rents of the heritable property which belonged to the late Robert Brand senior; all for the period during which the said Robert Brand junior survived his father, the said Robert Brand senior, viz., from 26th January to 3d July, both in the year 1873: Second, In regard to the machinery and plant, including rails, which belonged to the deceased Robert Brand senior, and were used by him at or in connection with the colliery held on lease by him from Mr Houldsworth, finds that the machinery and plant, and those parts thereof, are heritable, and belong to the trustees of the late Alexander Brand, which were attached, either directly or indirectly, by being joined to what is attached to the ground for use in connection with the working and carrying away of the minerals, though they may have been fixed only in such a manner as to be capable of being removed, either in their entire state or after being taken to pieces, without material injury, including those loose articles which, though not physically attached to the fixed machinery and plant, are yet necessary for the working thereof, provided they be constructed and fitted so as to form parts of the particular machinery, and not to be equally capable of being applied in their existing state to other machinery of the kind; and appoints the case to be enrolled for further procedure; meantime reserves all questions of expenses, and grants leave to the trustees of the said Robert Brand junior, and also to the trustees of the said Alexander Brand, to reclaim against this judgment." *

* NOTE.—(After a narrative of the facts, and assigning as his principal reason for the first finding in the above interlocutor that Alexander Brand's trustees were, according to the true spirit of the agreement above quoted, precluded from maintaining that the heritable property had not vested, his Lordship proceeded): —"2. The next question for decision relates to the plant, machinery, and equipments which belonged to Mr Brand, and had been used by him at the colliery held in lease from Mr Houldsworth. It is maintained by the trustees of Alexander Brand that this machinery, or at least an important part of it, attached to the leasehold property, or specially fitted for the use of the colliery, was heritable, and in a question between heir and executor descended, with the right to the lease, to Alexander Brand, as having been served heir of his brother, or rather as heir of his nephew, whose deed of settlement was ineffectual in regard to heritage. The trustees of Robert Brand junior, in any view, claim the loose unattached implements, tools, and plant unattached to the leasehold property not specially destined and fitted for its use, and which might be readily removed and used at other works. To this extent their claim is not disputed, and an inventory of a number of such articles has been lodged, and is No. 31 of process.

"It is not said that this inventory is exhaustive of the class of articles just

No. 58.

Dec. 19, 1874. Brand's Trustees v. Brand's Trustees.

Both parties reclaimed, but at the hearing counsel for Alexander Brand's trustees offered no argument against the first finding of the Lord Ordinary.

---

referred to, but the parties state that, on the legal principle which is to determine their rights being settled by the Court, they may be able to arrange subordinate questions as to particular articles, and failing arrangement, a remit to a man of skill may yet be necessary. In the meantime, the report of Mr Geddes, No. 24 of process, may be referred to as shewing the general nature of the machinery and plant at the colliery. The more important articles are the steam-engines, gear, and appurtenances used for raising the minerals, and pumping water, boilers in connection with the engines, the weighing steelyards, pumps and pump-rods, and the railways and tram-road which were laid down by the late Mr Brand for the conveyance of the minerals from the pit-head, which alone are valued at £991.

"It is maintained by the trustees of Robert Brand junior that, as the whole plant and machinery just referred to was provided by the late Mr Robert Brand senior for the temporary use merely in his business carried on at the colliery, and was moveable in a question between him and the landlord, it is also moveable as between heir and executor, and therefore belongs to them as part of Mr Brand senior's personal estate.

"The only special provisions of the mineral lease which have a bearing on the question between the parties are, in the first place, the clause providing that although the endurance of the lease should be for nineteen years from 1865, that is, until 1884, yet the tenant should have breaks at Martinmas 1870, Martinmas 1875, and Martinmas 1880, provided six months' notice were given at any of these terms; and, secondly, that by article 26 of the general conditions of lease imported into the agreement between the parties, it is provided that the proprietor shall have right, if he thinks proper, 'to take the whole engines, machinery, and apparatus connected with all or any of the pits or mines according as the value may be ascertained' by reference, but subject to the proviso that the landlord shall not take a part merely of the machinery at any one pit.

"The claimants, the trustees of Robert Brand junior, maintain that the question raised in regard to the plant and machinery has been already decided in favour of the view contended for by them, that is, that machinery in such circumstances is moveable in a question of succession, by the leading case of Fisher v. Dixon, 6th March 1843, 5 D. 775, House of Lords, 26th June 1845, 4 Bell's App. 286.

"After giving my best consideration to the opinions of the Judges in the case of Fisher v. Dixon, and to the argument submitted for the parties, I have come to the conclusion that the question now raised has not been decided as the claimants, the trustees of Robert Brand junior, maintain, and that the weight of opinion in the case of Fisher v. Dixon, both in the Court of Session and in the House of Lords, was in favour of the view that plant and machinery of the kind here in question, attached or specially dedicated to the use of the leasehold property, is heritable, and goes with the lease in a question of succession between heir and executor; and I am further of opinion, holding the question to be still open for decision, that this is the sound view, and that the trustees of Alexander Brand have right to the machinery claimed by them.

"It is evident from a perusal of the reports of the case Fisher v. Dixon in this Court and in the House of Lords that the really important question between the parties related to the plant and machinery which, for the purposes of the trade or business of the collieries, Mr Dixon had put up and provided on heritable properties belonging to himself. It was a subordinate and comparatively unimportant question in its pecuniary results which arose in regard to the plant and machinery put up and provided at collieries of which he was the lessee only. Referring to the report of the case in the House of Lords, the fifth and sixth only of the properties there enumerated (4 Bell's App., 288 and 289), viz., Legbrannock and Balgrochan Coal Works, were held in lease by Mr Dixon, and the lease of the former contained a somewhat peculiar stipulation in regard to the machinery.

No. 58.

Dec. 19, 1874.

Brand's Trustees v. Brand's Trustees.

Argued for Robert Brand junior's trustees;—This was not properly a question between heir and executor. It was a question of heritable and moveable between a minor's heir-at-law and his mortis causa disponee.

"The trustees of Robert Brand junior found specially on the seventh head of the judgment of the Court as expressly deciding that machinery attached to the leasehold subjects was to be held to be moveable in a question of succession. The finding is in these terms:—'And with regard to the seventh class in the said report, erections made on subjects held under leases by the late Mr Dixon, and which have been removed by the respondents at the termination of the said leases, finds that these are moveable, and subject to the claim of legitim on the part of the claimants.' This finding unquestionably appears to decide the question as maintained by the claimants just mentioned, but I have become satisfied, from an examination of the report, in the first place, that the finding is directly contrary to the judgment of the majority of the Judges who gave opinions applicable to that branch of the case; and, secondly, that the true explanation of the finding is that it proceeded on the admission made by the defender, and mentioned thus in the report of the concluding opinions of the whole consulted Judges (5 D. 839), 'and further, in so far as regards such subjects under lease, on which the late Mr Dixon, being the tenant only, made erections which he was entitled to remove at the end of the lease, which the respondent also admits may be included in the executry, we are of opinion,' &c. This admission, which must have been the ground of the judgment when the expressed opinions of the majority of the Judges are kept in view, may probably be accounted for by the fact that the machinery to which it referred was of small value in comparison with the other machinery, which was the subject of dispute in the general question raised, and that the parties had thus apparently acted on the view that the machinery was moveable before the dispute between them had arisen, and the matter had been fully considered; for it appears from the seventh finding of the judgment of the Court that the machinery referred to had actually been removed by the representatives of Mr Dixon at the termination of the leases, and apparently without question.

"An examination of the report shews that five of the consulted Judges expressly stated their opinion to be, that the machinery on the leasehold subjects was heritable, and went to the heir with the leases, viz., Lords Cunningham, Gillies, Jeffrey, Fullerton, and Ivory. Four of the Judges, viz., Lords Cockburn, Mackenzie, and Moncreiff, and the Lord Justice-Clerk, seem to have expressed a different view. The opinions of the four last-mentioned learned Judges suggest observations which I think are of considerable weight as affecting the weight to be given to their opinions in the present question.

"In the first place, the concluding paragraph of the joint opinion of Lords Cockburn and Mackenzie, which deals with the question under consideration, does not profess to give a final decision on the point. The expression used is, 'We are scarcely in a situation to determine the result of this,' i.e., the erection of the machinery by Mr Dixon in the position of a tenant.

"Again, the conclusion on a certain assumption as to the terms of the agreement with the landlord is, 'So far as I can at present see, that machinery will ultimately belong to his executors.' The expression, 'will ultimately belong,' evidently conveys the meaning that the heir had right to the use at least of the machinery, and that even the right of property was not yet vested in the executors. If this be what is meant, it appears to me that an anomalous right, unlike any other legal right recognised by the law, must be held to exist in reference to the succession to fixed machinery erected by a tenant. I am unable, with much respect for those learned Judges, to recognise the existence of this peculiar right, and I think the special terms of the opinion are sufficient to shew that they had not formed a final judgment on the point, and were not prepared to affirm that the executors of Mr Dixon had an unconditional right of property in the machinery.

"In regard to the opinions of the two other learned Judges above mentioned, viz., the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Moncreiff, it is to be observed that they

No. 58. Between landlord and tenant of minerals the maxim "inædificatum solo solo cedit" is, by law, assumed not to apply. Things of this nature were tenant's fixtures,—the property of the tenant,—if so, they could not be proceed throughout entirely on the view that the machinery, whether erected on Mr Dixon's own property or on property leased by him, was alike moveable, because it had been put up for trade purposes only, and as that view was negatived, as a reason or ground of judgment, both by the Court of Session and by the House of Lords, the opinions of these Judges on the point now in question are deprived of the weight which otherwise they would have. It does not appear that they would necessarily have held that machinery erected on leasehold property was moveable, and did not devolve on the heir along with the lease, provided it had been previously decided that such machinery, erected by the proprietor on his own ground, was not moveable.

Dec. 19, 1874. Brand's Trustees v. Brand's Trustees.

"The three remaining Judges who gave opinions in the case,—the Lord President Boyle, Lord Murray, and Lord Wood (who was consulted only at the later stages),—reserved their opinions on the point now under consideration, while Lord Meadowbank and Lord Medwyn merely concurred with the consulted Judges. This concurrence cannot be readily understood, seeing that there was a distinct difference of opinion amongst these Judges on the matter now in question. It can, I think, only be explained in the view that the really important question between the parties related to the machinery which Mr Dixon had put up on his own property, or otherwise, that the concurrence was with the majority of the consulted Judges, in which case these opinions were given in favour of the view that the machinery on the leasehold property was heritable.

"The result of this examination of the case, as reported, is that at least five of the Judges held the machinery on the leasehold property to be heritable; that while four took a different view, they were not agreed in holding that the executors' right was one of unqualified property, and the grounds of the opinions of two of their number, at least the main grounds of their opinions, were finally held to he unsound; that three of the Judges reserved their opinions; and that the remaining two, Lords Meadowbank and Medwyn, may be taken either to have concurred with the majority or not to have expressed any opinion on the point.

"It is difficult to gather from the report of the case in the House of Lords whether the question was directly raised in regard to the machinery on the leasehold property, and how far it was discussed. The opinions of Lord Campbell and Lord Brougham, who alone referred to this matter, seem to have been entirely in accordance with the view of the majority of the Judges in the Court of Session, as above explained, for (report, p. 366), Lord Campbell observed, 'a distinction was attempted to be made between leasehold and freehold, but when we bear in mind that by the law of Scotland the leasehold is realty, and that it goes to the heir, the distinction entirely fails;' and Lord Brougham concurred in this view.

"It thus appears that the terms of the judgment in the case of Fisher v. Dixon are to be explained by the admission made by one of the parties, and that the weight of judicial opinion is strongly in favour of the view that no sound distinction can be drawn between the case of machinery erected by a person on ground belonging to himself and machinery erected on ground merely leased by him.

"In the case of Syme v. Harvey, 14th December 1861, 24 D. 202, Lord Ivory and Lord Curriehill referred to the seventh finding of the interlocutor in the case of Fisher v. Dixon as if it had embodied the judgment of the Court on the principle which that finding involved, but I am satisfied from my examination of the reports, and on the grounds I have stated, that this view is incorrect.

"And when the question has now arisen for decision, I am of opinion that machinery of the kind now in question erected by a tenant on property held under lease, is heritable in a question of succession. The ground on which it has been decided that machinery erected by a proprietor on his own estate is heritable in the tenant. They were not annexed to any property of the tenant. At best, they could only be heritable destinatione.[1] If the landlord here had claimed this machinery, both the present parties would have heritable and descends to his heir is that he has attached the machinery to the ground, or acquired machinery specially suitable for the perpetual and continual use of the particular property, and that the property being heritable, the machinery as an accessory partakes of the same character. The same principle applies to machinery erected on leasehold subjects. The principal subject, viz., the lease, is heritable, although it be of temporary duration, and the machinery, being an accessory to this principal subject, becomes heritable also. It seems to me to be of no consequence that the machinery is put up for a temporary purpose only. It is placed there for the full term of the endurance of the heritable right, as well as for the use and benefit of the subject of that right. The crop and stocking on a farm, held under a lease, is in a totally different position, for it is necessarily of a fluctuating character, not only moveable in its nature, but intended to be disposed of and changed from time to time. Such subjects as crop and stocking partake more of the character of those loose articles, like tools, furniture, and the like, which have no special attachment to a particular property, either by being fixed to it or by destination. Engines, pumps, railways, and other plant and machinery which are specially fixed or destined for the use of the particular leasehold property are rather to be compared with such a subject as an agricultural mill or other fixed erection put up by the tenant of a farm attached to the ground for the use of the subject, and which, though moveable in a question with the landlord, I should regard as heritable, descending to the heir, and, not like the crop and stocking of a farm, going to the executor.

No. 58.

Dec. 19, 1874. Brand's Trustees v. Brand's Trustees.

"The specialties in the lease of the colliery held by Mr Brand, already noticed, do not appear to me to introduce any element which takes the case out of the general rule. Although there are breaks in the lease in favour of the tenant, the lease nevertheless remains heritable as long as it endures, and the accessories must have the same character. The fact that the landlord has a right to purchase the machinery at the end of the lease, and that if he fails to do so the tenant may sell it, appears to me to be also immaterial. If the landlord should exercise the option in the lease terminating in the tenant's lifetime, no doubt the proceeds would be an addition to the tenant's personal estate. Indeed, as between landlord and tenant, there is no doubt that the machinery is moveable, subject to the landlord's right of purchase, but as between heir and executor, the machinery being an accessory of the lease, the landlord's right to purchase cannot, I think, affect the question between heir and executor. The person from whom he must purchase after the tenant's death must be the heir.

"The case of a long lease having only, it may be, a single year to run, has been put as an illustration of the hardship that executors may suffer where machinery has been put up by the lessee at great expense, and the proceeds would soon have fallen into the personal estate of the deceased; but the same principle must be applied in all cases, and it would be extremely hard on the heir-at-law, in taking up a nineteen years' lease in its first year, that the executor should have the power of dismantling the whole colliery, provided the landlord had no right by contract to retain it, or did not insist on the right he had. The right to exercise this power appears to be the only alternative to the view that the machinery descends to the heir; for, although equitable considerations might point to a middle course by which the heir should have the use of the machinery for a recompense, while it belongs in property to the executors, as being most expedient and reasonable, and while legislation to that effect might be proper and beneficial, there is, I think, no sound principle for holding that an arrangement to this effect can be compelled in the existing state of the law. It may be observed that the hardship to those who are interested in the moveable estate of the tenant is limited to the case in which the tenant has been the sole person carrying on the colliery business; for, in the case of a company, which [1] Supra, p. 260, note.

No. 58.

Dec. 19, 1874. Brand's Trustees v. Brand's Trustees.

disputed his claim, and rightly,—and when they had succeeded, on the ground that it was personal property and not heritable, then the trustees of the heir-at-law would have had to turn round and say it was heritable after all. The argument for the heir-at-law must go the length that because a tenant brings things to the subject he leases, with the view of using them in connection with his lease, they go to his heir as an accessory of the lease. The point in dispute was decided in terminis in Fisher v. Dixon.[1] Trade fixtures must necessarily be part of the moveable estate of the tenant, because it is on that ground alone that they do not go to the landlord. Whenever a subject was moveable between landlord and tenant it was moveable quoad omnia. The partly or partially expressed will of the father could not affect the character of this machinery, because whenever he died it became inoperative. There was no destination of these articles. Even supposing that these articles were capable of being made heritable destinatione, that did not prevent the owner from retaining them as moveable. They were moveable sua natura, and all the actings of the testator were indicative of his wish to exclude the heir as far as possible.

Argued for Alexander Brand's trustees;—There was no distinction in a question such as this, as to whether the articles claimed were attached to freehold or leasehold property. Machinery went to an heir because it was part of the lease which went to the heir as matter of course. A lease was of the same essential nature as a feu. It was a right in land, and so could be a principal subject, and the machinery, being accessory to it, went along with it. It was not laid down in Fisher v. Dixon (supra) that moveables could not become accessory to a lease so as to descend to an heir. Leases of minerals were not to be confounded with leases of agricultural subjects. A mineral lease actually amounted to a sale of a portion of the estate; it could not be enjoyed without the destruction of the subject. In such a case a mineral tenant came into a landlord's place in a very different position from an agricultural tenant. His was not a right of use, it was a right of consumption, which was a far higher right. The fittings in a colliery were part of the lease. They were provided for the same purpose as that for which the lease was taken, and intended clearly, as in this case, to be used permanently till the subject was exhausted. Where the purpose of an erection was for the enjoyment of the estate permanently, and not for trade purposes, it clearly passed to the heir.

At advising,—

Lord Gifford.—In this case two separate questions have been decided by the Lord Ordinary in the interlocutor now under review. The first question relates to the profits of the colliery business which belonged to the late Robert Brand senior, accruing for the period between the death of Robert Brand senior and the death of his son Robert Brand junior, and to the rents of heritable property applicable to the same period. On this question the Lord Ordinary occurs most frequently,—in fact, the lease and machinery as part of the company's stock in trade, or the value of these, would form part of the personal estate of the partners of the company.

---

"The law of England does not afford any assistance in the decision of the present question, for leasehold property is, in England, moveable estate in a question of succession,—a distinction between the law of the two countries noticed by Lord Campbell in the passage of his opinion in the case of Fisher v. Dixon already noticed."

[1] Supra, p. 260, note; and Syme v. Harvey, Dec. 14, 1861, 24 D. 202, 34 Scot. Jur. 98.

has found that these profits and rents belong to the trustees of Robert Brand junior.

No. 58.

Dec. 19, 1874. Brand's Trustees v. Brand's Trustees.

On this first question no argument has been submitted to us for the reclaimers. They virtually admitted that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary could not be impugned, and tacitly intimated their acquiescence therein. Nor do I wonder at this, for I see no answer to the reasons given by the Lord Ordinary in support of his first finding. They seem to me quite conclusive. In regard to the first finding, therefore, the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor must be affirmed.

The second question decided by the Lord Ordinary, however, was the subject of a very able and instructive argument at the bar. It raises a point of very great interest and importance, and on this we are now called upon to give judgment.

The question, which is one of very general application, may be stated thus: When the tenant of minerals under a lease of ordinary duration (in the present case nineteen years) erects upon the land fixed machinery for the purpose of working and winning the minerals, and dies during the currency of the lease, does the fixed machinery belong to the tenant's heir or to his executor? I purposely put the question in its most general form, for although, in the present case, there are one or two specialties—to one of which I will presently advert,—I think the general question is fairly and necessarily raised for decision.

The Lord Ordinary has decided the question in favour of the heir and against the executor—holding that the trade fixtures erected by the late Robert Brand senior for working and winning the coal let to him by Mr Houldsworth, although undoubtedly moveable in a question between him and the landlord, are yet heritable in a question of the tenant's succession, and descend to the tenant's heir and not to his executor. This judgment the Lord Ordinary has supported in an exceedingly able and ingenious note, in which he contends, first, that the question has not been decided by any previous case, and, in particular, that it was not decided in the leading case of Fisher v. Dixon, either in this Court or in the House of Lords; and, second, that assuming the question to be open, the weight of authority, as well as sound reason and analogy, favour the pleas of the heir and negative those of the executor.

After giving the question the fullest and best consideration in my power, I have found myself compelled, with the utmost deference to the Lord Ordinary, and not insensible to the force and cogency of the arguments he has used, to come to the opposite opinion from that at which he has arrived, and I have come to think, and latterly without much difficulty, that the tenant's trade fixtures at the colliery in question, moveable in a question with the landlord, are also moveable as to the tenant's succession,—that is, in a question between his heir and executor.

I need not detain your Lordships with stating the facts and circumstances in which the question arises. As to these there is no dispute whatever between the parties. Omitting, then, for the present, all specialties, I proceed to state very shortly the grounds upon which I am of opinion that the trade fixtures erected by the late Robert Brand senior in connection with the coal leased to him were moveable in his person, moveable in the persons of his testamentary trustees, and of Robert Brand junior, his son and the beneficiary under the trust, and as moveable were carried by the trust-deed of Robert Brand junior, and now belong to the claimants, his trustees.

No. 58.

Dec. 19, 1874. Brand's Trustees v. Brand's Trustees.

(1) First, I am of opinion that the point was really decided in terminis by the judgment in the case of Fisher v. Dixon, 5 D. 775, 4 Bell's App., H. L. 286—if not in the House of Lords, where perhaps it could only have been raised by a cross appeal, at all events in the Court of Session by a majority of the whole Court.

It is quite true that the principal subjects in dispute in Fisher v. Dixon were fixtures which had been placed by Mr Dixon for mineral purposes on lands belonging to himself in absolute property, and the fixtures placed by him on subjects of which he was only tenant seem to have been of much smaller value. Still the question as to whether tenant's trade fixtures—trade fixtures placed by Mr Dixon on subjects of which he was only mineral tenant—was distinctly raised as well as the more important one. These "tenant's fixtures" form the subject of what is called the 7th class in Mr Smith's report, and they are separately dealt with both in the opinions of the Judges and in the final judgment. The final interlocutor in the Court of Session, which bears to be pronounced "in conformity with the opinion of the majority of the whole Judges," is, in so far as relates to fixtures on leasehold subjects, in these terms:—"And with regard to the 7th class in the said report, erections made on subjects under leases by the late Mr Dixon, and which have been removed by the representatives at the termination of the said leases, Find that these are moveable, and subject to the claim of legitim on the part of the claimants, and decern." These are the words of the final interlocutor, and it seems impossible to dispute that they precisely and pointedly dispose of the question as to fixtures—trade fixtures—erected by a tenant for trade purposes on subjects to which he had only a leasehold right.

Accordingly, in the subsequent case of Syme v. Harvey, 24 D. 202, the judgment is so dealt with. Lord Ivory, who was one of the consulted Judges in Fisher v. Dixon, says (p. 211)—"It is evident, upon looking at the report of Fisher v. Dixon in the House of Lords, that that case was decided not upon the principles which regulate the law of landlord and tenant, but upon those which regulate the law of heir and executor. This is abundantly evident from the opinions of Lords Brougham and Cottenham. There was, however, one small branch of this case where the property was held by Mr Dixon on lease, and there effect was given to the interests of the tenant, and a distinction drawn between the principles which were to regulate it and those which were to regulate the case generally." And this view is concurred in and further explained by Lord Curriehill. If I mistake not, Fisher v. Dixon has been often used as an express authority upon the very point now in question.

But the Lord Ordinary very ingeniously argues that although the words of the judgment in Fisher v. Dixon appear to decide the question at issue, it does not really do so, for he has satisfied himself that "the finding is directly contrary to the judgment of the majority of the Judges who gave opinions applicable to that branch of the case," and he thinks that the explanation of the finding is that it proceeded on an admission of the defender. Now, with great submission to the Lord Ordinary, I think he is in error on both points. First, I think a close scrutiny of the opinions of all the Judges shew that a majority were of opinion that the tenant's trade fixtures were moveable in a question with the landlord, and were also moveable in a question relating to the tenant's succession. I count the Judges thus,—Lords Cockburn, Mackenzie, Jeffrey, Ivory, Meadowbank, Medwyn, Moncreiff, and Justice-Clerk Hope—eight Judges,—held that the tenant's trade fixtures were moveable in a claim of legitim against the tenant's estate. Lords Cunningham, Gillies, and Fullerton—three Judges,—held these fixtures heritable, while Lord President Boyle and Lord Murray held the point doubtful, and gave no opinion. The Lord Ordinary is in error in thinking that Lords Jeffrey and Ivory held the fixtures on the leasehold subject heritable. On the contrary, they both "concur entirely in the opinion of Lord Cockburn," except as to a special point relating to the favour due to trade. They make no exception as to the tenant's trade fixtures on his leasehold subjects. It is true that Lord Cockburn, concurred in by Lord Mackenzie, speaks of these fixtures as being "ultimately" the property of the executors, as if there was some interim right in the heir during the lease, but this question did not arise, and I concur with the Lord Ordinary that there is no ground for such an anomalous right in the heir as a right temporarily to possess a part of the executry. Then, as to Lords Meadowbank and Medwyn, it is true they only concur with the consulted Judges without expressly noticing this question, but this must mean that they concur with the majority of the consulted Judges on the point, and counting Lords Ivory and Jeffrey the majority of the consulted Judges were for the moveable character of the tenant's trade fixtures.

No. 58.
Dec. 19, 1874.
Brand's Trustees v. Brand's Trustees.

Then, as to the supposed admission by the defender in Fisher v. Dixon, I can find no trace of such admission, and looking to the character of the litigation it seems very unlikely that any such admission was given. But even if there had been an admission, it must have been an admission in point of law, for there was no dispute about any facts regarding the leases, and an admission in point of law can only have been made at the bar when it was found impossible to maintain the contrary proposition. But in actually deciding a point of law the Court never do so on mere admissions of counsel at the bar, and accordingly the judgment bears to proceed not on admission, but in conformity with the opinions of the whole Judges, and this seems to me to have been the fact.

This judgment was affirmed in the House of Lords, but it is perfectly true that the decision on the point in question, having been in favour of the appellant, could not be reviewed without a cross appeal. The observation of Lord Campbell, that in Scotland leasehold property is realty, seems certainly to suggest that he was putting fixtures on leasehold subjects in the same category with fixtures on freehold subjects, but most certainly this question was not before the House.

I am of opinion, therefore, that the question I am now considering has been decided as authoritatively as any question can possibly be decided in Scotland, by a majority of the whole Court.

(2) Second, But even if the question were quite open and undecided, I am of opinion that the fixtures in dispute were in law moveable in the succession of the tenant Robert Brand senior and of his son Robert Brand junior.

I take it to be perfectly fixed law, and it was not disputed on either side of the bar, that in leases of ordinary duration, where the tenant erects fixtures solely for the purposes of his trade, these trade fixtures remain his property, and cannot be claimed by the landlord as partes soli, as it is said they are moveable in a question between landlord and tenant. Syme v. Harvey and other cases are illustrations of the application of this principle.

Now, it humbly appears to me that if trade fixtures do not go to the landlord they must of necessity remain the moveable property of the tenant, and must remain moveable quoad omnia. The only thing that can make them heritable is their fixture,—their annexation to the soil; but that would carry them to the landlord to whom alone the soil belongs. If the fixture have not this effect, and this is conceded, it is difficult to see how it can make them heritable to any effect at all. The tenant could remove the fixtures at pleasure. He could convey them by assignation and without dispositive words, which until recently were necessary in the conveyance of heritage. The tenant could bequeath them by will or testament separate from the mineral lease. I think also that they could be sequestrated under the landlord's hypothec, or poinded by the tenant's creditors. Adjudication would not be the habile diligence to attach a tenant's trade fixtures of which he had the absolute power of disposal, and over which the landlord had no right.

No. 58.

Dec. 19, 1874. Brand's Trustees v. Brand's Trustees.

Now, if the fixtures in dispute are moveable in all these respects, why should they be considered heritable in a question as to the tenant's succession? The answer relied on seems to be, that although not fixed to the soil so as to go with it to the landlord, they are fixed to the lease so as to go with it to the tenant's heir. But a lease is an incorporeal right, and it is difficult to follow what is meant by fixture to a lease. Fixture to the subject of a lease is not the same as fixture to or incorporation with the lease itself. The fixture may be for the most temporary purpose, and without the least reference to the duration of the lease or to its destination.

The idea seems to be that fixture to the subject of the lease indicates an intention that the machinery shall go with the lease, and so it is suggested that the machinery, though not heritable sua natura, has become heritable destinatione because of its dedication by the tenant.

Now, this view is plausible, and the argument has some force. If a proprietor by annexing machinery to his own heritable property sends it with that property to his heir,—so may not a tenant, by annexing machinery to his lease, or to the subject of his lease, send such machinery with the lease to his heir? But I think there are conclusive answers. In the first place, if the destination or dedication by the tenant is all that can be relied on,—and on this branch of the argument there can be nothing more,—then the tenant's destination would be equally applicable to unfixed machinery as to the fixed. There would be no room for distinction,—the waggons and rolling stock are as much dedicated to the colliery as the rails are,—and a locomotive may be as necessary for the successful working as a fixed engine. But no one presses destination this length, and yet, if it is worth anything, it must logically reach the whole plant.

Precisely the same argument would carry a whole farm stocking and implements to the heir along with the lease of an ordinary farm. But I need not say that such a claim has never been dreamt of.

The truth is that the destination of the tenant has really nothing whatever to do with the present case, and there is no room in the present case for the application of the principle that a proprietor of moveable subjects may, in a question as to his own succession, make them heritable destinatione.

And this leads me to notice one of the specialties of the present case,—that there is here no intestacy, no question of intestate succession, or of presumed will or implied destination by the deceased. Both Robert Brand senior and Robert Brand junior died testate. Robert Brand senior expressly conveyed everything he had, heritable and moveable, to his trustees for behoof of his son and his son, Robert Brand junior, expressly conveyed everything he had or could give to his trustees. The competing claimant, Alexander Brand, and his trustees

No. 58

Dec. 19, 18
Brand's Tr ees v. Bra
Trustees.

can only claim as heir-at-law what was not carried by Robert Brand junior's deed. Implied destination must always yield to expressed will, and a thing heritable, not sua natura, but merely destinatione, will not go to the heir if the absolute proprietor expressly says it shall not go to his heir but to his trustees. Now, this is the case here. The destination or implied wills of Robert Brand senior or of Robert Brand junior are out of the question, for we have the express will of both of them, and both exclude the competing claimant Alexander Brand. Accordingly, if the element of destination must be laid out of view, as, I think, it must, and if the machinery in question is not heritable sua natura, then it must be held as moveable quoad omnia, and the property of the trustees of Robert Brand junior.

Still farther, and upon the same specialty which I have now pointed out, I am of opinion that, even if it should be held that the fixed machinery was heritable in a question as to the tenant's intestate succession, still it was effectively carried by the trust-deed of Robert Brand junior.

No doubt Robert Brand junior died in minority, and a minor cannot, mortis causa, convey his heritable estate; but this only applies to proper heritage,—that is, to subjects heritable sua natura. It does not extend to what is heritable merely destinatione. For example, to take a well-known case,—loose stones intended for a building in progress, and brought to and laid down on the ground beside it, but not yet built into it, are heritable destinatione, if the proprietor dies while his building lies unfinished. But this is a mere presumption, and if the proprietor had expressly bequeathed the loose stones to his executor or to a third party, his heir-at-law could not claim them: presumption must yield to fact.

Robert Brand junior, though a minor, might have separated the fixed machinery in question, and sold it, or carried it elsewhere (I mean, apart from the provision of his father's trust), and if so, I think he could bequeath it by testament. He has actually done so to the claimants, his trustees. If this last view is sound it would by itself suffice for the determination of the case. But, while I go upon both grounds I prefer to rest my judgment mainly upon general doctrine, which I think is fixed by Fisher v. Dixon, that a mere tenant's trade fixtures, in an ordinary case, are moveable quoad succession, and descend to his executors.

I am of opinion, therefore, that the second finding of the Lord Ordinary should be recalled, and that the whole machinery in use at the colliery, whether fixed or unfixed, should be held to be moveable, and belong to the trustees of the late Robert Brand junior.

As under the agreement between the claimants the machinery is to be taken by Alexander Brand's trustees, and only its value paid to Robert Brand junior's trustees, if the parties are agreed as to the value and as to the amount of profits and of rents the case may now be exhausted.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK, LORD NEAVES, and LORD ORMIDALE concurred.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall the second finding of said interlocutor, and in lieu thereof find that all the machinery therein referred to is to be considered as moveable in a question as to the tenant's succession: Quoad ultra adhere to the said interlocutor, and remit the cause to the Lord Ordinary to proceed with the same: Find the claimants, Alexander Brand's

No. 58.

Dec. 19, 1874. Brand's Trustees v. Brand's Trustees.

trustees, liable in expenses since the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and decern, and remit the expenses now found due to the Auditor to tax the same, and report."

EBENEZER MILL, S.S.C.—ALEXANDER MORISON, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 59.

Jan. 7, 1875. Henderson v. Wallace.

JAMES HENDERSON, Pursuer.—Mackintosh—Henderson.
ROBERT WALLACE AND OTHERS, Defenders.—Lee—Strachan.

Poinding the Ground—Maills and Duties—Heritable Creditor—Right in Security.—A creditor who, under a bond and disposition in security, has obtained a decree of maills and duties, is not in possession of the lands as proprietor, so as to render it incompetent for him to bring an action of poinding the ground.

1ST DIVISION. Ld. Craighill. M.

MR HENDERSON of Bilbster was in right of a bond and disposition in security over certain subjects in Lybster, the property of Robert Wallace and his wife, to which bond both Wallace and his wife were parties. In the year 1866 Mr Henderson raised an action of maills and duties under his bond, in which he obtained decree, and under this decree he drew various sums of rent from Wallace's tenant of the subjects. In April 1874 Mr Henderson raised this action of poinding of the ground against Mr and Mrs Wallace and their tenant, as regarded the latter to the extent of the amount of rent due only.

Mr and Mrs Wallace lodged defences, in which they stated that the action was unnecessary and oppressive, and also that Mr Henderson had been in possession of the subjects in right of his decree of maills and duties since 1866.

Pleaded for the defenders;—(1) The pursuer, being in possession of the subjects under a decree of maills and duties, the present action of poinding the ground is incompetent, and cannot be maintained. (2) The pursuer having the right and title under his decree of maills and duties to the rent payable by the tenant, which is the only extent to which, in the present case, a decree of poinding the ground, were it otherwise competent, could be enforced, he is not entitled to raise or insist in this action. (3) The pursuer having regularly obtained payment under his decree of maills and duties of the whole rents of the said subjects since the date thereof, and being entitled under that decree to uplift and enforce payment of the rents to become payable, the present action is unnecessary and oppressive, and ought to be dismissed, with expenses.

Lord Mure, before whom the case first came, on 17th June 1874 repelled hoc statu the plea of competency, and before further answer allowed both parties a proof of their averments.*

* His Lordship added this note :—"This is an action of poinding of the ground, proceeding upon a bond and disposition in security, and it is directed against the proprietor and tenants of the ground in the usual style, with a view to obtain authority to attach and poind the moveable goods and effects situated upon the ground, and belonging to the proprietor and his tenants, in payment of the pursuer's debt. It was explained at the debate that one main object which the pursuer had in resorting to the action was in order to lead an adjudication, which, seeing that one of the debtors in the bond was a married woman, could not be done except upon a poinding of the ground; and the authorities referred to by the pursuer appear to the Lord Ordinary to be distinct to that effect. In this view, therefore, the action is, in the circumstances, a necessary one at the instance of the pursuer. The tenants, moreover, have not appeared to defend it, and have probably no material interest to do so, as the conclusions against them are re-

No. 59.

Jan. 7, 1875.
Henderson v. Wallace.

When the day appointed for the proof arrived both parties renounced probation, and after a debate Lord Craighill, before whom the cause then depended, pronounced this interlocutor :—"Repels the defences, and decerns and ordains in terms of the conclusions of the summons: Finds the pursuer entitled to expenses, of which allows an account to be given in," &c.*

---

stricted to the amount of the rents, and as against them the pursuer is, it is thought, at present entitled to decree—Buchan, 20th January 1829, 7 Shaw, 296.

"The competency of the action is, however, objected to on the part of the proprietors, the debtors in the bond, because the pursuer has obtained decree in an action of maills and duties, under which it is alleged that he has entered into actual possession of the property, and authorities were referred to, and more particularly a passage in Erak. iv., 1, 11, as shewing that such actions were not competent to an heritable creditor in possession. But the allegation that the pursuer was in the actual possession of the property, and that there were no moveable effects belonging to the defender situated upon it, is denied on the part of the pursuer, so that the simple question raised for decision at this stage of the case is, whether an heritable creditor who has taken decree against the debtor's tenants in a petitory action of maills and duties is thereby precluded from taking proceedings, by way of a poinding of the ground, against the proprietor, the debtor in the bond, in order to attach his effects in payment of his debts. Now, the Lord Ordinary has been unable to come to the conclusion that there is any incompetency in such a proceeding; for the object of the one action is to obtain a remedy against the tenants, while that of the other is to attach the effects of the landlord, and, if necessary, those of the tenants, to the extent of the rents due by them, as explained by Lord Corehouse in his note to the case of Railton, June 20, 1834, referred to at the debate; and the Lord Ordinary has not been able to find any decision to the effect that the heritable creditor who has adopted the one remedy is thereby precluded from having recourse to the other.

"Cases may, it is thought, not unfrequently occur where an heritable creditor may find it necessary to proceed against tenants by an action of maills and duties; but where it is not at that time necessary, although it may afterwards become so, to take proceedings by poinding of the ground against the landlord, and although Mr Erskine's words are very general, the Lord Ordinary does not think that they must necessarily be held to imply that, in such circumstances, the effects of the proprietor situated upon the property could not be reached under a process of poinding of the ground at the instance of the party holding the decree of maills and duties against the tenants. No doubt as to this was raised in the case of Railton, and as the Lord Ordinary does not find that any such rule is laid down either by Lord Stair, or by Mr Erskine in his Principles, or by Mr Bell's Comrs., ii., pp. 58-59, he is not, as at present advised, prepared to give effect to it to the extent now pleaded by the defenders. But he has made the proof as to the facts on which the parties are at issue one before answer, so that it may still be open to the defenders to raise the question if it should be ascertained that the pursuer is in the actual possession of the property, and that there are no effects belonging to the defenders upon it."

* "NOTE.—This is an action of poinding the ground, and the question raised in the defences is—Whether, in the circumstances, such an action is competent?

"The pursuer is creditor in a bond and disposition in security over land and houses belonging to the defenders, Mr and Mrs Wallace, in which he has been infeft. The subjects forming the security are in the tenancy and occupation of Alexander Bruce, the defender, who has not appeared in the action; and the pursuer has taken decree in a petitory action of maills and duties, in virtue of which the rents payable by Bruce have for several years been drawn by the pursuer. The defenders, Mr and Mrs Wallace, contend that this is such possession on the part of the pursuer as renders a poinding of the ground at his instance an incompetent proceeding. That is the defence, and the only defence, to the present action.

No. 59.
Jan. 7, 1875.
Henderson v. Wallace.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—Erskine and the other institutional writers had distinctly laid it down that no one in the possession

"After considering all that has been urged, the Lord Ordinary has come to be of opinion that the plea of incompetency should be repelled, and decree pronounced in terms of the conclusions of the summons. He adopts the views presented by Lord Mure, the former Lord Ordinary, in the note to his interlocutor of 17th June last, by which proof was allowed; and these, taken in connection with the observations about to be submitted, seem to be all that are required to explain the grounds of the prefixed interlocutor.

"The authorities which were cited by the defenders in support of their contention that the action is incompetent were Erskine's Institutes, b. iv., t. 1, sec. 11; More's Notes, p. 211; Menzies' Lectures (3d ed.) p. 877; Montgomerie Bell's Lectures, p. 1099; Ross' Lectures, p. 430; and Garthland v. Lord Jedburgh (Mor. 10,545-46). These may all be taken together, for the statement of the law by Erskine is rested on the decision in Garthland v. Lord Jedburgh, and the later writers named, and simply adopt and repeat in substance the dictum of Erskine. The controversy at the debate turned upon the meaning of the passages founded on, and not on the credit to which these authorities were entitled.

"The law laid down in Garthland v. Lord Jedburgh, and in the works of the text writers cited by the defenders, is, that it is incompetent for real creditors, who are possessors of the subjects conveyed, as security for their debts, to poind the ground, and therefore it is necessary to inquire whether a party in the situation of the pursuer is to be regarded as a real creditor in possession. That he is a real creditor is certain, for he is infeft in the lands which are the security for his debt. But is he in possession? That is to say, have the defenders, the proprietors gone out or been put out; and has the pursuer entered in their room? The Lord Ordinary thinks that such a result was not accomplished by the taking of decree in a petitory action of maills and duties and the subsequent receipt of rents from the tenant of the subjects in virtue of that warrant. The statement in Professor Montgomerie Bell's Lectures, vol. ii., at p. 1075, he takes to be correct. What is there said is, that the 'creditor thereby comes for the time in the place of the landlord as regards the tenants. But his right being only in security, the landlord's right as proprietor is only encumbered, not taken away, by the debt and security.' The creditor, in other words, does not even in form become the landlord. He neither appears nor possesses nor acts as such. The tenants continue the tenants of the debtor; and all which the creditor gets is a power to levy the rents as these become due, in payment pro tanto of his debt secured upon the land. Accordingly, by the decrees of maills and duties which the pursuer obtained, all that he got was a decerniture whereby the tenant, Alexander Bruce, was ordained 'to make payment to the pursuer of the rents, maills, and duties of the foresaid lands,' &c., 'and that during his possession,' &c. &c., 'at least so much of the said rents as will satisfy and pay the pursuer the principal sum,' &c., 'due under the bond' upon which the pursuer libelled. The right and the possession which the Court, in Garthland v. Lord Jedburgh (Mor. 10,545-46), found to be incompatible with the pursuit of a poinding of the ground were in marked contrast with those held by the present pursuer. In that case a person had wadset his lands, and taken a back-tack of them, binding himself to pay to the wadsetter a yearly rent equal to the interest of the sum borrowed. The wadsetter, considering himself a creditor, brought an action for payment of the back tack-duty, and added a conclusion for poinding the ground in time coming. This was refused, 'because the pursuer, being infeft in the property, could not ask his own ground to be poinded for any sum due to him out of the said lands.' This means no more than that a poinding of the ground may not be pursued by one whose connection with the subject, according to his title, is that of proprietor, subject though he be to an obligation to reconvey on fulfilment of a condition, and there is nothing in the decision which suggests that a creditor in the situation of the pursuer is affected by a similar incompetency. Erskine's statement (iv. 1, 11), as understood by the Lord Ordinary, means no more than was expressed in the decision of Garth-

No. 59.
Jan. 7, 1875.
Henderson v. Wallace.

of heritage could use a poinding of the ground,[1] and the pursuer here was in possession of these subjects in virtue of his decree of maills and duties, and was precluded from using this diligence. Poinding of the ground was the appropriate diligence when the debtor, the real owner, was in possession of the lands; but when the lands were let the proper diligence was maills and duties, and that diligence had already been used by the pursuer, so he was not entitled to use the other. A creditor could have no higher possession of lands than by holding a decree of maills and duties, so this diligence was unnecessary and incompetent. A decree of maills and duties conferred the civil possession of the subjects upon the creditor, and he was entitled to exercise all the rights of the proprietor.[2] Moreover, this action was oppressive, the pursuer being only desirous of molesting his debtors, and knowing that he could gain nothing by it.

Argued for the pursuer;—The pursuer had a legitimate interest in raising the action. One effect of a decree of poinding the ground was to enable a creditor to accumulate arrears of interest;[3] another was to give a preference to the poinding creditor over the landlord's moveables.[4] It was also stated to be a necessary step before an adjudication could be led on a personal obligation by a wife, as in this case.[5]

The action was perfectly competent, notwithstanding that the pursuer held a decree of maills and duties. The possession under such a decree was not possession of the nature referred to by Erskine and the other text writers. The two diligences were quite distinct, and could be used simulland v. Lord Jedburgh, which he cites as his authority. Those to whom, as he says, a poinding of the ground is incompetent, are proprietors-possessors, though not strictly proprietors as adjudgers, liferenters, or other real creditors, who possess on their different titles. But a creditor in a bond and disposition in security, though holding a decree of maills and duties, is not a member of the class here described. His possession, such as it is, is not on his titles, but on his decree of maills and duties, and farther, neither his titles nor his decree give him the character or the rights or even the name of a proprietor. He is in fact and in form too only a creditor. This construction of the words used by Erskine is borne out by the view of the law which is presented by Mr Walter Ross in his Lectures, vol. ii. p. 431. He there lays it down, 'that no title upon which a man may enter into the natural possession of land can be a foundation for the diligence of poinding the ground, and hence the holders of adjudications, liferent rights, wadsetters, and others of that class, cannot demand the ground to be poinded. They must enter like other landlords; and if the tenants will not pay them, the possessory action of maills and duties is the proper step to be taken.' The pursuer is not the holder of an adjudication of a liferent right, of a wadset, or of any right of that class. He is only the holder of a right which in form is but a burden on the proprietary right of the defenders, his debtors, and remaining, as he does, simply a creditor, he, though holding a decree of maills and duties upon which he levies the rents of the subjects constituting his security, is not precluded from suing the present action of poinding the ground. This at least is the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, and, accordingly, the present interlocutor has been pronounced."

---

[1] Ersk. iv. 1, 11; Ross' Lect. ii. 430; More's Notes to Stair, ii. 211; Bell's Lect. ii. 1099; Menzies' Lect. 877; Garthland v. Lord Jedburgh, March 2, 1532, M. 10,546.

[2] Bell's Com. (5th ed.), ii. 258; Bell's Lect. ii. 1075; Forsyth v. Aird, Dec. 13, 1859, 16 D. 197, 26 Scot. Jur. 97; Wylie v. Heritable Securities Co., Dec. 22, 1871, 10 Macph. 261, 44 Scot. Jur. 150; 10 and 11 Vict. cap. 50, sec. 2.

[3] Parker on Adjudications, pp. 4–5, sec. 3; Jurid. Styles, iii. (1) 393, note.

[4] 1 Bell's Com. (M'L.) 754; Hay v. Marshall, July 7, 1824, 3 S. 223 and F. C., H. of L., March 22, 1826, 2 W. and S. 71; 2 Bell's Com. (M'L.) 56.

[5] Parker on Adjudications, p. 15, sec. 26; Shand, vol. ii. p. 688.

No. 59.

Jan. 7, 1875.
Henderson v. Wallace.

taneously, or the ground might be poinded first and then the decree of mails and duties obtained, so it was quite competent to reverse the order.[1]

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an action of poinding of the ground brought by an heritable creditor infeft on a bond and disposition in security; and there cannot be the slightest doubt that a party in that position is justified in bringing a poinding of the ground. He cannot be stopped from bringing such an action, unless something has occurred to render it incompetent, or it can be shewn to be an oppressive or unnecessary diligence. Only one of these grounds was stated to the Lord Ordinary, namely, the incompetency, but both have been argued before us. In regard to the last objection, it is enough to say this poinding of the ground, if obtained, may be useful to the creditor in obtaining payment of his debt. Unless it be clearly shewn it is useless, we could not stop it.

With regard to the competency, I agree with the Lord Ordinary. It was contended that the creditor, having obtained possession under the action of mails and duties, could not pursue a poinding of the ground as he was in fact proprietor. It seems to me that the authorities on this subject have been misunderstood by the defender. The only one of these which I shall refer to is Mr Erskine, who says,—"Every person who has a debt secured upon land, or, as it is commonly called, a debitum fundi, whether the security be constituted by law or by paction, is entitled to an action for poinding all the goods on the lands burdened, in order to his payment, even although the original debtor should have been divested of the property in favour of a singular successor, after granting the creditor's security." That is the general rule. He then says,—"This action is therefore competent to an annualrenter for the arrears of interest due upon his infeftment, to a superior for his feu-duties, or for the retoured duties due to him before citation of the vassal's heir in an action of declarator, according to the distinction already stated, and, in general, to all creditors in debts which constitute a real burden or lien upon lands." Then he goes on to make an exception which is founded on by the defenders. "But it is not competent to proprietors, or even to possessors, though not strictly proprietors, as adjudgers, liferenters, or other real creditors who possess under their different titles; for there is a natural impropriety in poinding the ground of lands possessed by the poinder himself."

I think it is very clear that those possessors are meant who, though not strictly proprietors, have a title equal to proprietors, such as an adjudger, who, although his title is defeasible, may yet, under his charter and sasine, become proprietor by forty years' possession, unless something occur to defeat his right. A liferenter is entitled to full possession for the time he holds the property. A wadsetter for the time has full possession of the estate. Therefore, when he speaks of "possessors, though not strictly proprietors," Mr Erskine means those creditors who are practically, though not strictly, in the position of proprietors. This is very different from a creditor whose possession is redeemable within a certain time. Such a creditor does not possess the character of proprietor or of quasi-proprietor, but rather of encumbrancer. A liferenter or a wadsetter is entitled to take full possession of the ground, without any action, by virtue of his title alone. But what sort of possession is obtained under an action of mails and duties? I agree with a remark which was made by Lord Mure in the course of the argument that an action of mails and duties is nothing more than a process

[1] Shand, ii. 743; Railton v. Muirhead, June 20, 1834, 12 Sh. 787, Lord Corehouse's note.

No. 59.
Jan. 7, 1875.
Henderson v. Wallace.

for recovery of the rents, and carries nothing more. The right of a proprietor who has let his land on lease is very different. He retains everything which he has not let. It was never heard of, that the holder of a bond and disposition in security having obtained decree of maills and duties should be entitled to shoot on the lands, or to exercise any of the rights reserved by the lease; yet such a right is reserved to the proprietor. But such possession can never be obtained by the holder of a bond and disposition in security. I am therefore of opinion that this creditor has not obtained such a possession under this action of maills and duties as prevents him from raising an action of poinding of the ground, and I am for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

LORD DEAS.—The pursuer in this case is the holder of a decree of maills and duties in reference to the subjects mentioned in the summons, and he has brought this action of poinding of the ground. The defender objects that the action is incompetent, because the pursuer is in possession of the subjects as proprietor under his decree of maills and duties, and it is incompetent for a proprietor to bring an action of poinding of the ground. I am of opinion with the Lord Ordinary that the pursuer is not proprietor in that sense, but that his character is that of an heritable creditor who has used one diligence which does not prevent him from using another.

It is said, however, that the diligence of poinding the ground in addition to the decree of maills and duties is useless, and therefore oppressive. But poinding of the ground is a real diligence, accumulating the interest with the principal, —requires no transference against singular successors, and has other peculiar effects,—for instance, it has so in a mercantile sequestration, although now somewhat circumscribed by recent enactments. I can see no ground therefore for altering the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—The question is of some nicety, but I agree with the view which your Lordships have taken. I do not think that the action of poinding of the ground is here incompetent. The law of Scotland has always recognised that a creditor is entitled to more than one remedy if his interests require it. I think he may strengthen his position by using more than one diligence, if legitimate and applicable.

The observations of the institutional writers to which we have been referred are not applicable to the circumstances of this case. An heritable creditor is not a proprietor and is not a quasi-proprietor. He is not a wadsetter nor an adjudger. He is, as it has been expressed, an "encumbrance" on the property of another. He holds a bond with a personal obligation fortified by heritable security. There are two modes of proceeding which are competent to an heritable creditor for enforcing his rights. The first is an action of maills and duties, decree in which gives right to draw the rents. The other is an action of poinding of the ground, and one use of it is to attach any moveables of the debtor on the ground, whether it be let or unlet. It is a different remedy applicable to different circumstances. The use of the one remedy does not deprive the creditor of the other. The authorities do not go to that extent.

There is a peculiarity in the bond arising from the position of the wife as one of the obligants. Supposing an adjudication were led on the bond, a question might arise which it is not necessary now to dispose of. On that point I reserve my opinion.

No. 59.

Jan. 7, 1875. Henderson v. Wallace.

LORD MURE.—I agree with the opinions expressed by your Lordships. When the case came before me in the Outer-House I thought that there was no incompetency in an heritable creditor having recourse to a poinding of the ground, after having taken decree against the tenant in an action of maills and duties, and expressed my views to that effect in a note to the interlocutor by which a proof was allowed, for I was unable to see why a creditor who had used the remedy of an action of maills and duties should not also be entitled to bring a poinding of the ground, as there might be property of the landlord on the ground which could only be reached by a poinding. The only difficulty I then felt in dealing with the case arose from the very broad and general terms of the passage in Mr Erskine, iv. 1, 11, relied on by the defenders. But I am now quite satisfied, from the exposition of the law which has been given by your Lordship in the chair, that an heritable creditor, holding a decree of maills and duties, cannot be said to be in possession, in the sense in which that word is used by Mr Erskine, and cannot therefore be precluded from having recourse to a poinding of the ground, if that is necessary to enable him to operate payment of his debt.

THE COURT adhered.

HORNE, HORNE, & LYELL, W.S.—WALLS & SUTHERLAND, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 60.

Jan. 8, 1875. M'Intyre v. Clow.

ANDREW M'INTYRE AND COMPANY, Pursuers.—D.-F. Clark—Asher.
DAVID CLOW AND COMPANY, Defenders.—Sol.-Gen Watson—Balfour.

Contract—Locatio Operarum—Building—Vis Major.—A contractor undertook to build the entire brick-work of a house at certain rates. Before the work was completed a brick gable, forming a portion of it, was blown down during a violent gale of wind. Held that it having been proved that the work had been executed according to contract the loss fell upon the owner of the house, and that the contractor was entitled to recover from him the price of the work destroyed (diss. Lord Deas, on the grounds (1) that the contractor had not proved that the work had been executed conform to contract, and that the accident might not have been caused by a deviation therefrom; and (2) that even if it had been proved that there was no fault on the part of the contractor, the risk lay with him).

Opinions that the onus lay, in the first instance, on the contractor to shew that his work was conform to contract.

1st DIVISION. Ld. Mackenzie. B.

MESSRS DAVID CLOW AND COMPANY, joiners and builders, Glasgow, acting for the proprietors of the ground, employed Messrs Andrew M'Intyre and Company to execute the whole brick-work of four tenements in course of erection in Ann Street, Glasgow, conform to a schedule in which the rates for the different parts of the work were specified. It was stipulated, inter alia, "The bricks to be of the best make. The walls above 4½ inches thick to be built in three courses of stretchers to one of headers. . . . The work will be measured when finished, and valued by the rates contained in this schedule. . . ."

The brick gable of one of the houses was blown down before the house was finished during a violent gale of wind on 16th December 1873. It was agreed between Clow and Company and the contractors that the latter "should rebuild the brick gable and the other brick walls which had been injured by its fall, that all questions as to liability for such rebuilding should be reserved entire, and that should it be found that the pursuers were not liable to rebuild, the defenders should pay them, not only the contract price of the gable which fell, but also the cost of re-erecting the fallen gable and walls at current rates for time and material."

No. 60.

Jan. 8, 1875.
M'Intyre v. Clow.

The gable having been rebuilt, M'Intyre and Company brought this action against Clow and Company for £63 as the cost of re-erection.

They pleaded;—The pursuers having rebuilt said gable and walls in terms of the minute of agreement, and the re-erection not having been caused or rendered necessary by any fault on the part of the pursuers, the defenders are bound to pay the pursuers the expense thereof.

The defenders averred;—The said brick-work was grossly disconform to the said contract, both in respect of materials and workmanship. The fall of the said gable was due to the improper materials and workmanship of it. At the time when the portion of said gable fell it had never been taken off the hands of the pursuers . . . . but was still at the pursuers' risk. The brick-work of the said building contracted for by the pursuers was not completed at the time, and no part of it had been measured.

They pleaded;—(1) The gable in question never having been taken off the hands of the pursuers, and having been at their risk when it fell, the pursuers were liable to rebuild the said gable, and the defenders ought to be assoilzied. (2) Separatim, the action cannot be maintained, in respect that the fall of the gable was due to its having been constructed of defective materials, and with defective workmanship, and having been otherwise disconform to the contract.

A proof was allowed. It appeared that the pursuers received payment by instalments in the course of the work. The evidence with regard to the sufficiency of the materials was contradictory. The import of the proof on that and other points, so far as material, is sufficiently given in the opinions of the Judges.

The Lord Ordinary, on 30th June 1874, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Decerns against the defenders in terms of the conclusions of the summons: Finds the defenders liable in expenses," &c.*

---

* "NOTE.—1. The evidence in regard to the materials and workmanship of the gable is very contradictory. . . . . The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that it is proved that the pursuers implemented their contract both as regards materials and workmanship, that the only deviation in the construction of the gable by building, according to the usual practice, the bricks in four courses of stretchers to one of headers, was acquiesced in by the defenders, and that such mode of construction, which required the same amount of materials and labour, did not affect the stability of the gable or in any way lead to its fall. . . . . After full consideration of the proof the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the gable, which was supported only by the front and back walls, and not by any brick-work partition being built into it, fell, not from any defect in the materials or workmanship, but from the great severity of the gale, which, as is proved, blew down other walls in the neighbourhood.

"2. The Lord Ordinary also thinks that the second ground on which the defenders resist payment of the pursuers' claim is not well founded. There is no usage or practice of trade proved that the brick-work is at the risk of the bricklayer until the whole work contracted for is completed and measured and paid for. The stipulation in the condition annexed to the schedule of prices that 'the work will be measured when finished, and valued by the rates contained in this schedule' is merely a provision for settlement of the balance of the contract price, after the instalments, which were payable by usage, and which were paid by the defenders, under deduction of the usual ten per cent, are taken into account. If the brick-work did not, as the Lord Ordinary thinks, accresce to the employer as it progressed, it did so upon each part of it being completed and taken possession of by the employer, through his other workmen, and the work

No. 60.

Jan. 8, 1875. M'Intyre v. Clow.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—(1) On the evidence the gable was not constructed of good materials or according to contract. (2) At the time when the gable fell it had not been taken off the hands of the builder, and was therefore at his risk. The contract was for the entire work, and was not fulfilled until the whole was finished, although for convenience advances by instalments had been made to the builder. In an ordinary locatio operarum the contractor came under no obligation to complete the work, and therefore he might be entitled to repayment for what he had done. But where he did come under an obligation to complete the work he was not entitled to payment until it was finished. In those passages of the civil law in which it is said that the risk is with the owner in the event of an uncompleted work perishing by vis major, the meaning is that if it has become impossible by a damnum fatale to complete the contract, for example, owing to the destruction of the subject upon which it has to be executed, the risk will be with the owner. But here there was no impossibility in completing the work, and the builder had come under an express obligation to do so.[1]

The pursuers argued;—Taking the contract as one to erect the entire brick-work of the houses, the contractor was entitled to payment for what had been destroyed. As a builder builds work on the house or ground of another, the work as it proceeds becomes the property of the owner of the subject in which it is done. The contract was in this and all such cases only to build the particular house with which the builder has begun to proceed, not a house on that place. This doctrine was clearly enforced by Pothier.[2]

Further, inasmuch as the work was measured from time to time by the defenders' inspector, for the purpose of paying the instalments, and as the work was stopped in order to let the defenders proceed with the joiners' work, it had been taken off the pursuers' hands.

Lord Ardmillan.—This is substantially an action for cost of rebuilding a brick-wall or gable in Glasgow, which fell in a gale of wind, for the construction of which gable the pursuers are contractors, and in regard to which the defenders are in the position of employers and representing the owner of the premises. As matter of procedure, and in terms of an agreement of parties, the question of liability can be tried in this manner, the wall having been rebuilt, and it being held by agreement that the party bound to suffer the loss caused by the fall shall be found liable in the cost of rebuilding.

The pursuers plead that the fall of the wall was caused by the violence of the gale; that they, as contractors, were not in fault; and that the loss, having been occasioned by an extraordinary gale, and not caused by their fault, must fall on the defenders.

The defenders plead,—1st, that the proof instructs or discloses the fault of was thereafter at the employer's risk. The defenders went so far as to contend that until the whole work should be finally measured and paid for, which might not and frequently does not in such tenements take place until months after the tenement is completed and inhabited, the brick work is at the pursuer's risk. In the absence of usage and of special contract to that effect the Lord Ordinary considers that, in accordance with the ordinary rule of law applicable to such a contract as the present, the risk is with the employer."

---

[1] Appleby v. Myers, June 21, 1867, L. R. 2 C. P. 651; 1 Bell's Com. 456; Bell's Pr. 152; Sinclair v. Bowles, Feb. 6, 1829, 9 Barn. and Cress. 92; Addison on Contracts, 394 (6th ed.); Menetone v. Athawes, 1764, 1 Bell's Ill. 124.

[2] Pothier, Cont. de Louage, 433-4; 1 Domat, 110; Dig. 19, 2, 36, 37, 38.

No. 60.

Jan. 8, 1875. M'Intyre v. Clow.

the pursuers as contractors, and that such fault caused or contributed to cause the fall of the wall; and 2d, that, in any view, the work had not been taken off the hands of the contractors; that the gable was at the contractors' risk; that the loss by the fall must be theirs; and that they are accordingly bound to rebuild.

The first of these questions, fault or no fault, is a question of fact, to be determined, so far as ascertainment is possible, on the proof, which is to some extent conflicting.

After much and careful consideration, and not without some difficulty, I have come to the conclusion that, in the outset, and to some extent, the burden of proof rests on the contractors. The general rule—a very just and well recognised rule—is, that the party alleging fault must prove the fault. But under the very special circumstances of this case, and with reference to the view of the law which I take, and shall afterwards explain, on the supposition of there being no fault, I think that the pursuers, as contractors, must bring their work and their claims within the contract which they were bound to fulfil. On the contract the claim rests. They cannot claim, omitting the contract; and they cannot enforce the contract if they have violated it. In short, the pursuers cannot succeed unless they make it appear that they have fairly and justly fulfilled the contract. To this extent the onus of bringing the claim within the contract is on them. Now, after repeated study of this proof, estimating as well as I can the credit as regards testimony and the weight as regards opinion of the witnesses adduced, I have arrived at the conclusion that the pursuers, the contractors, have discharged themselves of this burden; and that, by evidence to my mind reliable, they have brought themselves within the scope of the contract, and are entitled to found on it.

It would occupy much time, and not answer any good purpose, to enter here into minute analysis of the evidence. I concur in most of the remarks of the Lord Ordinary; and the opinion of his Lordship, who saw the witnesses and had better opportunity of judging of their personal credibility than we have, is of importance. I am disposed to think that the witnesses adduced by the pursuers are, on the whole, more reliable and satisfactory on this matter than those adduced by the defenders. Some of the pursuers' witnesses had peculiar facilities for observation, and some are men of such practical knowledge and experience that their opinion is of great weight.

The gable fell on the 16th of December 1873. It certainly fell during and, as I think, in consequence of, a violent gale of wind. In any view of the evidence, as to defect in materials or building, it has been proved that the gable was blown down by a gale of unusual severity. This is, I think, beyond dispute. It is true that a gale of wind is an event to be expected, and that a wall should be so built as to resist an ordinary gale. But this was certainly not an ordinary gale. It was a storm of wind—a gale of extraordinary violence, amounting to vis major.

Then it is proved that the wall was not built out of the sight or beyond the observation of the defenders, or those acting for them. On the contrary, it was watched during its erection. As the work proceeded it was subject to observation and inspection by M'Calman, an inspector appointed by the defenders, representing them and superintending the erection of the wall on their behalf. The evidence of M'Calman, the defenders' inspector, a man not shaken on cross-examination, and, so far as I can see, quite capable of judging, and not unworthy of credit, is most important, and is justly relied on by the pursuers; and I concur with the Lord Ordinary in thinking the evidence of M'Calman entitled to much weight. Not only is his own testimony and opinion in favour of the pursuers, which, as he was the defenders' inspector, is important, but he distinctly depones to expressions of approval of the work, by the defender Mr Clow, who himself had opportunity of observing, and who was a practical man, not unacquainted with such operations. In addition to M'Calman we have the evidence of Docherty and Paterson, and of several other witnesses, competent judges of the work, and well acquainted with bricks and brick walls,—a body of evidence quite sufficient, in my opinion, to discharge the primary onus resting on the pursuers, and so far to sustain the pursuers' claim and to throw on the defenders the burden of meeting the claim by proving against the contractors some fault causing or contributing to cause the fall of the gable. This is the just and usual burden resting on the party who, notwithstanding that their own inspector was satisfied, are here alleging fault as the cause of injury.

No. 60.

Jan. 8, 1875.
M'Intyre v. Clow.

Proceeding next to consider the question of evidence on the footing of the pursuers having, in the first instance, brought themselves within the scope of the contract, I have come to the conclusion that the proof does not support the defenders' averment of fault. I think they have not proved that the fall of the gable, during a violent gale of wind, was due to defective materials and defective workmanship, or either of them.

On considering the whole evidence, and particularly the evidence of Mr Paterson, Mr James Finlay, Mr Eadie, Mr Bell, Mr Baird, and Mr M'Cord (held as concurring with Mr Baird), in addition to that of M'Calman and Docherty and Duncan M'Intyre, I am unable to arrive at any other conclusion on the question of fact than that which has been expressed by the Lord Ordinary. The preponderance of evidence is against the allegation of fault. The objection to the mortar was not pressed, and is not well founded; and the objection to the quality of the bricks and to the manner of building have not, in my opinion, been instructed by the proof. Then it is to be observed that the brick-work for which the pursuers contracted was, so far as rested with them, finished eight days before the wall fell in the gale. The defenders and their inspector saw the operations, the defenders paid by instalments from time to time and while the work was proceeding, and the defenders and their inspector seeing the materials used and seeing the manner of building found no fault, nay, as I think, they expressed approval. There was no more work then ready for the pursuers or left for the pursuers then to do, and when the pursuers ceased working there had been no objection whatever. The only part of the brick-work then remaining to be completed had been left without completion from no fault on the part of the pursuers. It was delayed for the convenience of the defenders, and for the purpose of operations with which the pursuers had no concern,—mason-work and joiner-work, not brick-work. But for that delay on the part of the defenders, or others with whom they contracted, the pursuers' work would have been taken off their hands days before the wall fell. But delay on the part of the defenders or their other contractors could not prolong the liability or increase the risk of the pursuers. This is the more clear when we take into account the fact that these defenders were themselves the contractors for the joiner-work, and that it was in order to facilitate their own operations as joiners, and also the operations of those whom they employed as stonemasons, that part of the brick-work under the pursuers' contract was left unfinished. But for the defenders, the pursuers'

No. 60.
Jan. 8, 1875.
M'Intyre v. Clow.

work would have been finished and taken off their hands before the gale, and in that case there would, on the defenders' own argument, have been little difficulty in disposing of the question.

The second question is one of law, and is certainly one of interest, importance, and difficulty. If fault causing the fall of the wall has not been instructed or disclosed in evidence, was the brick-wall, when, during the gale, it fell, at the risk of the pursuers or the defenders?

I am of opinion that, assuming the absence of fault, the wall was, when it fell by a vis major, at the risk of the defenders. I was much impressed by the very learned and able argument of the Dean of Faculty, and a subsequent study of the authorities has satisfied me that his reasoning was quite sound. The result at which I have arrived is, that according to the Roman law (Dig. l. 19, tit. 2, lex 59), and according to the apt and weighty authority of Pothier (Pothier, Cont. de Louage, No. 434), an authority, as I think, not opposed to any Scottish decision, or to any principle recognised by the law of Scotland, the risk at the time of the fall rested on the defenders (Stair, 2, 1, 40; Ersk. 2, 1, 15; 1 Bell's Com. 456; Addison on Contracts, pp. 394-5).

The wall was erected within the premises and on the ground of the defenders. The contract was, that the pursuers, using their own materials, should build the wall on the defenders' ground, and as part of the operation of building houses for the defenders, or Peacock whom the defenders represent, and the wall was built accordingly. We now assume that the wall fell by vis major, and without fault on the part of the pursuers.

There is a plain and important distinction between the case, on the one hand, of work done by a contractor for an employer within the contractor's premises, to be delivered when finished to the employer, and the case, on the other hand, of work of a permanent character done by a contractor on the ground of the employer. The work of a sculptor supplying a statue, or a painter supplying a picture, the work of constructing a cabinet, a piano, a table, or a clock, to be delivered when finished, is within the first class of cases. The work of building a mansion, or building a conservatory, or building a wall on the property of the employer, is within the second class of cases. The distinction is obvious.

The rearing a building on my ground is a work in progress for me,—the work, and the only work which for me the contractor has undertaken to execute is the work of rearing that building,—and as it rises from the ground it rises for me. It accresces to the soil, and as it rises and accresces in its rise it becomes gradually mine. Holding, as I now do, that fault on the part of the contractors has not been proved, the law of the case may be stated thus:—

A building reared on my ground is mine by accession or accretion. In so far as it is reared it is mine. Progress in building on my ground is progressive accession or accretion. When the contractor has fulfilled his work of building, the accession or accretion is complete,—the building is mine. Such accretion operates delivery,—delivery pro parte till complete, total delivery when complete. That which is, with my consent and by contract with me, attached by accretion to my land is delivered to me, and unless there be an ascertained fault or defect in materials or in work the risk of the building must also be mine. If it fall beneath the violence of an extraordinary gale the loss is mine,—Res perit domino.

In my humble opinion this is sound law on principle and on the authorities, and I see no reason to doubt that right views of equity, and even of expediency,

No. 60.

Jan. 8, 1875.
M'Intyre v. Clow.

coincide with this law. If fault has not been proved, and if I am right on this question of law, that is sufficient for disposal of the case.

There are some farther and special grounds of judgment, founded on the defenders' own operations, which have been urged by the pursuers, and which are alluded to as not without importance by the Lord Ordinary. I am not disposed to rely much on these special grounds. In so far, however, as they have any force, I must say that I think that their effect is rather to support the pleas of the pursuers; for the operations of the defenders, and of masons and joiners employed by the defenders, on and in regard to this wall, between the 5th and the 14th of December, do appear to me to have proceeded on the recognition and acceptance of the pursuers' work. That work had during its progress never been objected to—and it had been performed within the observation of the defenders, and to the satisfaction of their inspector. The defenders continued their operations after the pursuers ceased to work, and they seem to have built on the top of it before the gale came, and it is by no means clear that their operations on the chimney-head did not tend to increase the risk.

But I do not rest my opinion entirely or chiefly on this view of the case. I think there are broader and safer grounds. I am satisfied, 1st, that the pursuers have brought themselves within the contract; 2d, that on the evidence, fault, whether as regards materials or workmanship, has not been proved against the pursuers; and 3d, that, in the absence of fault, the risk of the wall, under a gale of unusual violence, was with the defenders.

As I understand the agreement of the parties, a decision to this effect is sufficient to dispose of the whole cause.

Lord Murr.—In my opinion the judgment of the Lord Ordinary ought to be adhered to. The case is one which may very fairly be dealt with on the doctrine of res perit domino, unless it can be shewn that the gable was of such defective construction as to lead to its fall, and that it would not have fallen if it had been of better construction. It seems to me to be of importance to keep in view the precise condition of the facts before the night of the 15th December. It appears that the brick-work was completed about December 9, that is to say, the brick-work of the walls and gables. It is true that there were some inside partitions still to be put up, but practically the work was finished. Upon the bricklayers leaving, the masons, to whom it remained to complete the gable by the addition of the copestones and chimney-heads, took possession, and their work was done between the 9th and 14th December, and then the gable so completed was taken possession of by the defenders for the purpose of setting the joiners to work upon it. It appears from the evidence of Mr Paterson that the chimney-heads were "pretty heavy," and it further appears from Mr Eadie's evidence that the weather had been very wet, and that in consequence, when the gable fell, there had not been sufficient time for the mortar to set and grow firm. That was the condition of the gable on December 15, and the question we have to decide is, whether it was the wind acting on a well-built or an ill-built gable that threw it down. It appears to me that on this question Mr Paterson's evidence is very important, and the view which he takes is confirmed by Mr Eadie. Now, having regard to the evidence of these two witnesses, and especially to the fact that it is quite uncontradicted by any of the others, it seems to shew that the force of the wind on the chimney-head knocked it down, and its weight fell on the joists, drove them out on the front wall, and as the wall fell so did the gable which it supported, and so it was the fall of the chimn which brought about all the damage. I think that view is confirmed fact that the other half of the gable which was supported by the back wall firm. It has been examined; is proved to have been built properly, and of the same materials as the part which fell; and it has since been taken over as sufficient by the defenders. In these circumstances it seems to me that there is no fault on the part of the pursuers in the way the gable was built. Now, as to the evidence on the quality of the materials used, it seems to me that they were proper and sufficient. I think the testimony of Messrs Paterson, Eadie, and Bell is conclusive on that point. Then, too, we have the evidence of Messrs Baird and M'Cord, and it is worth observing that Mr Baird in his cross-examination on behalf of the defenders is never asked a single question as to the sufficiency of the materials. In dealing with this case I put aside altogether the evidence of the parties themselves. The only evidence on the part of the defenders which is at all contradictory is that of Mr Thomson, and I do not think it goes very far to establish this case. In these circumstances, I think the pursuers have shewn that the accident was due to no defect either in materials or workmanship, and that under the minute of agreement they are entitled to recover their money.

There is, however, one part of the case which certainly does present some difficulty. It is admitted by the pursuers that there was a deviation from the contract in the proportion of stretchers to headers, and this is said by the defenders to have made the building less secure. If that were so I should have had much difficulty in holding that the pursuers had made out their case, but then I think it is quite clearly proved that the defenders knew quite well of this occasional deviation, and that they made no objection to it, and there is no evidence that that deviation did any harm, but rather the contrary. The new work has been built with four courses of stretchers and one of headers within the defenders' own knowledge, and in that condition they have taken it over. On that ground I have got over any difficulty which might have been caused by the deviation from the terms of the contract. As regards the violence of the storm, and that it was calculated to bring down even well-built work, I think that is sufficiently proved by the evidence from the Observatory. I think the pursuers have shewn satisfactorily that the gable was not insufficiently built, and that the materials were good, and that the defenders were bound to take it over, and I think there is nothing in the evidence which points to an opposite conclusion.

LORD DEAS.—This question arises out of a building contract between the pursuers and defenders. The defenders were the employers, and they do not seriously dispute that, for the purposes of this case, they are to be held to be in the position of proprietors of the premises in which the gable in dispute was constructed. The pursuers were not contractors for the whole building but merely for the brick-work, comprehending the gable which fell, as well as a variety of other internal brick-work. This particular wall fell almost immediately after it was put up, in consequence, it is said, of a gale of wind. An agreement was entered into between the parties that the wall should be rebuilt in the meantime, and that the question between them should be just the same as if it had been raised before rebuilding the wall,—who was or was not responsible for the loss, of labour and materials, occasioned by the fall?

No. 60.

Jan. 8, 1875.
M'Intyre v. Clow.

coincide with this law. If fault has not been proved, and if I am right on this question of law, that is sufficient for disposal of the case.

There are some farther and special grounds of judgment, founded on the defenders' own operations, which have been urged by the pursuers, and which are alluded to as not without importance by the Lord Ordinary. I am not disposed to rely much on these special grounds. In so far, however, as they have any force, I must say that I think that their effect is rather to support the pleas of the pursuers; for the operations of the defenders, and of masons and joiners employed by the defenders, on and in regard to this wall, between the 5th and the 14th of December, do appear to me to have proceeded on the recognition and acceptance of the pursuers' work. That work had during its progress never been objected to—and it had been performed within the observation of the defenders, and to the satisfaction of their inspector. The defenders continued their operations after the pursuers ceased to work, and they seem to have built on the top of it before the gale came, and it is by no means clear that their operations on the chimney-head did not tend to increase the risk.

But I do not rest my opinion entirely or chiefly on this view of the case. I think there are broader and safer grounds. I am satisfied, 1st, that the pursuers have brought themselves within the contract; 2d, that on the evidence, fault, whether as regards materials or workmanship, has not been proved against the pursuers; and 3d, that, in the absence of fault, the risk of the wall, under a gale of unusual violence, was with the defenders.

As I understand the agreement of the parties, a decision to this effect is sufficient to dispose of the whole cause.

Lord Mure.—In my opinion the judgment of the Lord Ordinary ought to be adhered to. The case is one which may very fairly be dealt with on the doctrine of res perit domino, unless it can be shewn that the gable was of such defective construction as to lead to its fall, and that it would not have fallen if it had been of better construction. It seems to me to be of importance to keep in view the precise condition of the facts before the night of the 15th December. It appears that the brick-work was completed about December 9, that is to say, the brick-work of the walls and gables. It is true that there were some inside partitions still to be put up, but practically the work was finished. Upon the bricklayers leaving, the masons, to whom it remained to complete the gable by the addition of the copestones and chimney-heads, took possession, and their work was done between the 9th and 14th December, and then the gable so completed was taken possession of by the defenders for the purpose of setting the joiners to work upon it. It appears from the evidence of Mr Paterson that the chimney-heads were "pretty heavy," and it further appears from Mr Eadie's evidence that the weather had been very wet, and that in consequence, when the gable fell, there had not been sufficient time for the mortar to set and grow firm. That was the condition of the gable on December 15, and the question we have to decide is, whether it was the wind acting on a well-built or an ill-built gable that threw it down. It appears to me that on this question Mr Paterson's evidence is very important, and the view which he takes is confirmed by Mr Eadie. Now, having regard to the evidence of these two witnesses, and especially to the fact that it is quite uncontradicted by any of the others, it seems to shew that the force of the wind on the chimney-head knocked it down, and its weight fell on the joists, drove them out on the front wall, and as the wall fell

No. 60.

Jan. 8, 1875.
M'Intyre v. Clow.

so did the gable which it supported, and so it was the fall of the chimney-head which brought about all the damage. I think that view is confirmed by the fact that the other half of the gable which was supported by the back wall stood firm. It has been examined; is proved to have been built properly, and of the same materials as the part which fell; and it has since been taken over as sufficient by the defenders. In these circumstances it seems to me that there is no fault on the part of the pursuers in the way the gable was built. Now, as to the evidence on the quality of the materials used, it seems to me that they were proper and sufficient. I think the testimony of Messrs Paterson, Eadie, and Bell is conclusive on that point. Then, too, we have the evidence of Messrs Baird and M'Cord, and it is worth observing that Mr Baird in his cross-examination on behalf of the defenders is never asked a single question as to the sufficiency of the materials. In dealing with this case I put aside altogether the evidence of the parties themselves. The only evidence on the part of the defenders which is at all contradictory is that of Mr Thomson, and I do not think it goes very far to establish this case. In these circumstances, I think the pursuers have shewn that the accident was due to no defect either in materials or workmanship, and that under the minute of agreement they are entitled to recover their money.

There is, however, one part of the case which certainly does present some difficulty. It is admitted by the pursuers that there was a deviation from the contract in the proportion of stretchers to headers, and this is said by the defenders to have made the building less secure. If that were so I should have had much difficulty in holding that the pursuers had made out their case, but then I think it is quite clearly proved that the defenders knew quite well of this occasional deviation, and that they made no objection to it, and there is no evidence that that deviation did any harm, but rather the contrary. The new work has been built with four courses of stretchers and one of headers within the defenders' own knowledge, and in that condition they have taken it over. On that ground I have got over any difficulty which might have been caused by the deviation from the terms of the contract. As regards the violence of the storm, and that it was calculated to bring down even well-built work, I think that is sufficiently proved by the evidence from the Observatory. I think the pursuers have shewn satisfactorily that the gable was not insufficiently built, and that the materials were good, and that the defenders were bound to take it over, and I think there is nothing in the evidence which points to an opposite conclusion.

LORD DEAS.—This question arises out of a building contract between the pursuers and defenders. The defenders were the employers, and they do not seriously dispute that, for the purposes of this case, they are to be held to be in the position of proprietors of the premises in which the gable in dispute was constructed. The pursuers were not contractors for the whole building but merely for the brick-work, comprehending the gable which fell, as well as a variety of other internal brick-work. This particular wall fell almost immediately after it was put up, in consequence, it is said, of a gale of wind. An agreement was entered into between the parties that the wall should be rebuilt in the meantime, and that the question between them should be just the same as if it had been raised before rebuilding the wall,—who was or was not responsible for the loss, of labour and materials, occasioned by the fall?

No. 60.

Jan. 8, 1875.
M'Intyre v. Clow.

The contract was one for the whole brick-work of the building. That work was to be paid for by a cumulo sum, to be ascertained by measurement, at certain stipulated rates, after the brick-work was finished. There was no agreement that any part of the contract price should be paid until the whole brick-work was finished and taken off the contractors' hands. Certain payments do seem to have been made while the work was proceeding, but it is clear that these were simply payments to account, for the accommodation of the contractors, to enable them to go on paying their men, and made upon the assumption that the whole work would be duly and properly finished, and that when it came to be measured there would be a larger sum due to the contractors than what had been paid in the meantime. The contract was for the entire brick-work, not for parts,—a contract for the entire work, to be paid at the end, according to certain specified rates, when the work had been measured, and precisely, in that respect, in the same position as if a slump sum had been to be paid for it when the work was finished and taken off the contractors' hands. The pursuers, therefore, cannot recover on the special contract, and there is no evidence of a new contract to pay for work done without implementing the entire contract.

Well, then, while this work was in progress the gable in question fell, in consequence, it is said, of an unusually high wind, which blew it down. In the way in which the case has been viewed by your Lordships, and particularly by Lord Ardmillan, it becomes one of general importance,—At whose risk was that wall when it fell? Now, in the first place, I am of opinion, that when that wall fell it was at the risk of the contractors, whether it fell from any fault of theirs or not. In the second place, I am of opinion that, supposing this to be otherwise, it was at all events incumbent upon the contractors, and the onus lay upon them, to prove that the wall had not fallen from any fault of theirs, or any deviation on their part from the contract. In the third place, I am of opinion that, in this particular case, the contractors have failed to prove that the wall fell from no fault or deviation from the contract on their part, and, on the contrary, that it appears there were faults or deviations from the contract on their part, which, to say the least of it, may have led or materially contributed to the fall of the wall, and which most probably did contribute materially to the fall of the wall; so that, even if this last were the alternative to be taken, the consequences would still rest upon the contractors.

The first important question is, supposing there was no fault on either side, did the risk lie upon the proprietor of the house or upon the contractors? Now, I am not able to reconcile the law, as laid down by Lord Ardmillan, with the view taken of the law in various cases in the sister country of England. That law may not be imperative upon us, but if there is nothing against it in our own law, and if it is reasonable in itself, then unquestionably the English decisions become very important for our consideration. I do not know anything against it in our law. The Scotch authorities referred to apply to different classes of cases from the present, and will be found not to be adverse. I think the law is right and reasonable in itself, and I hold it to be the law of Scotland.

Of the English cases, I refer more particularly to the case of Appleby v. Myers, decided in the Exchequer Chamber, upon appeal from the Court of Common Pleas, on 21st June 1867 (Law Rep., 2 Com. Pleas, p. 651). That was a case in which certain parties contracted to put up certain expensive and heavy machinery, including steam-engine, water-tanks, and other appurtenances, in a building belonging to another party, in which they were necessarily to become, and, so far as completed, did become fixtures. While the work was in progress, but before the whole was finished, an accidental fire took place in the building, which burned down the building, and destroyed the machinery which had been erected in the building. The contract was there held to have been a contract for the entire work, under which the price was not payable till the work should be finished. In these respects, I think, it was exactly similar to the present case. No suggestion was made of a difference between such machinery and mason-work or joiner-work. It was not said that either the one party or the other was to blame for the fire, but I think it is pretty clear that, if there was to be a presumption of fault in reference to the fire, it would rather have been a presumption of fault on the part of the proprietor of the building, or some of his servants in the building in which the fire originated, than upon the part of the contractors putting in the machinery. It was the burning down of the building that destroyed the machinery, and the contractors who were putting in the machinery were not said to have had anything to do with the fire. The question came first before the Court of Common Pleas on 12th June 1866 (Law Rep., 1 Com. Pleas, 615). The machinery was being put up as fixtures upon the other party's property,—and the argument was used, which has been used here, that whatever was put up upon his property became his, and the maxim res perit domino was founded upon,—but I do not discover any doubt to have been entertained, in the Court of Common Pleas, that that argument would not do, and that if there was no fault on the part of the proprietor the loss fell on the contractor, although there was no fault attributable to him. But it was held in that Court that it was an implied part of the contract that the proprietor should have a building fit to receive the machinery, and that when the building was destroyed and the machinery also was destroyed, the proprietor had failed in his contract, because the machinery could not go into the building if no building was there to receive it. If it had not been for that view I do not discover that in the Court of Common Pleas any doubt would have been entertained that the risk in reference to the work and machinery, before it was completed and taken off the contractor's hands, lay with the contractor.

No. 60.

Jan. 8, 1875.
M'Intyre v. Clow.

The case afterwards went to the Court of Exchequer Chamber, and it seems obvious from the report that no doubt was entertained there as to the principles I have stated, that the risk lay with the contractor, and that the maxim res perit domino did not apply. The only point on which the Court of Exchequer Chamber differed from the view taken by the Court of Common Pleas was in holding that there was an implied contract upon the part of the proprietor to keep up the building which was to receive the machinery. There is certainly a difference when the destruction of the work arises from something which, as in the present case, affects the work alone, and when it arises from a fire which consumes the whole building,—external walls, roof, and everything else, thereby destroying the contractor's work, and which might, in some cases, presume fault on the part of the proprietor or his servants occupying the building. But, however that might be, there was no difference of opinion between the two Courts, in the case of Appleby, that, unless there was fault or breach of contract on the part of the proprietor, the risk lay upon the contractor. Now, that, I think, is sound in equity and in principle. The contractor undertakes to put up the work complete, and the proprietor undertakes to pay for it on its being completed and taken over. That is the nature of the contract; and that being so, and as the risk must be upon one of two innocent parties, it appears to me, both on principle and expediency, that there is much more reason for laying the risk upon the contractor than upon the proprietor. Certainly I am not aware of any decision or authority in the law of Scotland that goes against that, and a series of decisions in the Courts of England appear to me to be in favour of it. That being the case we have to deal with, I have come to the conclusion that, supposing there to be no fault on the part of the contractor, the risk lay with him.

No. 60.
Jan. 8, 1875.
M'Intyre v. Clow.

But, in the second place, although I were wrong in that, I think the least burden the law would impose upon the contractor would be to prove that he had performed his contract according to its terms, and that there was no defect in the building which could reasonably be supposed to have contributed to the result that had occurred; and I am humbly of opinion that he has not discharged himself of that burden here. The contract was that the bricks were to be of the best description, not being machine-made bricks; and that the walls were to be of a certain thickness, and were to be built with three courses of stretchers to one of headers. Now, it is proved beyond all question, in the first place, that a great quantity of the bricks were not of the best description of ordinary bricks. They were not merely not machine-made bricks, which they did not require to be, but they were inferior bricks. Of course inferior bricks may be extensively used by other parties, but that is no answer to the objection that these were not bricks of the quality stipulated by the contract. Who is to tell what the effect of that was upon the fall of the gable? If the bricks were more brittle than they should have been they would give way more readily. It may be, as Lord Mure suggests, that the top of the gable and the chimney-heads were the first to fall. But it is not suggested or proved that there was anything wrong with the chimney-heads. It is not suggested that they were too heavy. It is not suggested that they were in any way different from the chimney-heads the gable was intended to bear. There was, in short, no fault in the chimney-heads at all. Well, the wall being intended to bear those chimney-heads, it does not touch the question to suppose that the swaying may have begun immediately under the chimney-heads. If the bricks were brittle where they were immediately connected with the chimney-heads, and the chimney-heads were pressed by the wind, that may account for the inferior bricks giving way; whereas, if they had been of better quality, they might not have given way. Then, as to the stretchers and headers, it is proved and admitted that in a great portion of the wall there were four courses, in place of only three courses, of stretchers to one of headers, as stipulated by the contract. It does not require any architectural skill to see that a brick-wall must be weaker in the one case than in the other. The headers are just the binders that keep the rows of stretchers together. Suppose there were no headers at all, is it not perfectly clear that that wall would not be so strong, and if of considerable height would be altogether insufficient? We all know that you may get men of skill to give different opinions upon almost anything, but no man of skill will convince me that the diminution of headers could make no difference on the strength of such a wall. Well, then, there are those two breaches of contract,—the bricks are not of the quality stipulated for, and the headers or binders are not so frequent as they were stipulated to be. The wall comes down with the wind. Who shall say to what extent those deviations from the contract did or did not contribute to that result? It may very well be that the slightest possible difference in the strength of that wall would have prevented it from coming down. Very often a thing is blown down, whether a tree or a wall, when, if there had been just one degree less of weakness, or one degree of additional strength, it would have stood, but with that difference of degree it comes down. Can it be said that the contractor has relieved himself of the onus that was upon him of proving that no defect or deviation from the contract had occurred? Will it do to shew a difference of opinion among men of skill about the effect of these deviations? We are to judge of that, and not the men of skill. We see the contract before us; we see it was deviated from; we see that those deviations might have affected the strength of the wall; and that is enough to shew that the contractor has not relieved himself of the onus, which must be admitted to have been incumbent on him.

No. 60.
Jan. 8, 1875.
M'Intyre v. Clow.

Lastly, when we come to the question of vis major, I am not satisfied that there was any vis major in the case. When a builder undertakes to build a wall he undertakes to build a wall which will withstand wind; and in this country winds of considerable force are of frequent occurrence. The contractor is surely bound to contemplate that there may be a high wind, and I see no proof that this particular wind was so much higher than the winds that might have been anticipated as to entitle it to be called a vis major. It is said there were some other brick-walls blown down on the same night in Glasgow. That may be true, although we have not the particulars; but how does it appear that these had been built as they should have been built in order to stand against such winds as might occur at any time? We all know, from judicial experience, civil and criminal, that, in Glasgow not less frequently than elsewhere, brick and other walls are put up which unfortunately are not sufficient to stand the wind, and which come down and cause a sacrifice of both life and property. A contractor is not entitled to take for granted that there will not be a high wind. He is bound to build on the footing that there may come a high wind, even before the roof is on and the couples and joists are in to tie the roof together. A wall should be built to stand against any wind that is not quite extraordinary. I do not see any proof here of such an extraordinary wind as to relieve the contractor of the risk which otherwise lay upon him. Therefore I am not able, even in that view, to come to the conclusion that the contractor is entitled to his payment here.

Lord President.—This is a case of very considerable importance, and though the sum at stake is very small our duty is not in the least degree diminished of guarding carefully the principles of law applicable to a case of this kind.

I think the defenders here must be taken to be in the position of the owners of the ground on which the building was to be erected, and that they employed several tradesmen, who, in combination, were to build a house. One man was to do the mason-work, another the joiner-work, another the brick-work, and so on. The pursuers of this action entered into a contract for the performance of the brick-work. The precise terms of that contract I do not think very material, but I agree with Lord Deas that it was a single contract to do the entire work, and that the contract could not be said to be completed, or the work finished, until the whole of the work had been done and measured, and the price ascertained. Now, undoubtedly, it was before the completion of the contract, in that sense—before the work had been measured and the price ascertained—that the brick gable, which formed part of the work contracted for, fell down. It is said to have fallen in consequence of a gale of wind, and that the gale of wind, and nothing else, was the cause of its fall. The question comes to be, in point of law, upon whom, in such a case, does the risk fall? Is it upon the contractor, or upon the employer? Now, I think, as a general rule, the result of all the authorities in the civil law, and our own law, is that in such a case, where a house is being erected upon the soil belonging to the employer, the risk is with the employer, and not with the contractor. I am not aware that there is in the law of England any authority adverse to that, and I am certainly not of opinion that the case of Appleby v. Myers is inconsistent in the slightest degree with the general rule which I have just stated. That was a contract of a very peculiar kind. It was a contract to supply a certain piece of machinery, composed of various parts, but the parts of which, except in combination, were useless, and nothing but the completed machine could be of any avail to anybody. Now, the English Courts held that until that contract was completed, and the employer put in possession of an available machine, there could be no demand upon the part of the contractor. I think that is brought out very clearly in the judgment of Mr Justice Blackburn, who delivered the judgment in the Court of Exchequer. With his opinion, as in reference to such a machine as the Court was there dealing with, I can find no fault. It interferes not in the slightest degree with the general principle, which I think is applicable to the case of parties engaged in building a house upon the ground of the employer, which is the particular case we have to deal with. If the house or part of the house is destroyed during the progress of the work my opinion is that the risk is with the employer. I think all the civilians are of that opinion, without exception, in the general case.

No. 60. Jan. 8, 1875. M'Intyre v. Clow.

But then it must be very clearly established that the cause of the destruction of the work is a vis major naturæ, and it is of some consequence to attend to the particular kind of vis major which is alleged in a case of this kind. A vis major may be of such a kind that you see at once that that occurrence which is called the vis major, and nothing else, must be the cause of the destruction. For example, if there be such an earthquake that an entire building is swallowed up in the earth, there cannot be a doubt there that the vis major, and nothing but the vis major, is the cause of the destruction. On the other hand, if you have a gale of wind, as in the present case, it may very well be that that is a vis major in one sense—that is to say, that it is a very trying thing to a building—and yet not the true cause or the only cause of the destruction which followed. It is not enough to say that this gable fell in a gale of wind, or in a very high gale of wind, and it is not enough to say that but for that gale of wind it would not have fallen. It must be shewn that the gale of wind, and nothing but the gale of wind, is the cause of the disaster, because if any fault on the part of the contractor has contributed along with the gale of wind to produce the disaster it is quite plain he can maintain no action. Therefore it appears to me that, as the result of this rule, the onus is, in the first place, upon the contractor to shew that the cause of the destruction of this gable was the gale of wind and nothing else. And that leads to the question of fact upon the evidence, which I am not going to deal with at all. I very much agree with what has been said as to the import of the evidence both by Lord Ardmillan and Lord Mure, and I particularly adopt that portion of Lord Mure's opinion in which he dealt with the literal breach of contract which took place by substituting four courses of stretchers to one course of headers in place of three courses of stretchers to one course of headers, in regard to which the contractor may be said to have committed a breach of contract. I say I adopt that part of Lord Mure's opinion in which he gets the better of that apparent breach of contract by ascribing it to the consent or acquiescence of the defenders, who were the employers. I think they have completely barred themselves from founding upon that, either as a breach of contract or as a defect in the workmanship of this gable.

No. 60.

Jan. 8, 1875.
M'Intyre v. Clow.

The result, upon the whole matter, therefore, according to my view of the case, is, that it has been proved by the contractors in this case that the gale of wind was the cause, and the only cause, of the destruction of this gable; and that being so, I am of opinion that, upon the rule of law which I have already adverted to, the employer, and not the contractor, is responsible.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Adhere to the said interlocutor, and refuse the reclaiming note: Find the defenders liable in additional expenses," &c.

J. & R. D. ROSS, W.S.—MACGREGOR & ROSS, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 61.

Jan. 8, 1875.
Chapman v. Balfour.

R. CHAPMAN, Pursuer.
J. BALFOUR (Lloyd's Curator Bonis), Defender.—Mackintosh.
A. DUNCAN AND G. V. MANN, Compearers.—Trayner.

Process—Mandatary—Expenses—Jury Trial—A. S. 16th February 1841, sec. 46.—On the day fixed for the trial of a cause by jury the pursuer's mandatary lodged a minute of withdrawal before the jury were empannelled. No appearance was made for the pursuer, and the defender took a verdict. Held that the mandatary was liable for the fees to counsel and agents, and payments to witnesses and jury for the trial, and for the expenses of audit.

2D DIVISION. Jury Cause. R.

IN this cause a jury trial was fixed for Monday, 20th July 1874. On that morning, before the jury were empannelled, Messrs A. Duncan and G. V. Mann, the pursuer's mandataries, who had on the Saturday before intimated by letter to the defender's agents that they had ceased to act as mandataries, lodged a minute of withdrawal in process. No appearance was made at the trial for the pursuer. The defender put the jury into the box, and took a verdict in his favour.* The verdict was applied, and the defender assoilzied, with expenses. When the Auditor's report came to be approved of the defender moved for decree against Messrs Duncan and Mann. The account included fees paid to counsel, agents, witnesses, and jury for the trial, and the expenses of audit.

Messrs Duncan and Mann appeared, and maintained that their liability ceased upon their entering the minute of withdrawal,[1] and that in any view they were not liable for the payment to the jury, as under A. S. 16th February 1841, sec. 46, the defender was not obliged to put the jury into the box, but had an alternative and less expensive course.

* A. S. 16th February 1841, regulating proceedings in jury causes, provides (sec. 46),—"In case either party shall not appear at the trial of a cause after due notice of trial has been given by the opposite party, the party appearing, if pursuer in the issue, shall be entitled to lead his evidence, and go to the jury for a verdict; and if the party appearing be the defender in the issue he shall be entitled to obtain a verdict in his favour without leading evidence; but if the party appearing shall decline to proceed in this manner, then the Judge presiding at the trial shall certify to the Division the fact of the other party not appearing, and the Division shall thereupon proceed as in cases in which parties are held as confessed, unless it shall be shewn to the satisfaction of the Court that the failure of the party to appear at the trial was occasioned by some sufficient cause."

[1] Martin v. Underwood, June 8, 1827, 5 S. 783.

No. 61.

Jan. 8, 1875. Chapman v. Balfour.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—A mandatary can put an end to his obligation by lodging a minute of withdrawal in process. But the other party has recourse against him for all necessary expenses to which he has been put in consequence of the mandatary not withdrawing sooner. Accordingly I have no doubt that the mandataries in this case are liable for the great bulk of the account in ques-question, viz., the fees to counsel, agents, and witnesses for the trial, and the expenses of taxation. The only question of any difficulty is in regard to the payment of the jury. The defender might have obtained decree by default without taking a verdict.[1] But I think that the defender was not bound to adopt that course, and that the mandataries are liable for the payment to the jury.

LORDS NEAVES and GIFFORD concurred.

LORD ORMIDALE absent.

A. DUNCAN & G. V. MANN, S.S.C.—MYLNE & CAMPBELL, W.S.—Agents.

No. 62.

Jan. 9, 1875. Steven v. Nicoll, &c.

WILLIAM STEVEN (Young's Trustee), Pursuer.—Balfour.
ALEXANDER NICOLL AND OTHERS, Defenders.—Asher—J. P. B. Robertson.

Process—Proof—Diligence—Business Books.—In a reduction of an assignation granted by a person who subsequently became bankrupt, on the ground that the deed had been granted in defraud of creditors, at a time when the granter knew that he was insolvent, the defenders moved for a diligence to recover the business books and other documents in the hands of certain of the bankrupt's creditors, with a view to instruct his solvency at the date of the deed. The Court refused the diligence, on the ground that the documents called for could not be available as evidence of the granter's solvency apart from the examination of the creditors as witnesses.

1st DIVISION. Ld. Curriehill. M.

THIS was an action at the instance of William Steven, accountant in Dundee, trustee on the sequestrated estate of Charles Denoon Young, against Alexander Nicoll and others, for reduction of a trust-assignation, dated in 1868, of three policies of insurance upon the life of the bankrupt.

The pursuer averred that Charles Denoon Young was sequestrated in 1856, when the creditors received a dividend of 2s. 6d. in the pound, and again in 1862, when the creditors received 3s. 6d. in the pound, and that he was again sequestrated in 1874. It was further averred that Mr Young was insolvent in 1867, and at the date of the deed.

The defenders alleged that Mr Young was solvent when the trust-assignation was granted, and generally denied the averments of the pursuers. They also alleged that the deed was granted in implement of the obligations in Mr and Mrs Young's marriage-contract.

The defenders moved the Lord Ordinary to grant diligence to recover the documents mentioned in the following specification:—"1. The business and cash-books of (1) Messrs D. and W. Robertson, iron merchants, Dundee, and five other firms, from the beginning of the year 1866 to the present time, or to 5th October 1868, that excerpts may be taken therefrom of all entries of transactions during said period between the said respective firms or any of their partners, on the one part, and C. D. Young and Co., engineers, Perth, or Mr C. D. Young, engineer, Perth, on the other part. 2. All original accounts sales, accounts current, invoices, and correspondence connected with advances or loans by the [1] A. S. 16th February 1841, sec. 46.

No. 62.

Jan. 9, 1875.
Steven v. Nicoll, &c.

said D. and W. Robertson, &c., to the said C. D. Young and Co., or C. D. Young, during the above period, or connected with consignments and securities held by the said D. and W. Robertson, &c., for such advances or loans. 3. The letter-books of the said several firms, that copies may be taken therefrom of all letters to the holders or assignees of securities on which the advances before referred to were made. 4. The books of the Commercial Union Assurance Company, London, that excerpts may be taken therefrom of all entries relating to the two policies of insurance, Nos. 863 and 868, on the life of the said Charles Denoon Young. 5. The business and cash-books of Mr Melville Jameson, solicitor, Perth, from the beginning of the year 1866 to the present time, or to 5th October 1868, that excerpts may be taken therefrom of all entries of transactions during the said period between him and the said C. D. Young and Co., and C. D. Young. 6. The books of the Commercial Bank of Scotland for their agencies at Perth and Callander, that excerpts may be taken therefrom of accounts in name of the said C. D. Young and Co., C. D. Young, or Mrs C. D. Young, from the beginning of 1865 to the present time."

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Grants diligence for recovery of the documents mentioned in article 4 of said specification, and also those in articles 1, 2, 3, and 5, down to the date of the trust-assignation on 5th October 1868, and commission to the commissioners formerly named to examine the havers and receive their exhibits, the same to be reported on or before the 13th January next: Quoad ultra refuses said motion, and grants leave to reclaim against this interlocutor."

Both parties reclaimed.

The pursuer argued;—The diligence asked should not be granted, as the documents sought to be recovered would not be evidence. If the Court, however, thought that part of the diligence should be granted, the Lord Ordinary had exercised a wise discretion.

Argued for the defenders;—The defenders' case was that at the date of granting the trust-assignation Mr Young was solvent. To prove that, it was necessary to get access to the books of the creditors to shew the position in which at that time Young stood to his creditors down to the present date. This was necessary, as the pursuer had in his favour a presumption, arising from the fact of present bankruptcy, of insolvency retro to the date of granting the deed.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—With the exception of article 4 of this specification I am of opinion that the diligence should be refused, as the documents specified are not the kind of evidence by which the solvency or insolvency of Young may be established. If part of the proof of solvency were, that certain alleged creditors were not creditors at any of the dates specified, or to the extent alleged, or that, instead of being creditors, they were debtors, the proper evidence would be that of Young himself, on the one hand, and that of the creditors on the other. Then, if in the examination of creditors as witnesses it is necessary for them to refer to their books, they can do so, or, if the defenders think it desirable that they should do so before coming to give evidence, they can give them notice to do so, and require them to bring the books with them. But the books in themselves, apart from the examination of the creditors, are not evidence at all. They may come to be evidence in the sense of being in the hands of witnesses under examination, and in that sense only.

If this diligence were to be granted I should give great weight to the argument of the defenders, that they are entitled to inquire into the whole matter retro from

No. 62.
Jan. 9, 1875.
Steven v. Nicoll, &c.

the present date to the date of granting the deed, for the pursuer, who challenges the deed, has, from the fact of present bankruptcy, a presumption in his favour of bankruptcy before, and the onus of rebutting that presumption lies on the defenders. That is an argument of great weight, but to grant this diligence would be to go against firmly established principles in the law of evidence.

LORD DEAS.—I am of the same opinion. If all the documents specified were recovered and in the hands of the defenders they would prove nothing, unless the owners of the books were called as witnesses.

LORD ARDMILLAN and LORD MURE concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the said interlocutor, except in so far as it grants diligence for recovery of the documents in article 4 of the specification, No. 16 of process, and grant commission for that purpose; refuse the diligence quoad ultra, reserving all questions of expenses; and remit the cause to the Lord Ordinary to proceed as accords."

ALEX. MORISON, S.S.C.—THOMSON, DICKSON, & SHAW, W.S.—Agents.

No. 63.
Jan. 9, 1875.
Rodger's Trustees v. Rodger.

MRS JANET SMITH OR RODGER AND OTHERS (Rodger's Trustees), First Parties.—D.-F. Clark—Mackintosh.
MRS JANET SMITH OR RODGER, Second Party.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Balfour.

Public Burdens—Exemption—Assessment—Gas and Water-Rates.—A truster provided that his widow should have the liferent use of his house "free of rent, feu-duty, ground-annual, taxes, and all other deductions." Held that the trustees were not bound to pay gas and water-rates for the widow.

Revenue—Agreement not to deduct Income-Tax—Income-Tax Act—5 and 6 Vict., cap. 35, sec. 103.—A husband directed his trustees to pay to his wife, if she survived him, "a free yearly annuity" of £1200, and he further provided that if she accepted this annuity it should be in full satisfaction of all her rights, legal and conventional. The wife survived, and accepted the annuity. Held that it was unnecessary to decide whether the bequest of a free annuity was equivalent to the bequest of an annuity free of income-tax, as, if it were, the widow, by accepting the annuity as in full of her legal rights, had entered into an agreement of the nature struck at by the Act 5 and 6 Vict., cap. 35, sec. 103.

1ST DIVISION. B.

THIS special case was brought by the trustees of the deceased James Rodger, of the first part, and Mrs Rodger, his widow, of the second part.

Mr Rodger died in May 1873, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement of date 31st December 1872.

The third and fourth purposes of the deed were as follows:—"In the third place, I direct and appoint that the said Mrs Janet Smith or Rodger, my wife, shall, in the event of her surviving me, have the liferent use and enjoyment of the house in which I reside at the time of my death, free of rent, feu-duty, ground-annual, taxes, and all other deductions. . . . In the fourth place, I direct and appoint my trustees to pay to my said wife, in the event of her surviving me, a free yearly annuity of £1200 sterling during all the days and years of her life." The deed contained this clause:—"And I do hereby further declare that the acceptance by my said wife of the foresaid provisions in her favour shall be deemed and taken to be in lieu and in full satisfaction to her of all the provisions in her favour contained in our contract of marriage, of date the 25th March

No. 63.

Jan. 9, 1875.

Rodger's Trustees v. Rodger.

1840, and also in lieu and in full satisfaction to her of all terce of lands, half of moveables, claims for aliment, and generally of all claims legally competent to her upon my decease."

Mrs Rodger was duly put in possession of the house, but a question arose as to whether she or the trust-estate was liable—(1) For the various burdens, taxes, and assessments payable in respect of the occupancy of the said house, and in particular for the police assessments and poor and school rates, which are levied partly on owners and partly on occupiers, and inhabited house-duty, which is levied on occupiers alone. (2) For the property-tax on the house, payable under schedule A of the Act 5 and 6 Vict., cap. 35, and subsequent statutes. (3) For the public water-rate on the said house levied by the corporation of Glasgow on owners, and also for the domestic water-rate on the said house, levied by that corporation on occupiers in respect of water supplied from the Glasgow Corporation Water-Works. (4) For the amount paid for gas consumed in said house, the same being payable to the corporation of Glasgow, and being charged according to the quantity of gas consumed as indicated by meter. (5) For the premiums of fire insurance payable for said house and furniture therein. (6) For the proportion of the expense effeiring to said house of the annual cost of keeping in order the pleasure-ground attached to the house in Park Gardens, Glasgow, which, by the titles, is imposed on the proprietors of the houses. (7) For the cost of repairs on said house, and in particular for a sum of £13, 13s. recently paid for painting, and a sum of larger amount payable for renewing the hot and cold water pipes throughout the house.

A question also arose as to whether Mrs Rodger was entitled to receive her annuity free of income-tax. In these circumstances, the parties submitted for the opinion and judgment of the Court the following questions:—(1) Do the various charges above set forth, or any, and which of them, fall to be paid by Mrs Rodger, or do they all, or any, and which of them, fall to be paid by the trustees? (2) Is Mrs Rodger entitled to receive her annuity from the trustees free of income-tax?

Argued for the first parties—(1) The provision in the deed was that Mrs Rodger should have the house "free of rent, feu-duty, ground-annual, taxes, and all other deductions." Under that there was certainly not included such burdens as water-rate or payment for gas, neither of these being taxes in the proper sense of the word, but payment for an article actually consumed. (2) The bequest of a free yearly annuity was not a bequest of an annuity free of income-tax, and, even if it were so, the provision was illegal under section 103 of 5 and 6 Vict., c. 35.* This was such an agreement as was struck at by the Act, for the widow was only entitled to accept the annuity if she agreed to accept it in lieu of her legal provisions.

Argued for the second party;—(1) Mrs Rodger was entitled to have the house free, not only of taxes proper, but of such payments as water and gas-rates, these being covered by the words, "all other deductions." (2) There was no other interpretation which could be put upon the words "free yearly annuity" than an annuity free of income-tax; and it was quite competent for the testator to make such a provision. This provision was not struck at by the 103d section of the Act 5 and 6 Vict., c. 35, for what was contemplated there was not such a stipulation as there was in this case, but a specific bargain.

* Sec. 103 enacts that "if any person shall refuse to allow any deduction authorised to be made by this Act out of any payment of rent, . . . or out of any annuity or annual payment mentioned in schedules C or E, ... every such person shall forfeit the sum of £50, and all contracts, covenants, and agreements made or entered into, or to be made and entered into, for payment of any interest, rent, or other annual payment aforesaid in full, without allowing such deduction as aforesaid, shall be utterly void."

No. 63. Jan. 9, 1875. Rodger's Trustees v. Rodger.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—As to the first question, I think that there is no real difficulty. The provision in favour of the wife is the following:—"In the third place, I direct and appoint that the said Mrs Janet Smith or Rodger, my wife, shall, in the event of her surviving me, have the liferent use and enjoyment of the house in which I reside at the time of my death, free of rent, feuduty, ground-annual, taxes, and all other deductions." This is not unlike the provision in the case of Clark, 9 Macph. 435.[1] The right of the widow here is not a right of tenancy. It is a liferent use of the house so long as she shall reside in it, and no longer; and she is to have that use "free of rent, feuduty, ground-annual, and all other deductions." Now, the word "deductions" here is unfortunate, as having no meaning, but it is clear that what the granter intended was, that the widow should take the house free from all taxes and payments of the same nature. So, except in regard to two, I think she is entitled to have the house free of the burdens mentioned in article 4. These two are—1st, the water-rate; and 2d, the amount paid for gas. The first of these, although a compulsory payment, is a payment for water actually consumed in the house. The matter of the gas payment is still more clear, for it is not a rate or tax at all, but merely a payment proportionate to the amount of gas consumed.

As to the second question, I am not prepared to say that the bequest of a free annuity to the widow is equivalent to saying that it is to be paid free of income-tax. But it is not necessary to determine that question here, for it is clear that the non-deduction of income-tax is illegal in terms of section 103 of the Income-Tax Act. It is in the trust-deed stipulated as a condition of the acceptance by the widow of the provisions therein made for her that she should be thereby barred from claiming her legal rights. Now, when the widow accepted the provisions on that condition she concluded an agreement with her deceased husband or his trustees. That being the case, the agreement is void by the 103d section of the Act.

LORD DEAS, LORD ARDMILLAN, and LORD MURE concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lords having heard counsel on the special case—1st, Find and declare that the various charges set forth in article 4 of the case fall to be paid by the trustees, parties of the first part, with the exceptions of the domestic water-rate therein mentioned and the money paid for gas consumed in the house, also therein mentioned, which fall to be paid by the party of the second part: 2d, Find and declare that the party of the second part is not entitled to receive her annuity from the trustees, parties of the first part, free of income-tax: . . . Authorise the trustees to pay the expenses of both parties, as taxed, out of the fund in their hands, and decern."

C. & A. S. DOUGLAS, W.S.—JOHN STEWART, W.S.—Agents.

---

[1] Clark, Jan. 19, 1871, 9 Macph. 435, 43 Scot. Jur. 213.

MALCOLM RITCHIE, Complainer.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Burnet.
JAMES H. BALGARNIE, Respondent.—Strachan.

No. 64.

Jan. 14, 1875.
Ritchie v. Balgarnie.

Bankruptcy—Deliverance—Claim—19 and 20 Vict. c. 79, secs. 126, 127.—A trustee on a sequestrated estate pronounced a deliverance rejecting the claim of a creditor as being insufficiently vouched, and allowing him to lodge further evidence within eight days. The creditor did not lodge further evidence within eight days, and did not appeal within the statutory period of fifteen days. In a suspension at his instance, the Court (rev. judgment of Lord Young) interdicted the trustee from paying a dividend till the creditor's claim had been disposed of by a deliverance admitting or rejecting it, the previous deliverance being held incompetent under the 126th section of the statute.

Observed (per Lord President), that when a trustee contemplates rejecting a claim by an alleged creditor on the ground that the claimant is a conjunct and confident person, the claimant is entitled to have an opportunity of leading evidence prout de jure to prove the reality of the transaction.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Young. M.

THE estates of Ritchie and Company, tea-merchants in Edinburgh, and of John Ritchie, the sole partner thereof, were sequestrated on 3d December 1873. Mr J. H. Balgarnie, C.A., was elected trustee.

Malcolm Ritchie, the bankrupt's father, lodged a claim for £406, being the amount of two bills alleged to have been drawn by him upon and accepted by the bankrupt. He produced the bills as vouchers.

The time for lodging claims expired on 3d April 1874, and on 17th April the respondent sent a printed circular to the complainer and the other creditors who had lodged claims, intimating that a dividend would be paid on 4th June 1874 to those creditors whose claims were admitted. The dividend proposed to be paid was 9s. 8d. per pound, and, in the event of the trustee's deliverances rejecting claims being appealed, 5s. 3d. per pound. In the circular to the complainer it was intimated that the following deliverance had been given upon his claim, viz.:—"The trustee rejects this claim as not being sufficiently vouched, the claimant being the bankrupt's father, and therefore conjunct and confident with him: Allows the claimant, however, eight days from this date to lodge any farther documents or evidence vouching or corroborating the whole or any part of such claim." (Intd.) "J. H. B. T."

Malcolm Ritchie did not tender further evidence within eight days, and did not appeal against this deliverance within the fifteen days allowed for appeal by the statute.[1] But after the lapse of that time he tendered further evidence, which the trustee declined to look at, on the ground that his deliverance had become final as a rejection of the claim.

Malcolm Ritchie then brought this suspension, praying that the trustee should be interdicted from paying any dividend until the complainer "had a proper opportunity to establish the claim lodged by him as a creditor on the said estate, and the said claim has been either admitted or rejected in terms of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856."

The Lord Ordinary on the Bills (Young) passed the note, and a record was made up.

The suspender pleaded;—(2) The respondent was not entitled to refuse to reconsider the complainer's claim on the ground that fifteen days had expired from the date of his deliverance of 17th April. (4) The respondent's deliverance of 17th April being unwarranted and unauthorised by the Bankruptcy Statute he is not entitled to plead its finality, and the complainer should now be allowed an opportunity of proving his claim.*

[1] Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, sec. 127.

* By the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, section 126, it is enacted, "that within fourteen days after the expiration of four months from the date of the

No. 64.

Jan. 14, 1875.
Ritchie v. Balgarnie.

The respondent pleaded that the deliverance was competent, and that after the lapse of fifteen days the deliverance was conclusive in so far as regarded the dividend in question, and operated as a final rejection of the claim.*

The Lord Ordinary, on 13th November 1874, refused the note of suspension.†

---

deliverance actually awarding sequestration the trustee shall examine the oaths and grounds of debt, and in writing reject or admit them, or require further evidence in support thereof, for which purpose he may examine the bankrupt, creditor, or any other party on oath relative thereto; and in case he shall reject any claim, he shall in his deliverance state the grounds of such rejection."

* By the 127th section it is enacted that . . . . "if any creditor be dissatisfied with the decision of the trustee he may appeal by a short written note to the Lord Ordinary or to the Sheriff; but if no such note be lodged with and marked by the Bill Chamber or Sheriff clerk (as the case may be) before the expiration of fifteen days from the date of the publication in the "Gazette" of the said notice, the decision of the trustee shall be final and conclusive so far as regards that dividend."

† "The question is whether the complainer has stated sufficient grounds for suspending the proceedings of the respondent as trustee in the sequestration of Ritchie and Company, with a view to the first statutory dividend, and interdicting payment thereof. The complaint involves no disputed facts, but rests exclusively on the terms of the trustee's deliverance upon the complainer's claim in the sequestration.

"The peculiarity in the deliverance is, that after formally and in terms rejecting the claim, the trustee 'allows the claimant, however, eight days from this date, April 17, to lodge any further documents or evidence vouching or corroborating the whole or any part of such claim.' The case turns on the effect of this peculiarity. I am unable to see clearly how the trustee, after rejecting the claim and declaring the first statutory dividend on that footing, could thereafter, with statutory regularity, of his own authority, have admitted the claimant to the benefit of that dividend had the claimant availed himself of the opportunity afforded him to the effect of establishing his claim to the satisfaction of the trustee. At least I see difficulty in the way of such a proceeding, and know of no authority for it. But it was unnecessary to consider that matter, for the claimant was not in a condition to avail himself, and in fact did not avail himself, of the opportunity which the trustee indulgently (and with questionable regularity) afforded to him. He did not lodge 'any further documents or evidence vouching or corroborating the whole or any part of such claim' within the eight days allowed to him for that purpose, or at any time thereafter. He does not allege now that he has any further documents or evidence, but only that, if allowed the opportunity of appealing, he may by argument satisfy the appellate tribunal that the documents and evidence which were before the trustee when he rejected the claim ought to have induced him to admit it. The purpose of this suspension is in truth to obtain for the complainer an opportunity of appealing against the judgment of the trustee after the lapse of the statutory period. But for this purpose I cannot, in the circumstances of the case, sustain it. I say in the circumstances of the case, because I think this Court has jurisdiction, which might be exercised by way of suspension, to afford relief to a claimant in a sequestration who had been misled to his prejudice by the form of the trustee's deliverance on his claim. But a party whose claim is rejected subject to further documents or evidence within eight days was put to the immediate consideration of the question whether or not he could lodge further documents or evidence, and if he determine that question in the negative, as the complainer did, I think he ought to consider his claim as rejected so far as the judgment of the trustee goes, and act accordingly. The eight days allowed by the trustee was not for argument or debate on the documents before him, and on which he had rejected the claim, but to 'lodge' further documents if the claimant had any. I am therefore of opinion that the note of suspension should be refused, with expenses."

The suspender reclaimed. No. 64.

Jan. 14, 1875. Ritchie v. Balgarnie.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case the claim was duly lodged with appropriate vouchers, which, in the ordinary case, the trustee would probably have held to be sufficient. But the claim having been made by the bankrupt's father, the trustee rejected it as insufficiently vouched, because the father was a conjunct and confident person; but, at the same time, he allowed eight days for the production of further evidence. That deliverance was not appealed, and, if it is competent, it is final. But I am of opinion that it is not a competent deliverance under the statute. There are only three deliverances which a trustee is empowered to issue. He must either admit a claim, or reject it, or require further evidence. It is quite incompetent to combine any of these alternatives, which may lead to different and opposite results from each other. The combination here attempted by the trustee is utterly inconsistent, quite as much so as if he had admitted the claim and at the same time required further evidence. I think therefore that the complainer is entitled to some remedy. If a trustee contemplates rejecting a creditor's claim on the ground that he is a conjunct and confident person, I think the creditor is entitled to have an opportunity of leading evidence prout de jure to prove the reality of the transaction, just as the trustee is entitled to lead evidence instructing fraud under the statute of 1621.

I am satisfied that Mr Balgarnie was not desirous of withholding from the complainer the opportunity of establishing his claim by additional evidence, if he had seen his way to do so in competent statutory form. What he ought to have done was to require further evidence, and to examine such witnesses as he himself thought proper, and any suggested to him by the complainer. I think that course ought still to be followed. But, meanwhile, the complainer is entitled to interdict against the funds being distributed, until his claim has been disposed of by being either admitted or rejected.

LORD DEAS, LORD ARDMILLAN, and LORD MURE concurred.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the said interlocutor: Sustain the reasons of suspension: Interdict, prohibit, and discharge the respondent from proceeding to divide the sequestrated estate, or any portion thereof, among the creditors of the bankrupt, until he shall have disposed of the complainer's claim, by a deliverance in terms of the statute, rejecting or admitting the same, and until the said deliverance has become final, and decern: Find the reclaimer entitled to expenses, and remit," &c.

NEIL M. CAMPBELL, S.S.C.—T. F. WEIR, S.S.C.—Agents.

GAVIN HAMILTON, Pursuer.—D.-F. Clark—M'Kechnie.
POLICE COMMISSIONERS OF DUNOON, Defenders.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Hunter.

No. 65.

Jan. 15, 1875. Hamilton v. Police Commissioners of Dunoon.

Burgh Election—Police Commissioners—Ballot Act, 1872, 35 and 36 Vict. c. 33, sec. 22—Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862, 25 and 26 Vict. c. 101, secs. 48 and 50—Royal Burghs Magistrates Act, 1833, 3 and 4 Will. IV. c. 76, secs. 8 and 10.—The Ballot Act, in enacting that "all municipal elections shall be conducted in the same manner in all respects in which the elections of councillors in" certain royal burghs "are directed to be conducted by the Acts in force at the date of the passing of this Act, as amended by this Act," only prescribes the mode of conducting the election in the sense of taking the votes, adding them up, and declaring the result, and does not repeal the provisions in secs. 48 and 50 of the Police and Improvement Act of 1862 as to the mode of dealing with an equality of votes and fixing the day of election of Police Commissioners.

No. 65.
Jan. 15, 1875.
Hamilton v. Police Commissioners of Dunoon.

Municipal Election—Ballot Act, 1872, 35 and 36 Vict. c. 33.—Observations as to irregularities by returning officers in the conduct of elections under the Ballot Act.

1st Division. Lord Gifford. B.

IN the year 1868 the inhabitants of the town of Dunoon adopted the General Police Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862, and on 19th October 1868 police commissioners were appointed for the first time. In terms of section 50, subsequent elections of commissioners took place annually on the same day of the month.

In 1873 the 19th of October was a Sunday, and the election took place on the following Monday. The election was conducted under the Ballot Act. For five vacancies there were six candidates, four of whom had a clear majority of votes. Mr Hamilton and Mr Garraway, the candidates lowest at the poll, received an equal number of votes. Mr Smith, the returning officer, under a mistaken view of his duty, gave a casting vote in favour of Mr Garraway, but this being objected to as illegal he withdrew his vote and made a double return.

Mr Hamilton then, at the first meeting of commissioners, held on 27th October, gave in a claim and protest setting forth that irregularities had been committed by the returning officer, and that he had a larger number of valid votes than Mr Garraway, and had been elected. The commissioners remitted this claim and protest to a committee, and at the same time, "resolved, in consequence of the said equality of votes, and in terms of the said 48th section of the Act, to take a vote as to whether the said James Garraway or Gavin Hamilton should be chosen to sit as a commissioner, and the commissioners unanimously resolved that the said James Garraway should, in terms of the said 48th section of the Act, be chosen and selected to sit as a commissioner for the burgh of Dunoon."

The committee reported to a meeting of commissioners, held on 29th November, that they were satisfied that the proceedings had been regular, and that Hamilton and Garraway had an equality of votes.

Mr Hamilton then raised an action of reduction against Mr Garraway, David Gray, clerk to the commissioners, and Robert Leslie Smith, the senior magistrate, who presided at the election. The summons called for production of the ballot papers, "as also a pretended declaration of the poll, or other writing or minute, whereby the defender, Robert Leslie Smith, the senior magistrate and returning officer foresaid, on or about the said 20th day of October, declared that William Campbell, builder, William Whitesmith, feuar, John Martin, draper, and Robert Walkinshaw Young, Royal Renfrewshire Militia, Dunmore, Kirn, had been elected commissioners for said burgh by a majority of votes, and that James Garraway, Franklin Villa, Hunter's Quay, in respect of his the said returning officer's casting vote, had a majority of votes over the pursuer, and whereby the said James Garraway was illegally declared to have been elected a commissioner along with said other commissioners in preference to the pursuer; as also certain minutes of the commissioners of police of said burgh, bearing date the 27th day of October last, recording a further illegal election by the defenders, the commissioners of police of said burgh, of the said James Garraway as one of said commissioners, and also recording the acceptance of office by the said William Campbell, William Whitesmith, John Martin, Robert Walkinshaw Young, and James Garraway;" and concluded for reduction of "the said pretended declaration of the poll, or other minute or writing, and minute or minutes of meeting of commissioners, and other papers, writings, and documents, in so far as they relate to the said pretended elections, and whole grounds and warrants thereof, and of the said acts and proceedings, and declarations and elections, and the said acts and proceedings, and declarations and pretended elections themselves of the said defender James Garraway as one of the commissioners of Dunoon," and to have the pursuer reponed and restored thereagainst in integrum, and for declarator that James Garraway had not been duly elected a commissioner, and that a new election should take place; or otherwise, that the pursuer should be declared to have had a greater number of votes than the defender Garraway, and was entitled to the office of commissioner.

No. 65.

Jan. 15, 1875.
Hamilton v. Police Commissioners of Dunoon.

The grounds on which the action was laid were:—

1. That the election had taken place on the wrong day, because, by sub-section 2 of section 22 of the Ballot Act,* the election was to be conducted in the same manner as under the Act 3 and 4 Will. IV., c. 76, which declared, by section 8, that elections should take place on the first Tuesday in November.

2. That as there had been an equality of votes for Mr Hamilton and Mr Garraway, a new election ought to have taken place under section 10 of 3 and 4 Will. IV., c. 76.†

3. That the election was void on account of irregularities committed at the election.‡ The chief of these was, that the returning officer did not impress the official stamp on each voting paper used at the time of giving it to the voter, but marked the papers in his own shop before the election began.

---

* "Sec. 20. The poll at every contested election shall, so far as circumstances admit, be conducted in the manner in which the poll is by this Act directed to be conducted at a contested parliamentary election, and, subject to the modifications expressed in the schedules annexed hereto such provisions of this Act and of the said schedules as relate to or are concerned with a poll at a parliamentary election shall apply to a poll at a contested municipal election: Provided as follows:— . . . . .

"A municipal election shall, except in so far as relates to the taking of the poll in the event of its being contested, be conducted in the manner in which it would have been conducted if this Act had not passed.

"Sec. 22. This part of this Act shall apply to Scotland, subject to the following provisions:—

"(1) The term 'mayor' shall mean the provost or other chief magistrate of a municipal borough as defined by this Act.

"(2) All municipal elections shall be conducted in the same manner in all respects in which elections of councillors in the royal burghs contained in schedule C to the Act of the session of the third and fourth years of the reign of King William the Fourth, chapter 76, intituled 'An Act to alter and amend the laws for the election of the Magistrates and Councillors of the Royal Burghs in Scotland,' are directed to be conducted by the Acts in force at the time of the passing of this Act as amended by this Act; and all such Acts shall apply to such elections accordingly."

† "Where there shall be a double return for any ward, or where any person elected shall decline accepting, then and in all such cases the presiding magistrate shall immediately appoint a new election of a councillor or councillors in place of him or them so chosen elsewhere and so declining, at the distance of not more than four nor less than two days, and affix notices of the day so appointed on the church doors of the burgh; and such election shall be proceeded in in all respects in the same manner in which the first election in the said wards or districts, and the taking the poll, casting up the votes, and declaring the result, is herein-before directed to proceed, until the council of such burgh shall be completed."

‡ The irregularities complained of are mentioned in the Lord Ordinary's note, p. 305.

No. 65.

Jan. 15, 1875. Hamilton v. Police Commissioners of Dunoon.

Defences against satisfying production were lodged for David Gray, clerk to the commissioners, which set out the proceedings in election, and the appointment of Mr Garraway by the commissioners, and then stated the following plea in law:—"The provisions of the 48th section of the General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862, having been duly observed in the election, inquiry, and subsequent vote of the commissioners set forth in the defenders' statement of facts, the election or appointment of the defender, James Garraway, and other proceedings complained of, cannot now be challenged, nor is the pursuer entitled to further scrutiny or counting of votes, nor to have production satisfied, and the action ought to be dismissed as incompetent."

The Lord Ordinary, on Feb. 19, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that section 48th of 'The General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862,' (25 and 26 Vict., cap. 101), has not been repealed by the Ballot Act, 1872,' (35 and 36 Vict., cap. 33), but that the said election is still in force: Finds that, assuming the election of commissioners of police of Dunoon, the polling at which election took place on 20th October 1873, to be in other respects legal and valid, the pursuer in the present case is barred by the statute from challenging the proceedings of the commissioners of police of date 27th October 1873, and of the committee named at said meeting, and, to this effect, sustains the preliminary defences stated for the defenders, and decerns: Quoad ultra repels said preliminary defences, so far as preliminary, and decerns; and, before farther answer, appoints the production to be satisfied by the transmission of the whole proceedings called for to the clerk of the process, and grants warrant for such transmission accordingly; declaring that the whole packets of counted and rejected ballot papers, tendered votes list, list of votes marked by presiding officer, statements relating thereto, declarations of inability to read, packets of counterfoils and marked copies of register in use at the election and at the poll for the election of commissioners for the burgh of Dunoon on the 20th day of October 1873, and declaration of the poll, shall be transmitted, under seal, or as they at present exist, under seal and with the seals unopened, to abide the orders of Court, and that the said sealed packets shall not be opened, or their contents examined, except under orders of Court, if any such orders shall be hereafter pronounced: Appoints said transmission to be made and production to be satisfied within fourteen days; reserves meantime all questions of expenses, and grants leave to reclaim against this interlocutor.*

* "NOTE.—. . . . The Lord Ordinary feels the question is attended with considerable difficulty, chiefly owing to the very complicated enactments of the Ballot Act, which, instead of containing a code in itself embracing the whole procedure, merely adopts, modifies, and varies, in a variety of ways, the provisions of a considerable number of previous statutes. On the whole, however, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the 48th section of the General Police Act, 1862, is not repealed, but, subject to the Ballot Act as to taking and declaring the poll, still regulates the election of the police commissioners of Dunoon.

"It is necessary to read the whole statutes together, or at least to consider their purview, and a large number of their special enactments. But, avoiding all detail, the Lord Ordinary will simply indicate the grounds upon which he has come to the conclusion above mentioned.

"1. Section 48 of the General Police Act of 1862 is not expressly repealed by the Ballot Act of 1872. The Ballot Act contains very carefully digested schedules of the Acts and parts of the Acts repealed; and although, in schedule 5th it specially repeals sections 46, 47, and 50 of the General Police Act of 1862, it leaves sections 48 and 49 untouched. Even sections 46, 47, and 50 are only repealed 'so far as their provisions are inconsistent with the provisions

No. 65.
Jan. 15, 1875.
Hamilton v. Police Commissioners of Dunoon.

A record was then made up, and the pursuer pleaded;—"(1) The proceedings which took place in connection with the pretended elections at of this Act.' This very careful and partial repeal of the Police Act of 1862 is the more remarkable, as the previous General Police Act (13 and 14 Vict. 33), is dealt with in precisely the same way, the relative section of that Act being left unrepealed, while sections on both sides of it are expressly repealed.

"2. Not only is there no express repeal of section 48 of the General Police Act of 1862, but the careful repeal of sections on both sides of it seems almost equivalent to an enactment in the Ballot Act that section 48 of the Police Act shall still remain in force. At least, it creates the strongest presumption that it was not the intention of the Legislature to interfere with this section 48. Sections 46, 47, and 50 are cut down, but 48 and 49, which could not have been overlooked by the Legislature, are allowed to stand. This view has the greater force when the extreme care and minuteness of the schedules are adverted to. They deal with even particular words of particular sections, which words are repealed, the rest of the sections remaining in force. The object of the Legislature seems to have been carefully to weed out from a large number of statutes (upwards of sixty in number) everything which was inconsistent with vote by ballot, and nothing else. This, in the Lord Ordinary's opinion, is the purview of the statute, its scope, and intention.

"3. The pursuer's contention that section 48 is repealed by implication by section 22 of the Ballot Act enacting that all municipal elections shall be conducted according to the provisions of 3 and 4 Will. IV., 76, depends entirely upon the true meaning of the word 'election.' Now, the single word 'election' is not defined in any of the interpretation clauses, and undoubtedly, in common language, it may be used either in a narrow or in a more extended sense. Keeping in view the spirit of the Ballot Act, however, the Lord Ordinary thinks that 'election' must be confined to the choice by the constituency of its representative, either parliamentary or municipal, and must not be extended (unless a necessity arises) to proceedings which arise after the poll has been closed and declared, and which proceedings are taken, not by the constituency, but by some third party,—for example, the commissioners, the town council, or by parliament. In particular, the Lord Ordinary thinks that proceedings regarding disputed elections, or proceedings when a double return has been made, are not, in the statutory sense, part of the 'election' itself, but are separate proceedings altogether, which may or may not result in a 'new election or in a scrutiny or new declaration of the election.' In short, they are proceedings regarding an election, but are not the 'election' itself. The Ballot Act did not, in general, intend to affect such proceedings, except in so far as they were necessarily affected by secret voting. This might be illustrated by a consideration of a large number of the special provisions of the Ballot Act in reference to contested elections and otherwise.

"4. The alleged implied repeal of section 48 must yield to what almost amounts to the express maintenance of that section, taken in combination with the scope and purport of the Ballot Act, and with the changes which it intended to effect.

"5. There is really no reason whatever for the repeal of section 48 of the Police Act of 1862. . . . .

"Such being the opinion at which the Lord Ordinary has arrived, it follows that the decision of the committee of five is final, and there having been equality of votes, the decision of the commissioners, that James Garraway should be preferred to the pursuer, cannot now be challenged.

"The shape of the case, however, must be kept in view. The present record is only closed upon preliminary defences objecting to satisfy the production, and the decisions of the committee of five and of the commissioners themselves are pleaded upon as final and excluding the pursuer from any further investigation. It may be said, perhaps, that the report of the committee of five, and the vote by the commissioners, are pleaded upon as a sort of title to exclude the pursuer from claiming Mr Garraway's place. In this view, the Lord Ordinary thinks the defenders' plea well founded. He thinks the decision of the com-

No. 65.
Jan. 15, 1875.
Hamilton v. Police Commissioners of Dunoon.

Dunoon, on the several dates mentioned in the summons, not being in compliance with, but in direct contravention of, statutory enactment, there has been no valid election of commissioners. No valid election did or could take place for the burgh of Dunoon on said 20th October 1873, and it was ultra vires of the returning officer or senior magistrate to have an election of commissioners on said day. (2) At least the said proceedings, so far as relating to the election of the defender Mr Garraway, by the proceedings at the poll, at the counting of the votes, by the casting vote of the returning officer, and subsequently by open vote of the commissioners, were altogether illegal and ultra vires, and his pretended election is void and null. (3) Certain of the ballot papers, counted as containing votes in favour of Mr Garraway not being officially marked, or being defective in the other requirements of the Ballot Act founded on in the summons, the returning officer was not entitled to count them, mittee of five and the vote of the commissioners are in conformity with section 48, which he holds to be still in force, and are protected by its provisions, and to this extent he sustains the preliminary defences.

---

"But then the pursuer does not content himself with challenging the proceedings of the committee of five, and the vote of the commissioners thereon—he challenges the whole 'election,' that is, the whole polling and proceedings at the poll taken on 20th October 1873. He says that the poll was not taken, and the result thereof not declared in terms of the Ballot Act, but that a great number of the essential provisions of the Ballot Act were violated or neglected. In consequence, the pursuer challenges not the election of Mr Garraway merely, but the election of the pursuer himself, and of all other commissioners who were elected or voted for at the poll of 20th October 1873, and he wants the whole proceedings at that poll, and all that followed on them, declared null and void. The pursuer's statements leading to this result are in articles 7, 8, and 9 of his condescendence.* It was not pleaded that these statements are irrelevant, and the Lord Ordinary does not see how the pursuer can be excluded from the general challenge. If the essential provisions of the Ballot Act were not observed, then there is no help for it; the whole election must be declared null. In this view, the Lord Ordinary thinks the pursuer's action cannot be excluded by the report of the committee of five, or by the vote of the commissioners. There could be no committee of five if there was no ballot at all. There could be no equality of votes if there were no legal votes at all.

"Accordingly, the Lord Ordinary thinks that, to a certain extent, the production must be ordered to be satisfied, and to this extent the preliminary defences repelled as preliminary. Keeping in view, however, the provisions of the Ballot Act, he thinks the ballot papers, tendered votes, spoiled papers, rejected votes, counterfoils, and other documents, should only be produced under seal, or with the seals unopened, for it is only in certain cases that the Court will allow them to be looked at. For example, rule 41st in schedule (I) provides that it is only by order of the House of Commons, or competent tribunal, that the sealed packet of counterfoils can be opened, or ballot papers inspected, and even when inspection is made care must be taken that the mode in which any particular elector has voted shall not be discovered, until (1) he has been proved to have voted, and (2) his vote has been declared by a competent Court to be invalid.

"The Lord Ordinary has endeavoured, in the preceding interlocutor, to carry out the views now explained, and he does not think there will be any practical difficulty in holding the production satisfied, so as to enable the Court to get at the merits of the pursuer's objections to the whole election in question. The Lord Ordinary has reserved all questions of expenses hoc statu, in conformity with the usual practice of dealing with preliminary defences. But the defenders have been successful on the only points of law hitherto argued. As the present decision may in one view terminate the litigation, the Lord Ordinary has given leave to reclaim."

* These objections are stated in the Lord Ordinary's note, postea, p. 305.

but was bound to have rejected them, and the non-compliance of the said returning officer having affected the result of the said election the same is void and null. (6) The election was not conducted in accordance with the principles laid down in the body of the Ballot Act, and the result was thereby affected, and in consequence the whole proceedings and elections are and should be declared to be null and void, and set aside, as concluded for.

The defenders pleaded that the proceedings had been regular.

The Lord Ordinary, on 10th July 1874, pronounced this interlocutor:—'Finds that, according to a sound construction of the statutes, the election of the commissioners of police for the burgh of Dunoon was validly and competently fixed to take place on 20th October 1873, and to this effect repels the first plea in law stated for the pursuer; reserving said plea in law and all other pleas of parties to all other effects: Quoad ultra, and before farther answer, allows to both parties a proof of their respective averments."

After the proof the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—'Repels the reasons of reduction: Assoilzies the defenders from the whole conclusions of the action, and decerns: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses, but subject to modification, so far as relates to the proof recently led and debate thereon, and, in the circumstances, modifies the expenses now found due by deducting from the taxed amount of such expenses one-third of the taxed amount of the defenders' expenses of and connected with the proof and debate thereon: Remits," &c.*

---

* "NOTE.—The most important and the most difficult questions raised in this case were disposed of by the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor of 19th February 1874. These questions were raised under preliminary defences. A farther point of law was disposed of by interlocutor of 10th July 1874, and the Lord Ordinary thought that the remaining points were so mixed with disputed matters of fact as to make a proof before answer expedient. The interlocutors of 19th February and 10th July 1874 have not been taken to review, although leave to reclaim was specially given. The Lord Ordinary's impression was that if the points of law were fixed there should have been no dispute about matters of fact, which consisted of alleged irregularities more or less technical. The parties, however, have contested the case to the end, and the whole remaining points now fall to be disposed of by final judgment.

'The Lord Ordinary, by interlocutor of 19th February 1874, held that the 16th section of 'The General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1872,' had not been repealed, but is still in force, and that in consequence thereof the pursuer was not entitled to challenge the proceedings of the commissioners and their committee. This finding, which is final in the Outer-House, in substance put an end to the competition between the pursuer and his rival candidate, Mr Garraway, and fixed that, assuming the election to be a good election at all, Mr Garraway, and not the pursuer, Mr Hamilton, had been elected a commissioner.

'The only question now remaining is in effect whether, in consequence of alleged irregularities, or alleged non-observance of statutory requisites, the whole election of commissioners is void, so that neither Mr Garraway nor the pursuer, nor any of the other gentlemen who were elected or returned on 20th October 1873, have been validly elected.

'After fully considering the whole alleged irregularities, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the pursuer has not succeeded in establishing by proof any such irregularities as are sufficient under the statute to void the election. It is true that in many respects the election seems to have proceeded somewhat loosely. In various respects there was not exact and full compliance with the 'rules' which the Ballot Act prescribes for parliamentary and municipal elections. A municipal election includes the election of commissioners in a burgh like Dunoon.

No. 65. The pursuer reclaimed.

Jan. 15, 1875. Hamilton v. Police Commissioners of Dunoon.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The pursuer was a candidate at the election of police commissioners of the burgh of Dunoon on 20th October 1873. He was not

Some of the irregularities were serious, and it has not been without difficulty that the Lord Ordinary has come to be of opinion that they are not fatal. If it had been shewn that any of them, or any of the more material of them, were intentional and in deliberate defiance of the statute and not mere innocent mistakes, the Lord Ordinary would have annulled the election. But it is quite clear, and indeed was not seriously disputed, that the proved irregularities were the result of innocent mistake or misapprehension on the part of those who were conducting the proceedings, and the Lord Ordinary is also satisfied that none of these mistakes or irregularities affected the principles laid down in the Ballot Act, or the result of the election.

"Now, it is very carefully provided by section 13 of the Ballot Act, that 'no election shall be declared invalid by reason of the non-compliance with the rules contained in the first schedule to this Act, or any mistake in the use of the forms in the second schedule to this Act, if it appears to the tribunal having cognisance of the question that the election was conducted in accordance with the principles laid down in the body of this Act, and that such non-compliance or mistake did not affect the result of the election.'

"There is a similar provision in the General Police Act of 1862, providing that elections shall not be set aside on technical mistakes or irregularities.

"The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the provision of section 13, and the relative provision in the Act of 1862, are sufficient to save the election in the present case from nullity, though it must be confessed that some of the irregularities deserve very severe censure. None of them affected the great principle of the Ballot Act,—secret voting; and every elector had fair and full opportunity to give his secret vote. The irregularities were in matters of detail. Some of them may have affected particular votes, and might have been important had this been a question of scrutiny, but none of them, in fairness, and, according to the reason of the thing, are sufficient to upset the whole election. It is unnecessary to notice the whole objections insisted in by the pursuer, many of which were exceedingly trifling; but one or two of the leading objections may be instanced.

(1) "One of the leading objections on record is, that no official stamping or marking instrument was provided or used at the election, and this implied that none of the ballot papers were officially marked. If this had been substantiated the Lord Ordinary rather thinks he must have cut down the election, for the result would have been that not a single good vote had been given. But what turned out upon proof and on inspection of the ballot papers was, that every ballot paper did bear the official mark, an impressed 'R,' visible on both sides, and impressed by the presiding officer as his official mark. The irregularity is, that instead of pressing each ballot paper with the 'R' at the time of giving it to the voter, the presiding officer, Mr Smith, in the morning, and before the poll opened, impressed the whole of the ballot-papers with his official mark 'R,' retaining the whole papers and the stamping instrument in his own possession until after the election. Now, this was a serious breach of the statutory rules, and the excuse for it—to save time and confusion during the voting, or when there might be a crowd of voters—is not satisfactory. But it is a very different question whether it is to annul the whole election. The object of the provision was to prevent the introduction into the ballot box of any voting papers excepting those delivered by the presiding officer to the voters, and this object was accomplished by Mr Smith himself keeping in his own custody all his marked voting papers and his stamping instrument all through the election. There could be no stamped voting papers in the ballot box but those given out by Mr Smith. He acted from the best motives, and his act did not affect the 'principles' of the Ballot Act, or the 'result of the election.' It was just such a mistake as is saved by section 13 of the Ballot Act.

successful, and the object of the present action is to have it declared that he ought to have been successful, and that he is entitled to hold the office of commissioner.

No. 65.

Jan. 15, 1875.

Hamilton v. Police Commissioners of Dunoon.

In the year 1868 the town of Dunoon adopted the Police Act of 1862. The

"It was no doubt very ingeniously urged for the pursuer, that the irregularity in question was not only a violation of the rules in the schedule, but a violation of the Ballot Act itself (section 2), which contains, more shortly expressed, many of the rules contained in the schedule. It was argued that section 13 may save violations of the rules, but not violations of the Act itself. The Lord Ordinary thinks this is much too strict a reading. Undoubtedly the thing done was a contravention of the 'rules,' and as such it is saved by section 13, although it also occurs in the statute. The 'rules' are expressly declared parts of the statute, and it seems out of the question to hold that the non-strict compliance with everything in section 2 must, without any discretion in the Court, absolutely void every election.

"Besides, and altogether apart from section 13, there is room for the distinction between provisions directory and provisions absolute and indispensable. Directions to the returning officer may be fulfilled by equivalents if this is innocently done; their violation does not at least necessarily annul the election. This principle seems to have been recognised as applicable to the Ballot Act in various English cases. See among others Pickering v. Starling, 13th January 1872, 28 Law Times, 111; Pickering v. James, 10th June 1873, Law Reports, 8 C. P. 489; Borough of Hackney, 15th and 16th April 1874, 31 Law Times, p. 69. In these cases all the Judges seem to recognise the broad distinction between provisions which affect the 'principle' of vote by ballot and mere details which are arbitrary, and the object of which may be accomplished in various ways. See Mr Justice Grove's opinion in the Hackney case.

"Another objection by the pursuer was, that the secrecy of the ballot had been infringed by the presiding officer announcing from time to time the numbers who had voted, for this, it was said, assuming the ballot papers to be consecutively numbered, would have enabled an expert note-taker to ascertain the relative numbers on the counterfoil, and so afterwards to identify any voting paper. It was proved in evidence, however, that the numbers who had voted were only mentioned to officials, all sworn to secrecy, and when no others were present. It would require very great expertness in a note-taker or observer to count and obtain the right numbers; and it was not shewn that any person had done this or attempted to do it. The only gentleman who was said might have done it was Mr Scoular, and the pursuer did not choose to call him as a witness. It has not been shewn that a single vote was known to anybody but the voter himself.

"It was attempted to be shewn that the presiding officer, Mr Smith, had not acted fairly and impartially. This objection utterly failed on proof. No doubt at eight o'clock, when the poll opened, a considerable number of voters came forward at once, and two voters, who had to leave by the 8.15 boat, could not get ballot papers in time, and had to leave without voting. But this was not Mr Smith's fault; he took the voters in their order, and identified and passed them as fast as he could. He rather did too much by pre-stamping the ballot papers to facilitate despatch.

"The other objections, omitting several of no moment, related to the non-sealing up of the papers, books, and lists used at the election. It was said that they were not sealed in separate packets, and were not sealed at the proper time. Then it is said that the rejected votes were not specially endorsed as rejected,—that at the counting the votes were not mixed, and the entire number of ballot papers were not counted before the votes were counted; then that the declaration of the result was not made at the right time, and also that the presiding officer himself should not have voted.

"Possibly the pursuer may be right in strict form upon some of these matters. It is not quite easy to read together and correctly the various provisions of the first election of commissioners took place on the 19th of October in the year 1868. The town of Dunoon had thus become a burgh for police purposes, and was governed by commissioners, in terms of the Police and Improvement Act of 1862. That statute provides (sec. 50)—"One-third of the commissioners, or, where the burgh is divided into wards, one-third of the commissioners for each ward, shall go annually out of office on the same day of the month as that on which the commissioners were elected into office, or on the next lawful day thereafter in each year, and on the same day of the month, or the next lawful day annually, the places of the commissioners going out of office shall be supplied by an equal number of new commissioners to be chosen from among the householders of the burgh in the manner aforesaid, under all the rules, regulations, and provisions applicable to such first election, and the like notice of such annual election shall be given as is hereinbefore directed to be given of such first election of commissioners." So that the election will always take place on the same day of the same month as the first election of the burgh of Dunoon, which took place on 19th October. Every fresh election of commissioners will take place on the 19th of October, or, in the case of that being a Sunday, on the following day. In 1873 the 19th October was a Sunday, and the election took place on the following Monday, and it cannot be disputed that that was the right day, unless section 50 of the Act of 1862 is repealed by the Ballot Act. I shall afterwards consider whether that is the effect of the Ballot Act.

No. 65.

Jan. 15, 1875. Hamilton v. Police Commissioners of Dunoon.

The election was conducted under the provisions of the Ballot Act, and professed to be so. The result was that there being five vacancies four of the candidates were returned by a clear apparent majority of votes, and as regards the fifth and sixth candidates they had an equality of votes, the one being the pursuer Hamilton and the other the defender Garraway. The Act of 1862, by section 48, provides a mode of dealing with such a double return. It provides,—"The commissioners elected under this Act shall at twelve of the clock noon on the first Monday after the first and each annual election, hold their first general meeting in the town hall or other convenient place within the burgh, with power to adjourn to any other day or place which they may think fit; and every person who may consider that he ought to have been returned as a commissioner may lodge a complaint in writing, signed by him or by some other person duly authorised on his behalf, with the commissioners assembled at such meeting, who shall thereupon remit to a committee of three or five of their number to inquire into the merits of such disputed election, and to report thereon to a subsequent meeting of the commissioners, and such report shall be final; and in case there shall be an equality of votes at any election, the commissioners shall determine by vote which of the candidates shall be preferred; statutes modified, altered, partially repealed, and affected as they are by the provisions of the Ballot Act, and the Lord Ordinary does not think it necessary to decide or lay down a code of procedure under the statute. It is enough that none of the objections affect the validity of the election as a whole. Some of them affect only the question of preference between the pursuer and Mr Garraway, and this matter has been finally determined under section 48 of the Police Act by the commissioners and their committee.

---

"On the whole, the pursuer has entirely failed in his action, and expenses must follow; but there is room for some modification in reference to the proof and debate thereon. The pursuer has established some irregularities which the defenders in fairness should have admitted. The Lord Ordinary thinks justice will be done by deducting a third from this part of the defenders' expenses."

No. 65.

Jan. 15, 1875. Hamilton v. Police Commissioners of Dunoon.

and no election or appointment under this Act shall thereafter be liable to be challenged, and no such election or appointment shall be quashed or set aside on account of any misnomer, omission, or other informality." Now, this was a rough-and-ready way introduced by the statute of disposing of a double return. It was desirable that there should be no protracted litigation, and the form of procedure was very expedient. It is quite clear that if the section applies, and it was duly followed by the commissioners, there can be no possibility of setting aside their decision either in this Court or anywhere else, because their decision is declared to be final. The commissioners did meet on the 27th October, and upon that occasion Gavin Hamilton, the pursuer, gave in what he called a claim and protest, which was in effect a statement that he ought to have been returned. The commissioners thereupon remitted this claim to a committee of five, in terms of the statute. They then took up the matter of the double return, and resolved, "in consequence of the said equality of votes, and in terms of the said 48th section of the Act, to take a vote as to whether the said James Garraway or Gavin Hamilton should be chosen to sit as a commissioner, and the commissioners unanimously resolved that the said James Garraway should, in terms of the said 48th section of the Act, be chosen and selected to sit as a commissioner for the burgh of Dunoon." The committee to whom the claim and protest of Mr Hamilton had been remitted then examined into it, and reported,—"The committee having considered the claim and protest by Mr Gavin Hamilton, of date 27th October last, and examined into the matter carefully, beg to report to the commissioners that they are satisfied that the proceedings have been conducted regularly and in order; and that James Garraway and Gavin Hamilton had, at the recent election, an equality of votes." The result of the whole proceeding was this, the claim and protest was found not to be well founded, and, the equality of votes being established, the commissioners had right to elect Mr Garraway. The proceedings were thus properly conducted under section 48 of the Police Act of 1862.

But the question remains whether sections 48 and 50 of the Police Act of 1862 are still in operation or are repealed by the sections of the Ballot Act which have been quoted to us. The object of the Ballot Act was to introduce a new mode of voting, and I am not aware that the Act has any other purpose. It is concerned with the mode of conducting elections, in the sense of taking the votes, adding them up, and thereafter declaring the result. The sections which we were particularly referred to were the 20th and 22d, which deal with municipal elections, and this election of commissioners for the burgh of Dunoon was, in the sense of the Act, a municipal election. Section 20 provides that "the poll at every contested municipal election shall, so far as circumstances admit, be conducted in the manner in which the poll is by this Act directed to be conducted at a contested parliamentary election, and, subject to the modifications expressed in the schedules annexed hereto, such provisions of this Act and of the said schedules as relate to or are concerned with a poll at a parliamentary election shall apply to a poll at a contested municipal election: Provided as follows." There then occur provisions which are principally applicable to English elections. Section 22 provides for the application of the Act to Scotch municipal elections, and in subsection 2 provides,—"This part of this Act shall apply to Scotland, subject to the following provisions:—(1) The term 'mayor' shall mean the provost or other chief magistrate of a municipal borough, as defined by this Act: (2) All municipal elections shall be conducted in the same manner in all respects

No. 65.

Jan. 15, 1875. Hamilton v. Police Commissioners of Dunoon.

in which elections of councillors in the royal burghs contained in schedule C to the Act of the session of the third and fourth years of the reign of King William the Fourth, chapter seventy-six, intituled 'An Act to alter and amend the laws for the election of the Magistrates and Councillors of the Royal Burghs in Scotland,' are directed to be conducted by the Acts in force at the time of the passing of this Act as amended by this Act; and all such Acts shall apply to such elections accordingly." Now, this is a little awkwardly expressed, but the meaning is clearly that municipal elections shall be conducted in the same way as in royal burghs by the statutes now in force as amended by the Ballot Act. Now, the way in which the statutes in force were amended by the Ballot Act was by the introduction of secret voting instead of open voting as these statutes provided. We must take the statutes with that addition of the Ballot Act. It is said that an election can no longer be conducted under the Act 1862 on account of sections 20 and 22 of the Ballot Act. The manner of election is now regulated by the Municipal Elections Act, 1870, as amended by the Ballot Act. But the inference which the pursuer deduces is that sections 50 and 48 of the Act of 1862 are repealed because they are inconsistent with the Act 3 and 4 Will. IV., c. 76, and the Ballot Act. If sections 50 and 48 were sections regulating the mode of conducting elections within the meaning of subsection 2 of the 22d section of the Ballot Act, the inference would be irresistible. But I apprehend that it is not so. Let us see what is said to have been done inconsistent with 3 and 4 Will. IV. c. 76. That Act requires by section 15 that elections shall take place on the 1st Tuesday of November. Therefore, says the pursuer, if that Act is in force, an election on 19th October is bad, because that is not the day prescribed by the statute. But, reverting to the words of the 22d section of the Ballot Act, we see that it refers to the Municipal Election Acts only in reference to the provisions which regulate the manner of conducting elections. What does that mean? It means that the taking and summing up the votes and declaring the result are to be governed by the Ballot Act and the statutes in force at the passing of that Act. But does the fixing the day for the election fall within this provision? Certainly not. Fixing the day for the election is antecedent to the election altogether, and the manner of conducting the election is not affected thereby.

It is true that section 50 of the Police Act of 1862 is repealed by the Ballot Act, but it is repealed with a qualification. The fifth schedule appended to the Ballot Act repeals, inter alia, the 50th section of the Police Act, "so far as their provisions are inconsistent with the provisions of this Act." Now, section 50 of the Police Act is in some respects quite inconsistent with the provisions of the Ballot Act, and to that extent it is repealed. Thus it provides that one-third of the commissioners are annually to go out of office, and their places are to be supplied by an equal number chosen "in the manner foresaid, under all the rules, regulations, and provisions applicable to such first election." Now, these rules, regulations, and provisions provided for open voting, after the old fashion, and are therefore necessarily repealed. But otherwise the 50th section, not being inconsistent with the Ballot Act, is not repealed. The Ballot Act dealing with secrecy of voting, the fixing of a day for election does not fall under its provisions.

As to the 48th section the matter is still more clear. It is said that it is repealed, because under section 10 of 3 and 4 Will. IV. a new election is the only remedy for a double return. But what is to take place in case of a double return is not a question as to the manner of conducting the election, and so does not fall under section 22 of the Ballot Act. The manner of conducting the election ends when the return is made. Here the return has been made, and the question as to the double return must be dealt with under the 48th section of the Police Act. The police commissioners, when they met after the election, were desired to choose one of the two candidates, who were returned as having an equal number of votes. They did so, but that was not an election; it was rather, what it is called by the Act, an appointment. The election was over, and resulted in a double return, and what was done afterwards was only a remedy for that difficulty. In like manner, the provisions of the 10th section of 3 and 4 Will. IV. have nothing to do with this. In case of a double return there is no doubt in that section a provision that there shall be a new election, which is to be begun again from the beginning, but the providing that an election is to take place is neither part of the old nor of the new election. It is very remarkable that while several sections of the Police Act of 1862 are repealed, section 48 is not mentioned at all, and, by way of contrast, that gives a very strong argument that it is still in force. I am therefore of opinion that, as regards the objection founded on the 22d section of the Ballot Act, the pursuer's case is not well founded.

No. 65.

Jan. 15, 1875.
Hamilton v. Police Commissioners of Dunoon.

The only other objections urged by the pursuer against the validity of the election in 1873 are founded on alleged irregularities in the manner of conducting the election under the Ballot Act. Now, each and all of these objections go to this, that if any one of them is well founded the entire election must be annulled. The result would not be merely the substitution of Hamilton for Garraway. I think that the pursuer is not entitled to insist on that result under this summons. He is not in a position to insist in objections which, if sustained, would annul the whole election. In the first place, he has not called the proper parties. In order to entitle him to challenge the whole election, he must call as defenders the five candidates who were declared to be elected. But he has only called Garraway, Mr Gray, clerk to the commissioners of police for the burgh of Dunoon, for himself and as representing them, and Mr Smith, the returning officer. Now, it is clear that no reduction which would have the effect of ousting the other four commissioners can be sustained unless they are all called. But it does not appear to have been the intention of the pursuer to annul the whole election. There is no conclusion to that effect, but only for annulling the proceedings as regards Garraway. So the objections to the proceedings as under the Ballot Act cannot be entertained under this summons. I therefore give no opinion upon these objections. I, however, may say that I concur with the Lord Ordinary that the way in which Mr Smith dealt with stamping the ballot papers was a very serious irregularity. Whether or not it would be sufficient to void the election I do not say.

LORD DEAS, LORD ARDMILLAN, and LORD MURE concurred.

THE COURT adhered to the three interlocutors.

ROBERT A. VEITCH, S.S.C.—SKENE, WEBSTER, & PEACOCK, W.S.—Agents.

No. 66. Jan. 15, 1875. Mackie's Trustees v. Mackie, &c.

THOMAS GLADSTONE AND OTHERS (Ivie Mackie's Trustees), First Parties.—D.-F. Clark—Gloag.

JOHN GLADSTONE MACKIE AND STUART MACKIE, Second Parties.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Blair.

DAVID FULTON, Third Party.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Blair.

MRS A. GLADSTONE OR MACKIE, Fourth Party.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Blair.

Revenue—Income-Tax—Statute 5 and 6 Vict. c. 35, sec. 103.—A testator left to his widow an annuity "free from all burdens, taxes, and deductions whatsoever," and declared it to be in full of all her legal rights. Held that she was entitled to the annuity without deduction of income-tax, and that the bequest was not struck at by the 103d section of the Property and Income-Tax Act, 1842.

Trust, administration of—Remuneration to Trustee.—Held that the trustees of a deceased partner, who had become entitled, under the contract of copartnery, to his share in the business, could not transact with the surviving partner, who was also one of the trustees, to the effect of giving him a larger share of profit than he formerly had, with a view of securing the continuance of his services as managing partner, on the ground that he was himself one of their number, and could not, as trustee, be auctor in rem suam.

2D DIVISION. R.

THIS special case was brought by Thomas Gladstone, David Fulton, and others trustees, under the trust-disposition and settlement, of the late Mr Ivie Mackie of Auchencairn, a partner of the firm of Findlater and Mackie, wine, spirit, and beer merchants, Manchester, as parties of the first part; John Gladstone Mackie and Stuart Mackie, Mr Mackie's two younger sons, and residuary legatees, of the second part; David Fulton, above mentioned, as the survivor of the original partners in the firm of Findlater and Mackie, of the third part; and Mrs Agnes Gladstone or Mackie, Mr Mackie's widow, of the fourth part.

The special case related, inter alia, to the two following points:—

I. By his settlement Mr Mackie (besides making provision for his children) directed his trustees to pay to his widow "an annuity, free from all burdens, taxes, and deductions whatsoever, of £2500 during all the days of her life," and added, "which provisions to my wife and children above written are hereby declared to be in full of all terce, right of dower, jus relictæ, . . . or any other claim or demand competent to them respectively by law in and through my decease."

It was maintained by Mrs Mackie, but denied by the trustees, that she was entitled to receive this annuity free of income-tax. Accordingly the question was submitted for the opinion and judgment of the Court. "Whether the parties of the first part are entitled and bound to pay to Mrs Mackie, the party of the fourth part, her annuity of £2500 free of income-tax?"

Argued for the trustees, the first parties;—(1) Deduction of income-tax was not intended; (2) if intended, it was not legal. This was not a simple legacy of an annuity. It was a legacy of an annuity for a consideration, namely, the discharge of all legal claims. It was therefore a contract for payment of an annuity in full, without allowing deduction of income-tax, in the sense of sec. 103 of the Property and Income-Tax Act, 1842,[1] and was void and illegal.[2]

---

[1] 5 and 6 Vict. c. 35, sec. 103, enacted as follows:—"All contracts, covenants, and agreements, made or entered into, or to be made or entered into, for payment of any interest, rent, or other annual payment aforesaid in full, without allowing such deductions as aforesaid, shall be utterly void."

[2] Blair v. Allen, Nov. 17, 1858, 21 D. 15, 31 Scot. Jur. 1; Robson v. Macnish, Feb. 2, 1861, 23 D. 429, 33 Scot. Jur. 217; Rodger's Trustees v. Rodger, Jan. 9, 1875, supra, p. 294.

No. 66.

Jan. 15, 1875.
Mackie's Trustees v. Mackie, &c.

Argued for Mrs Mackie, the fourth party;—(1) Deduction of income-tax was intended, for there was no other tax to which the words used by the truster could have reference; (2) It was not illegal, as the condition on which the annuity was given did not import a contract in the sense of the 103d section of the Property and Income-Tax Act, 1842.[1]

II. The business of Findlater and Mackie was carried on under a contract of copartnery, entered into on 3d October 1866, between Alexander Findlater, who died in August 1873, the truster, Ivie Mackie, who died in February 1873, David Fulton, one of Mr Mackie's trustees, who survived, and was one of the first parties, as well as the third party, to this case, and Edmund Aked Gladstone, who died in October 1873. Under this contract Messrs Findlater, Fulton, and Gladstone agreed to carry on business with Mr Mackie, "his executors, administrators, and testamentary nominee" for the term of their natural lives, subject to the termination of the partnership sooner under certain circumstances, and with power to any of the partners to withdraw on giving the others twelve months' notice.

The partners were to be interested in the profits of the concern in certain sixty-fourth shares, "such shares to be in lieu of all salaries or allowances to any partner or partners;" on the decease of any of the other partners their shares were to fall in to Mr Mackie, his executors, administrators, or testamentary nominee,—the result of which provision was, that at the date of this case Mr Mackie's trustees were in right of $\frac{11}{16}$th, and Mr Fulton of the remaining $\frac{5}{16}$th, shares in the concern.

By the 12th head of the contract of copartnery Mr Fulton was bound to give his undivided attention to the business of the partnership concern, and was prohibited from engaging in any other business.

The 33d head provided, "That at any time hereafter it shall be lawful for the parties hereto by an entry in the books of the partnership, signed by all the parties, to vary, alter, or add to any of the provisions in these presents; and such alterations or additions shall be binding on and conclusive against all the parties, as if same were originally part of, and incorporated with, these presents."

And the 34th, "That it shall be also lawful for the said Ivie Mackie to bequeath by will his share in the partnership to any person he shall think fit; and the person to whom such share shall be bequeathed shall stand in the place and stead of the said Ivie Mackie during the remaining continuance of the partnership; and all and every deed and deeds (if any), which shall be necessary for making such legatee (who is the person hereinbefore referred to as his 'testamentary nominee') a partner under the provisions of these presents, shall be executed by the said Alexander Findlater, David Fulton, and Edmund Aked Gladstone, and all other proper parties; and in case the said Ivie Mackie shall not exercise and make use of this power, then his share of and in the said partnership shall descend to his executors or administrators, who shall stand in the same position as the said Ivie Mackie now holds in said partnership."

Mr Mackie, by his general trust-disposition and settlement, directed his trustees to convey to his two sons, John Gladstone Mackie and Stuart Mackie, on the younger of them attaining twenty-five years of age, his share and interest in the concern of Findlater and Mackie.

John Gladstone Mackie and Stuart Mackie were, at the date of this case (24th October 1874), aged twenty and eighteen years respectively.

---

[1] Turner v. Mullineux, Jan. 16, 1861, 1 John. and Hem. 334; Festing v. Taylor and Duchess of Somerset, Jan. 14, 1862, 3 Best and Smith, 217 and 235.

No. 66.

Jan. 15, 1875.
Mackie's Trustees v. Mackie, &c.

In virtue of the contract of copartnery, and of Mr Mackie's trust-disposition and settlement, and until his sons attained the age of twenty-five years, his trustees and Mr Fulton became the only parties interested in the firm of Findlater and Mackie, the profits of which amounted to between £8000 and £9000 a-year. It was impossible that the trustees should take individually any active part in the management of the business. Mr Fulton had long been manager or joint manager of the concern, and its success came now to depend entirely on his attention. Under the altered circumstances of the firm, it became apparent that his share of the profits, which were confined to $\frac{7}{64}$ths of the whole, were insufficient to retain him in the business. As he was debarred by the contract of copartnery from receiving any salary as manager, and also from engaging in business on his own account, a proposal was made by the trustees to increase his share of the profits from $\frac{7}{64}$ths to $\frac{14}{64}$ths until the younger of the residuary legatees should attain the age of twenty-five years, on condition of his remaining in the business and applying himself exclusively to its interest as formerly. To this Mr Fulton agreed.

Doubts were, however, entertained by the trustees as to their powers in the matter, in consequence of Mr Fulton being himself one of their number; and, accordingly, the question was submitted for the opinion and judgment of the Court, "Whether, having respect to the terms of the contract of copartnership of 3d October 1866, and of the late Ivie Mackie's trust-disposition and settlement, his trustees, the parties hereto of the first part, have power to pay out of the profits of the firm of Findlater and Mackie, until the said Stuart Mackie, the youngest residuary legatee, attains the age of twenty-five, or for any and what period, such an allowance to the said David Fulton as, along with his $\frac{7}{64}$th shares of the net profits, shall not exceed $\frac{14}{64}$ths of the whole of the net profits; the said David Fulton, in consideration thereof, devoting himself exclusively to the business of the said firm of Findlater and Mackie during the said period?"

The Court appointed Mr Donald Beith, W.S., curator ad litem to the minors, parties of the second part. Mr Beith stated that, in his opinion, it was for the interest of the minors that the business of Findlater and Mackie should be carried on; that it could be carried on to most advantage under Mr Fulton; and that the proposal of the trustees as to his remuneration was reasonable.

Argued for the trustees, the first parties;—Though they were satisfied of the desirability of the arrangement proposed in the interest of all concerned the fact that Mr Fulton was one of their number rendered any such transaction between him and them illegal, on the principle that a trustee could not be auctor in rem suam.

Argued for the parties of the second and third parts;—The trustees having become partners for the time being in the concern, they were entitled, under the 33d head of the contract of copartnery, to vary the terms of the partnership, and to agree to give Mr Fulton a larger share of the profit than he was otherwise entitled to, notwithstanding that he happened to be a trustee as well as a partner.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—We have considered this case with great care, and have found some of the questions attended with considerable difficulty.

The first question is, whether the trustees are entitled and bound to pay to Mrs Mackie her annuity free of income-tax. I am of opinion that, under the terms of the will, they are so entitled and bound. The substance of the provision in favour of the widow is, that the income-tax, as well as the principal sum,

No. 66.

Jan. 15, 1875.
Mackie's Trustees v. Mackie, &c.

is a legacy, and that she is entitled to receive the full amount at the expense of the estate.

The case of Rodger's trustees, recently decided in the other division, has been strongly pressed upon our attention. I have looked into the papers in that case, and am satisfied that it does not touch the present question, or affect our judgment.

The only other important question is as to the legality of the trustees agreeing to increase Mr Fulton's share in the concern of Findlater and Mackie, until the residuary legatees attain the age of twenty-five years, in consideration of his devoting himself exclusively to the business of the concern. This question arises in peculiar circumstances, and the view of the trustees is rested on peculiar grounds. What they ask substantially is this, are we entitled to give Mr Fulton a considerably larger share in the business than he is entitled to under the contract of copartnery, on condition of his remaining in it and continuing the management? The circumstances, shortly stated, are these. Mr Mackie's settlement and the contract of copartnery both contemplated that on his death his share in the concern should go to his executors. Under the contract he reserved right to his representatives to take up his share, and in his settlement he left his share to his two younger sons, as his residuary legatees, equally between them on the younger of them attaining twenty-five years of age. In the meantime the executors hold themselves entitled to act as partners. The two sons are neither of them of the age of twenty-five; in fact neither has attained majority, although they are both very near it. The question is, therefore, whether the executors, as partners of the company, are entitled to make a present to Mr Fulton of part of the trust-estate. The ground upon which it is contended that they are is, that Mr Fulton is really the manager of the business, that his exertions have much contributed to its success, and that the continuance of his exclusive attention is essential to the preservation of the business for the beneficiaries, while the share of profit to which he is entitled under the contract of copartnery is not sufficient to tempt him to remain in the concern and devote himself exclusively to its interests.

Had the question been simply, whether the executors, as partners, have power to rearrange the terms of the contract of copartnery, so as to retain a copartner whose services are so invaluable in the business, there would have been a great deal of force in the view presented to us on their behalf.

On that aspect of the question I do not think it necessary to give a decided opinion, though my leaning certainly is to the view that, as partners, the executors would be entitled to make any arrangement which, in the exercise of their discretion, they deemed essential to the preservation and success of the business.

But the peculiarity of the case is, that Mr Fulton is not only the managing partner and substantially the person holding the command of the concern, but he is also one of the trustees. The question asked of us therefore comes to be, whether the trustees can give over to one of their number a considerable share in profits which belong to the trust-estate? That, I think, they cannot do. It is quite a different question from what they could have done had they and Mr Fulton been entirely separate, representing separate interests. The question here comes really to be, can the trustees, consisting, inter alios, of Mr Fulton, make that gentleman the gift, without consideration, of the difference between 7/64ths and 24/64ths of the profits of the concern, until the beneficiaries attain the age of twenty-five years? To hold that they can would be to go contrary to one of the fundamental rules governing the conduct of trustees, viz., that a trustee cannot be auctor in rem suam. That is quite conclusive to my mind in the present state of the circumstances. I am therefore for answering the question in the negative.

No. 66. Jan. 15, 1875. Mackie's Trustees v. Mackie, &c.

LORD NEAVES.—I quite concur with your Lordship, and will only add a remark upon one point.

I do not know how far the case has been framed upon the idea that the beneficiaries' power of interference is suspended till they attain the age of twenty-five years. The age at which they are to receive their shares is indeed twenty-five. But their right of challenging anything done in the meantime is not thereby limited. It does not follow that upon barely attaining majority they may not give a consent to prospective arrangement, which would preclude them from challenging what was done when they reach the age of twenty-five; that may depend upon what steps they take after attaining majority. They can hardly be allowed to stand aloof from majority till they are twenty-five, and then to come forward and object to what has been going on within their knowledge and without objection. An objection founded on the rule that a trustee cannot be auctor in rem suam does not import an absolute nullity, but is merely a ground for challenge, which must be adopted tempestivé.

Now, looking at this matter from another point of view, I would submit it for the consideration of the parties, whether, seeing that the beneficiaries are so nearly of age, it would not be advisable to wait until they attain majority, and then see whether some arrangement cannot be come to with them, which would put the proposed agreement, which is admittedly so essential to their interests, entirely beyond challenge.

I only throw this out as a suggestion. In the present circumstances I entirely agree in the answer which your Lordship proposes to give to the question.

LORD ORMIDALE concurred.

LORD GIFFORD.—I come to the same conclusion, and nearly on the same grounds.

On the first question I agree that the widow is entitled to her annuity free of income-tax, and I come to that result on a construction of the settlement. I can see no other deduction but income-tax which the testator could have had in view. The 103d clause of the Income-Tax Act is the only thing which raises any difficulty. But I do not think that it really applies to the present case. The prohibition of the statute strikes at contracts, whereby one party stipulates that his income-tax shall be paid by another,—for example, when a landlord attempts to bind his tenants to pay the income or property-tax which the law lays on the landlord himself. But a bequest like the present is not a contract, and it does not become so merely by the condition that it is to be in full of certain rights in the legatee.

On the other important question raised I also agree that the trustees have not power to do what they propose, especially seeing that Mr Fulton is one of their number. A trustee is not entitled to use his position as such for the advancement of his own individual interests.

But, further, it must be observed that the object of this case is to obtain, not only the opinion, but the judgment of the Court. I am of opinion that no judgment we could pronounce could ever preclude the minors from challenging the arrangement when they attain majority. I think it wholly incompetent, by making minors parties to a case even with the protection of a curator ad litem to preclude them from subsequent challenge.

No. 66.
Jan. 15, 1875.
Mackie's Trustees v. Mackie, &c.

I may add, that I fully concur in the remarks of Lord Neaves as to the possibility of a binding agreement being come to with the minors on this matter when they attain majority, and that although actual payment of their provisions is postponed till a later period.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced :—"The Lords, having heard counsel on the special case, are of opinion, and find (1) that the parties of the first part are entitled and bound to pay to Mrs Mackie, the party of the fourth part, her annuity of £2500 free of income-tax : . . . . . (3) That the parties of the first part are not entitled, in the circumstances set forth in the case, to make the proposed arrangement with Mr Fulton."

RONALD, RITCHIE, & ELLIS, W.S.—HUNTER, BLAIR, & COWAN, W.S.—Agents.

No. 67.
Jan. 15, 1875.
Lord Advocate v. Earl of Glasgow.

THE LORD ADVOCATE, Pursuer.—Rutherfurd.
THE EARL OF GLASGOW, Defender.—D.-F. Clark—Hamilton.

Revenue—Succession-Duty Act, 1853 (16 and 17 Vict. cap. 51), secs. 15, 34, 38.—An heir of entail in possession, with consent of the next three heirs, obtained authority to charge, and charged, the estate with debt, the next heir receiving, in consideration of his consent, from the heir in possession, a sum of money and a personal bond of annuity payable during their joint lives. In a question between the next heir and the Crown as to succession-duties, held (1) that the incumbrance was not an incumbrance created or incurred by the next heir in the sense of sec. 34 of the Succession-Duty Act; and (2) that the transaction was not an alienation of the succession, or an acceleration of the next heir's title in the sense of sec. 15,—and, therefore, that, in estimating the succession, the next heir was entitled to allowance for the incumbrance; but (3) that he was not entitled, under sec. 38, to allowance for the lapse of the annuity.

2D DIVISION. Lord Gifford. I.

THIS was an information by the Lord Advocate against George Frederick, Earl of Glasgow, which raised two questions regarding the succession-duty payable by the Earl on his succession to certain entailed estates upon the death of his brother, the late Earl James, in 1869.

In 1855 a deed of agreement was executed by the late Earl, the defender, who was next heir of entail, and the two heirs of entail next after him, to the effect that the late Earl was to make an application to the Court under the statutes 11 and 12 Vict. cap. 36, and 16 and 17 Vict. cap. 94, for authority to charge the lands of Hawkhead and Crawford Lindsay with £20,000, the other parties giving their consents. The Earl was to receive £19,000 and pay the interest on the £20,000, and to grant to the defender a personal bond of annuity for £1250 during their joint lives, and £1000 of the £20,000 out of which he was to pay the expenses of the proceedings. This transaction was carried out, and the late Earl granted bonds and dispositions in security over the lands to the extent of £20,000. The defender received an annuity of £1275, instead of £1250, as originally agreed upon.

In 1866, in terms of a similar agreement, £9440 additional was borrowed upon the lands by the late Earl, the defender receiving from him a personal bond of annuity for £500 during their joint lives, the sum of

No. 67. £2500 and £300 for expenses, and his daughter, a minor, the next heir after him, receiving £1425, being the sum calculated as the fair price of her consent.

Jan. 15, 1875. Lord Advocate v. Earl of Glasgow.

In a draft account of Earl James's succession, exhibited to the officers of Inland Revenue, the defender claimed, as a deduction, the interest payable on £29,440, the amount of the above sums charged on the lands.

The pursuer maintained that the defender was not entitled to any allowance for the sums charged,—(1) Because they were in the sense of the Succession-Duty Act, 1853, incumbrances created or incurred by himself;[1] (2) because they were alienations of the succession, and, to the extent to which the defender benefited, accelerations of his title to the succession;[2] (3) that the defender was in no view entitled to an allowance, in so far as he had benefited by the incumbrances.

The defender pleaded;—(2) That the incumbrances were not "created or incurred" by him; (3) that he was at least entitled to an allowance, in so far as he was not benefited; (4) or otherwise, under the 38th section of the Succession-Duty Act, 1853, the defender is entitled to an allowance in respect of the annuities of £1275 and £500, which came to an end on the death of the late Earl, as being property of which he was deprived on taking up the succession.[3]

The Lord Ordinary, on 23d June 1874, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that, in estimating the value of the succession of the late Earl of Glasgow, upon which succession succession-duty is chargeable against the present defender or respondent, the Right Honourable George Frederick Boyle, Earl of Glasgow, allowance must be made in respect of the following incumbrances affecting the said succession, that is to say, first," &c.; "and with this finding appoints the cause to be enrolled for further procedure: Finds the respondent entitled to the expenses hitherto incurred by him, and remits the account thereof, when lodged, to the Auditor of Court to tax the same, and to report; meantime grants leave to reclaim against this interlocutor." *

---

[1] 16 and 17 Vict. cap. 51, sec. 34.—"In estimating the value of a succession no allowance shall be made in respect of any incumbrance thereon created or incurred by the successor not made in execution of a prior special power of appointment, but an allowance shall be made in respect of all other incumbrances, and also in respect of any monies which the successor may, previously to his possession, have laid out in the substantial repairs or permanent improvement of real property comprised in his succession; provided that, upon any successor becoming entitled to real property subject to any prior principal charge, an allowance shall be made to him in respect only of the yearly sums payable by way of interest, or otherwise, on such charge as reducing the annual value pro tanto of such real property."

[2] Sec. 15.—". . . where . . . any succession shall, before the successor shall have become entitled thereto, or to the income thereof in possession, have become vested by alienation, or by any title not conferring a new succession in any other person, then the duty payable in respect thereof shall be paid at the same rate and time as the same would have been payable if no such alienation had been made or derivative title created; and where the title to any succession shall be accelerated by the surrender or extinction of any prior interests, then the duty thereon shall be payable at the same time and in the same manner as such duty would have been payable if no such acceleration had taken place."

[3] Sec. 38.—"Where any successor upon taking a succession shall be bound to relinquish or be deprived of any other property, the Commissioners shall, upon the computation of the assessable value of his succession, make such allowance to him as may be just in respect of the value of such property."

* "NOTE.—The question in this case arises principally under the 34th section of 'the Succession-Duty Act, 1853' (16 and 17 Vict. cap. 51). By this

No. 67.
Jan. 15, 1875.
Lord Advocate v. Earl of Glasgow.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—The present Earl had a succession in the sense of the Act, which the late Earl had no power to defeat.

statute heritable successions were made chargeable with succession-duty according to certain rules fixed and prescribed by the statute. Provision is made for estimating the value of the succession in a certain way, and for the amount and manner of payment of the succession-duty thereon.

"Section 34 of the statute enacts, inter alia, 'In estimating the value of a succession no allowance shall be made in respect of any incumbrance thereon created or incurred by the successor not made in execution of a prior special power of appointment, but an allowance shall be made in respect of all other incumbrances.' It is under this provision that the present question arises. The respondent, the present Earl of Glasgow, claims that allowance shall be made for the four bonds and dispositions in security mentioned in the preceding interlocutor as incumbrances diminishing or affecting the succession, the Lord Advocate and the Inland Revenue authorities maintaining that the respondent is not entitled to any allowance for these incumbrances, on the ground that, whatever be their form, they were, in the sense of the statute, 'created or incurred' by the respondent himself.

"There is no dispute that the late Earl of Glasgow is, in the sense of the statute, the 'predecessor,' and that the respondent, the present Earl of Glasgow, is, in the sense of the statute, the 'successor,' and parties are agreed as to the rate at which succession-duty is to be charged. The respondent is the brother and heir of entail of the late Earl, and succeeded as such under the various deeds of entail.

"It appears that in 1855, and again in 1866, the late Earl of Glasgow wished to borrow money on the security of the entailed estates. To accomplish this, under the provisions of the Entail Amendment Act, he required the consent of the defender as the next heir of entail (the heir presumptive), and of the next two heirs of entail then in existence after the defender. To obtain these consents the late Earl entered into the agreement set forth on record with the defender and with the other two succeeding heirs of entail. By these agreements the defender and the succeeding heirs consented to the late Earl borrowing upon the estates, and in consideration of such consents the late Earl agreed, inter alia, to grant certain bonds of annuity in favour of the respondent.

"The late Earl then applied to the Court, under the Entail Act, for power to charge the entailed estates. The defender and the other heirs consented. The Court then granted authority, and the late Earl of Glasgow executed the powers by granting bonds for £29,440, which sums were validly and effectually charged as incumbrances upon the entailed estates. The late Earl of Glasgow is the sole granter of the said bonds and dispositions in security, and he alone received the sums borrowed. Neither the defender nor the succeeding heirs of entail were ex facie parties to the deeds. About the same time, however, the late Earl implemented the obligations in the agreements, and, inter alia, granted personal bonds of annuity to the respondent, the annuities under which have been duly paid.

"The question is, are the bonds and dispositions in security of 1855 and 1866 incumbrances which, in the sense of the statute, have been created or incurred by the respondent himself? The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that they are not, and he has therefore found the respondent entitled to an allowance therefor.

"It is not immaterial, to begin with, that the respondent is no party to the bonds creating the incumbrances. It was not the respondent, but his late brother, who acknowledged receipt of the money, and who bound himself, the heirs of entail, and his own 'heirs, executors, and representatives whomsoever,' to repay the same. On the face of the deeds, the debts were incurred by the late Earl alone. It was not seriously disputed, however, that the Lord Advocate was entitled to get behind the deeds, and to shew what was the real nature of the transaction, in order to see who it was in reality that created the incumbrance.

"Accordingly, the whole agreements have been recovered, and the exact nature of the arrangements disclosed; but the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that neither

No. 67. The late Earl was nominally fiar, but practically he stood to his brother in the relation of a liferenter, and the present Earl had diminished his

Jan. 15, 1875.
Lord Advocate v. Earl of Glasgow.

in form nor in substance were the incumbrances created or incurred by the respondent.

"No doubt the respondent's consent was absolutely necessary under the Entail Acts, and there may be cases where he who consents to a deed may be held as the doer of it, but this principle seems to have no application to the present case. If the consent had been given gratuitously, it would have been very difficult to hold that all the bonds are, in a question of succession, to be dealt with as the respondent's own debts, although an ingenious argument going this full length was submitted for the Lord Advocate.

"In like manner, although the subsequent heiresses of entail apparently gratuitously consented to the late Earl's petition, they could hardly be held as the creators or granters of the incumbrance. None of them might ever succeed to the estates. Even the respondent himself was only heir presumptive; and if the late Earl had left a son, the rights of all the consenting parties would have been excluded. In such cases the incumbrances, beyond all doubt, would have been held as created by the late Earl alone, although he had to buy and pay for the necessary statutory consents.

"In truth, the transaction between the late Earl and the present respondent was of the nature of an inter vivos purchase. The late Earl wanted to raise money for his own purposes, and he had to buy the respondent's consent. He did so, whether for a large sum or for a small sum is quite immaterial, and having obtained such consent, the late Earl, and no one else, borrowed the money and burdened the estates.

"If, instead of burdening the lands under the Entail Act, the late Earl had disentailed and sold a part of the lands, it would have been difficult to hold that the present Earl would have been liable in succession-duty on the lands disentailed and sold.

"The true meaning of the 34th section of the statute is, that a successor is not to be allowed deduction for his own debts, e.g., post obit bonds which he has granted, anticipating the succession. But the reason of the clause does not reach the present case.

"The Lord Advocate strongly relied, however, on certain important judgments which have been pronounced in England, some of them in the House of Lords, under the statute now in question. The principal cases relied on were the following:—In re Peyton, July 6, 1861, 7 Hurlst. and Norman, p. 265; Attorney-General v. Floyer, July 6, 1861, 7 Hurlst. and Norman, 238, July 15, 1862,—in H. L., 9 Clark's Appeal Cases, 477; Attorney-General v. Sibthorp, June 9, 1858, 3 H. and N. 424; Attorney-General v. Braybrooke, May 8, 1860, 5 H. and N. 488; and Braybrooke v. Attorney-General, March 19, 1861, 9 Clark's H. L. Cases, 150; Attorney-General v. Lord Lorton, Feb. 9, 1861, 11 Irish Common Law Repts. 429; Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Harrison, as decided in the House of Lords, March 26, 1874, L. R. 7 E. and I. App. 1.

"Many of these cases bear upon the respondent's alternative plea, added during the debate, but they were mainly relied upon as shewing that when, under the English law of entail, a tenant for life combines with the tenant in tail or remainder man to re-settle the estate and create burdens thereon, the burdens or incumbrances are held under sec. 34 of the Succession-Duty Statute as being 'created or incurred,' not by the tenant for life, but by the tenant in tail or remainder man. The attempt was made, with great ingenuity, to assimilate the position or legal character of a tenant for life with that of an heir of entail in possession, and the remainder man was said to hold the same position as the next heir of entail. On carefully considering the cases quoted, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the analogy urged by the Lord Advocate does not hold, and that the English cases, when their true nature is examined into and seen, are, instead of being authorities for the Lord Advocate, really authorities for the respondent. For the question always was, who is the party who has really incurred the debt or incumbrance, according to the substance of the transaction?

succession by his own act.[1] If that is not clear, at all events the transaction amounted to an alienation of the succession and an acceleration of the defender's title, and therefore the duty was payable as if no such alienation or acceleration had taken place.[2]

No. 67.

Jan. 15, 1875. Lord Advocate v. Earl of Glasgow.

The defender argued;—The incumbrance was the act of the heir of entail himself, and he alone was empowered to create it by the 4th section of the Rutherfurd Act. A consenter is not the maker of the deed, whether the consent is gratuitous or for valuable consideration. The pursuer's contention was disallowed in the cases of Peyton and Braybrooke, cited by him. The 15th section had no application except where there was a vested interest in the successor, not a mere spes successionis.

Besides the defender was entitled to an allowance, in respect that the annuities had come to an end.

At advising,—

LORD ORMIDALE.—The question for the determination of the Court in this case is, whether the defender, the present Earl of Glasgow, is entitled, in accounting for the duties owing by him on his taking up the succession of his brother, the late Earl, to an allowance in respect of certain incumbrances on the estates of which the succession consists.

The circumstances, so far as material, in which this question presents itself, are shortly the following:—By agreements in 1855 and 1866 between the late Earl of Glasgow, as heir of entail in possession of the estates of Hawkhead and others, and his brother, the present Earl, as the heir of entail next in the order of succession, along with the two heirs of entail following in the order of succession, the necessary steps were to be taken to enable the late Earl to charge the entailed estates with the sums of £20,000 and £9440, to be borrowed by him on the security of the entailed estates in virtue of the statutes referred to in the record. By the agreements it was provided that, while the late Earl was to retain as his own funds and property £19,000 of the £20,000, and £5215 of the £9440 so to be borrowed, he was to pay over to the present Earl £1000 of the former sum, and £2500 of the latter, besides £1425 to another heir, and £300 for expenses, and was also to execute and deliver to the present Earl personal bonds of annuity for £1250 and £500, to be paid during their joint lives, and to terminate at the death of the first deceaser of them. The sums of £20,000 and £9440 were accordingly borrowed by the late Earl, and

---

In the English cases referred to it was held to be the tenant in tail or in remainder, and not the mere liferenter. On the very same principle, and applying as far as he can the tests and reasonings which governed the English decisions, the Lord Ordinary holds that in the present case the incumbrances were really created and incurred, not by the contingent presumptive or remote heirs of entail, to whom the succession had not opened, and to whom it might never open at all, but by the heir of entail in possession, who was, in the eye of law, and in the substance of the transaction in question, the fiar of the whole entailed estates.

"The alternative plea added by the respondent during the debate raises considerations of considerable nicety and interest; and if the respondent's first contention had failed, equity strongly supports the respondent's view. The cases above cited embrace those relating to this plea also. As the Lord Ordinary, however, has sustained the first pleas of the respondent, no decision is required on the alternative plea."

[1] The pursuer cited the authorities mentioned in the Lord Ordinary's note.

[2] 16 and 17 Vict. c. 51, sec. 15, supra, p. 318, note 2.

No. 67.

Jan. 15, 1875. Lord Advocate v. Earl of Glasgow.

charged by him as incumbrances on the entailed estates. He alone executed the bonds and dispositions in security which were granted to the lenders of the money, the present Earl not being a party to them at all. And the transaction was completed by the late Earl delivering to the present Earl bonds of annuity, and paying to him and the other consenting heirs the sums stipulated for in the agreements as the price or consideration in respect of which their consents were given.

In this state of matters, the present action has been raised for the purpose of having it determined whether any and what allowance ought to be made by the Crown to the defender, the present Earl of Glasgow, on settling with him for the duties in which he is liable in respect of the succession which has come to him on the death of the late Earl.

This question turns mainly on the 34th section of the Succession-Duties Act (16 and 17 Vict. cap. 51), whereby it is provided that,—"In estimating the value of a succession no allowance shall be made in respect of any incumbrance therein created or incurred by the successor not made in execution of a prior special power of appointment, but an allowance shall be made in respect of all other incumbrances." It is not matter of dispute, but, on the contrary, both parties are agreed, that in applying this enactment the late Earl of Glasgow is to be held as the predecessor, and the present Earl as the successor; and also that the incumbrances in question were not "made in execution of a prior special power of appointment." The dispute, therefore, is narrowed to the question, whether the incumbrances were created or incurred by the defender as successor. If they were, he is not entitled to any allowance, while, on the contrary, if they are held as not having been made by him, he is entitled to such allowance.

According to the form and terms of the incumbrances themselves, they certainly were not made by the defender, the present Earl of Glasgow, but by his predecessor, the late Earl. The bonds and dispositions in security, which constitute the incumbrances, were granted solely by the late Earl, and the present Earl was not ex facie a party to them at all. It cannot therefore be said, if the language or terms of the instruments constituting the incumbrances are alone looked at, that they have been "created or incurred" by the successor, the present Earl. Nor is it obvious why, in a matter of this kind, the form and language of the incumbrances ought not to be given effect to. The statute, being a fiscal one, ought, in conformity with an ordinary well known principle of construction, to be strictly interpreted. Not only so, but it has been ruled by the highest authority,—in the cases of Lord Saltoun v. the Advocate-General (3 Macqueen's Appeal Cases, p. 659), and Lord Braybrooke v. the Attorney-General (2 Clark's House of Lords Reports, p. 150),—that the Act is not to be construed according to the technicalities of the law of England or Scotland, but according to the popular use of the language employed in it.

I am not, however, to be understood as holding that the substance and reality of the transaction, independently of its form and terms, cannot be examined in order that it may be seen by or for whom the incumbrances were incurred or created. Accordingly, it may be right to keep in view that the defender, the present Earl of Glasgow, along with the next two heirs of entail following him in the order of succession, gave their consents to the incumbrances being incurred or created, and that they could not be effectually incurred or created without such consents. Nor is it to be overlooked that the present Earl did, in point of

No. 67.

Jan. 15, 1875.
Lord Advocate v. Earl of Glasgow.

fact, derive a considerable benefit from the incumbrances, in the shape of the annuities which were constituted in his favour, and the sums paid to him out of the money raised. But are either or both of these circumstances sufficient to entitle the Court to hold that the present and not the late Earl of Glasgow incurred or created the incumbrances? The mere consent of the present Earl to their creation cannot well be said to be sufficient to do this, for, if so, it might as well be said that the incumbrances were created or incurred by the two heirs of entail following him in the order of succession in respect of their consents. In one sense, not only the present Earl, but also both of these parties, incurred or created the incumbrances, inasmuch as they were all parties to one of the steps necessary to be taken before they could be effectually created or incurred. But, according to the statute, it does not seem to be contemplated, and there is certainly no express warrant for holding, that the present Earl is not to be entitled to an allowance for incumbrances merely because he had agreed to some step preliminary to their being created or incurred.

It might, no doubt, be different if it could be fairly held that, notwithstanding the form of the transaction and the terms of the incumbrances, they were in truth and reality created by and for the present Earl. But is this so? The present Earl, no doubt, obtained a benefit, which was granted to him as a consideration for his consent, without which the incumbrances could not have been created. It may, indeed, be assumed that one of the objects of the late Earl in creating the incumbrances was to benefit his brother and successor in his title and estates. That was a perfectly natural and legitimate object, and it might have been carried out in various ways. The result of its being carried out in the way in which it was in the present instance is to diminish the succession coming to the present Earl by the amount of the incumbrances.

In these circumstances, the view I am induced to adopt,—and it does not appear to me to be an unreasonable one,—is to hold that the late Earl of Glasgow, being desirous of obtaining the use of funds which he required, and at the same assisting his brother and next heir till the succession should open to him, resorted to the method for raising money which he did, and therefore that, in substance and reality, the incumbrances were incurred and created by him, and not by the present Earl. He was the heir of entail in possession and fiar of the estates, subject, of course, to the fetters of the entail; and he alone had any real or substantial power of dealing with them (Ersk. 3, 8, 29). The other heirs following him in the order of succession, including even the present Earl, neither had, nor, till the succession opened to them, could have had, any right to or beneficial interest in the estates. As remarked by the Lord Ordinary in the note to his interlocutor, "none of them might ever succeed to the estates. Even the present Earl was only heir-presumptive, and if the late Earl had left a son, the rights of all the consenting parties would have been excluded;" and not only so, but the defender's annuity would also, of course, have fallen on the death of the late Earl.

Having regard to these considerations, I am unable, so far as the 34th section of the statute is concerned, to hold that the incumbrances in question were created or incurred by the successor, the present Earl of Glasgow. The point does not, however, appear to have hitherto been matter of judicial determination in this Court; and not being conversant with the law or technicalities of real property in England, I am reluctant, for fear of misapprehension, to rest my opinion on the English cases referred to in the note to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and

No. 67.

Jan. 15, 1875.
Lord Advocate v. Earl of Glasgow.

commented on by both parties in the argument addressed to the Court. I may remark, however, with the Lord Ordinary, that, according to my reading of these cases, they are authorities in support of, rather than against, the views I have expressed. Thus, in re Peyton (7 Hurlst. and Norman's Exchequer Reports, p. 265), Baron Martin, in delivering the judgment of the Court, in reference to a question, whether a party to whom a succession had come, was entitled to an allowance in respect of a certain annuity and of certain mortgages, remarked,—"They are incumbrances created, it is true, by both Sir Henry Peyton and his father, but so far as they affect the succession they are in reality and substance created solely by Sir Henry Peyton. His father could not by any act of his affect the succession. We therefore think the annuity to Mr Algernon Peyton and the mortgage were incumbrances created by the successor, and his father's consent was necessary to the effectual creation of them." Now, when it is in view that in that case the party who was held to have created the incumbrances, occupied, as I understand the case, a position, as regarded his right in and power over the estate, similar to that which the late Earl of Glasgow occupied in the present instance, while the consenter occupied, as regarded his rights in and power over the estate, the position of the present Earl of Glasgow, the analogy between the two cases, and the effect of the decision in the one upon the other, become apparent. So, in the case of Lord Braybrooke v. the Attorney-General (9 Clark's House of Lords Reports, p. 150), it was held that the protector of a settlement—the position analogous to that of the present Earl of Glasgow when the incumbrances in question were created—giving his consent to a disposition of property, cannot be treated as the creator of such disposition.

In regard to the second and third pleas of the Crown, to the effect that to the extent at least to which the defender derived benefit from the transaction in question, the succession must be held to have been accelerated by him, and that, therefore, in terms of the latter part of section 15 of the statute, the duty payable on the succession must "be payable at the same time and in the same manner as such duty would have been payable if no such acceleration had taken place," and to the effect that in no view of the case is the defender entitled, in estimating the value of the succession, to an allowance in respect of the sums charged upon the estates, in so far as he has benefited by these sums, little or no argument was addressed to the Court in support of them. For myself, I think it sufficient to say that neither of these pleas are tenable in the circumstances which here occur; for there has been no acceleration of the succession, no re-settlement of the estates, no change made in the order or time of the succession, and no surrender or extinction by the defender of any prior right held or vested in him; and just as little can it be said that the defender has, in any correct sense, been so benefited by the incumbrances as that he must be deprived of the allowances to which he might otherwise be entitled in respect of them, for, although a consideration was given to him for his consent to the incumbrances being charged on the estates, his succession has, to the extent of these incumbrances, been diminished.

On the other hand, it was contended by the defender that, in terms of the 38th section of the Act, he was entitled to an allowance in respect of his annuities having come to an end on the death of his predecessor, the late Earl of Glasgow; and in support of this contention the cases of Lord Braybrooke v. the Attorney-General (9 Clark's House of Lords Reports, p. 150), the Attorney-General v. Floyer and Others (ib. p. 477), and the Commissioners of Inland

No. 67.

Jan. 15, 1875. Lord Advocate v. Earl of Glasgow.

Revenue v. Harrison (Law Reports, Appellate Series, vol. vii., p. 1), were cited and relied upon. But these cases are distinguishable from the present, inasmuch as while in them the annuity in dispute was charged on the estates constituting the succession, and was made to depend, not merely on the death of the predecessor, but also on the annuitant coming into possession of the estates as successor, here the annuities have not been charged on the estates at all, and were made to depend upon the death of the first deceaser of the late and the present Earl of Glasgow, and although it happened that its termination occurred at the same time as the death of the late and the present Earl coming into possession, it might have terminated on the death of the late Earl, and, if he had left a son, without the present Earl ever coming into possession at all. This, I apprehend, is a clear and material distinction, sufficient to displace the cases referred to as precedents to govern the present.

For the reasons I have now stated, I am of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary under review is well founded, and ought to be adhered to.

LORD NEAVES.—I am of the same opinion. The interpretation of the statute has been quite fixed in the former decisions, particularly in the case of Saltoun, and it must be interpreted according to reasonable language and popular use, in the general sense, and not upon technicalities. We must look to the position of the parties in possession of this entailed estate. The clause of the Act is,—"In estimating the value of a succession no allowance shall be made in respect of any incumbrance thereon created or incurred by the successor, but an allowance shall be made in respect of all other incumbrances." How this matter may stand under the English entail system I do not profess to know.

Our own system is intelligible to ourselves, and, I think, admits of no reasonable doubt in this case. This is a succession which the present Earl of Glasgow approaches upon the death of the party to whom he was heir-presumptive. He gets that succession, and the question then arises whether or not an allowance is to be made in respect of an incumbrance created; and if in estimating the value of a succession there is found to be an incumbrance created by the successor, or incurred by the successor, whatever that may mean, that is not to be given allowance for, because it is the party's own doing. But all other incumbrances are to be allowed for as truly diminishing the estate which reaches the successor, and which is his true succession. Now, in the case of an entail, in general there can be no voluntary incumbrance created except by the heir of entail in possession, and that cannot be done without consent. This was done in the lifetime of the late Earl of Glasgow, who was the heir of entail in possession. The fiar of the estate, who made the incumbrance, is the principal party undoubtedly. He is the only granter of the documents that passed, but for that purpose he was compelled to have the consent of his next heirs in order to make it effectual, and so as really to be a good security to the party. But still I think that the party who creates the incumbrance is the heir of entail in possession. What incurring an incumbrance means is not very clear, but in this case the incumbrance was created in the usual way that incumbrances are created, by such a bond as a fiar would have granted for a sum of money, and all that was necessary to give it validity as in a question with subsequent heirs of entail was the consent that was here given by the presumptive heir and the heirs who were more remote than the presumptive heir. Now, I cannot say that every consenter is to be held as either the creator or the incurrer of an incumbrance which is given by his consent.

No. 67.
Jan. 15, 1875.
Lord Advocate v. Earl of Glasgow.

But, then, it is said, the heir got some benefit by the transaction. And this brings us to considerations of very great delicacy. The late Lord Glasgow having no family of his own, and looking forward to his presumptive heir as likely to succeed him, had in his own mind, in all probability, as every man will have, that it was his duty to maintain the respectability of their position, if that was not already adequately provided for, and for that purpose he went into the market in order to enable him to act,—I do not say generously, though it was generous in one sense,—but justly. It was a claim upon him ex jure sanguinis to see that, for the sake of his father's memory and the respectability of the family and the good of the estate, the principal sum which he raised should be devoted in part to sustaining the respectability of the family and the comfort of his more immediate successors, and to that purpose the incumbrance was to a certain extent applied. But that was the mere application of the fund raised by the late Earl to the purposes of the late Earl. It was his desire and purpose not to make a profit of this transaction, but to enable him thereby to discharge the natural claims and charities that existed in this case. He got the money for that purpose, and he applied it to that purpose. Now, I cannot conceive that that is an incumbrance either created or incurred by the heir, particularly when he might never have succeeded.

With regard to the proposition which the present Earl has been by degrees moving towards, viz., maintaining that he should get an allowance for the annuity that has fallen, I concur with Lord Ormidale in thinking that that cannot be allowed. I do not think the English cases on that subject are applicable. I think that the terms of this bond are peculiar. It was not a bond that was to terminate upon the present Lord Glasgow succeeding to the estate. That is not the nature of it. It was to exist during the joint lives of the parties. Now, it might have happened that the bond might have terminated in various ways before the succession opened, or the succession might have opened before it had terminated. Supposing the late Earl of Glasgow had committed an irritancy, he would have forfeited the estate, and the next presumptive heir would have been entitled to take up the estate. It was a bond that was to continue during the joint lives, and therefore it was not an interest that was inseparably entwined in its own nature and constitution with the succession to the estate, and could not therefore be held as a loss to be set off against the benefit that was got from it. I look on that as an independent transaction in that way.

Lord Gifford.—I remain of the opinion which I formed as Lord Ordinary, and adhere to the views which I have explained in the note to the interlocutor which we are now reviewing. Upon the first question in the case, which relates to the incumbrances, I think that upon any sound construction of the statute they cannot be held as having been created by the successor. They were created by the late Earl of Glasgow, for whatever purpose, and not by the present Lord Glasgow. I reach that conclusion not only from the words of the statute, but from a consideration of its purpose and object. That is the only additional remark on this first point of the case that I wish to make. The object of the statute is to impose duties for the benefit of the Crown or the country upon a succession, that is, upon the amount or value of property which has passed by succession from the dead to the living, and directions are given in the statute as to what is to be understood by the term "predecessor," and what by the term "successor." The object, then, being a tax upon succession, it is essential to ascertain what the true amount or value of the succession is, that is, in other words, how much is the heir or successor lucratus or richer in consequence of the succession,—for that is the quantum upon which the law has thought proper to lay the tax or duty. It is plain that a man is not richer by a nominal succession if there are incumbrances or burdens by which it is either diminished or exhausted. A succession is not a succession at all for purposes of taxation if it is exhausted altogether by burdens or incumbrances affecting it. The heir may still succeed to an inheritance of some kind, but it is a very barren one if it is exhausted by the incumbrances or burdens affecting it. Therefore, in the general case, under the section with which we are dealing, section 34, all incumbrances must be deducted. But, then, it sometimes happens that a party is in such a position that, having the hope of a succession, he may anticipate it, and get some of it before the succession opens. By post obit bonds, and other devices which are known to impecunious or needy heirs, they can anticipate the benefit which is to come to them, and the purview of the statute was that a man should not escape the payment of the public tax or duty which is imposed upon the succession by anticipating the benefit of it and creating incumbrances upon it before the succession opened, and it is therefore that the statute provides, by section 34, that in estimating the value of the succession no allowance shall be made in respect of any incumbrance thereon created or incurred by the successor,—that is to say, the party on whom the duty is imposed (the successor), shall pay for both what he has got before the succession opens and for what he beneficially receives after the succession opens, because in reality that is the true value of the succession. Now, I think, according to a fair construction of that principle, it leads necessarily to this, that it must be the successor that anticipated the succession and got a part of it before it opened. Now, I do not think that that has been said to be the case here. It was exactly the same, as stated in the illustrations in the note,—and I do not see any answer to it, and have heard none from the bar,—as if the parties had concurred in selling a part of the entailed estate. Suppose a power of sale had been asked and consent given, the succession can never be after that anything more than what is left of the estate, for there can be no succession to what has been sold or alienated by the possessor long before his death. And it is nothing to the purpose that, as the price of the consent which entitled and enabled the predecessor to sell, he has paid something to the successor. That is not the successor anticipating his succession. It is an inter vivos bargain between the predecessor and successor,—that is, between the late Earl of Glasgow and the heir presumptive, who never might have any right at all to the estate. On that ground, and upon the purview of the statute, as well as its words, I think that this incumbrance cannot be held in the sense of the statute to be incurred by the successor.

No. 67.

Jan. 15, 1875.
Lord Advocate v. Earl of Glasgow.

On the second branch of the case, which was argued before me in the Outer-House only as an alternative view, and therefore was not disposed of by me in the interlocutor or note which I pronounced then, but which, as Lord Neaves expresses it, the successor has been gradually bringing up in the course of the litigation,—that besides being entitled to deduction for the bonds and incumbrances, he is also entitled to deduction for the value of the annuity which happened to cease at the time of the succession opening—I concur with the opinions of both your Lordships who have hitherto expressed them. I think that the fallacy here is that the annuity which the successor was enjoying was an annuity which he was bound to relinquish, or which he was deprived of on succeeding. It is necessary to look at the very words of the statute, and the words of the 38th section under which this part of the case arises are these,—"When any successor, upon taking a succession, shall be bound to relinquish or be deprived of any other property," then the commissioners shall make deduction therefrom. The two expressions, under one or other of which the present Earl of Glasgow must shew that he comes in order to succeed in his contention, are, "bound to relinquish," or "be deprived of." Now, I think neither of these expressions apply to the position in which he is. He was not bound to "relinquish" his annuity, which came to a natural end. He stipulated for it for a limited period—no doubt a period depending on conditions, but depending on conditions which did not impose any obligations on him. He was not bound to relinquish; neither was he deprived of it, for a man cannot be said to be deprived of that which comes to its natural termination. It ends; there is no deprivation of it. The case intended by the clause to be provided for is, I think, a very obvious case, and is very familiar in our own law. It sometimes happens that entailed estates are so settled that they must always be kept apart, so that an heir of entail in one set of lands will not be entitled to succeed under another entail to other lands without giving up the first. They shall be separate families, and never be merged. Now, it is that kind of case which is intended to be provided for by the section in question; and it is quite in conformity with the purview of the statute, because the question is,—What will be his succession—how much will he be richer? Now, a man who is bound as a condition of taking up the succession to one entailed estate to give up another entailed estate, is only richer by the difference between the two, and it would be very unfair to make him pay on the whole value of the new one as the succession, when the condition to his succession was to give up, it may be, one-half the value in the previous estate. That is quite an intelligible case, and quite satisfies the purpose of this statute. And, therefore, I think the contention to which the defender has gradually come is rather an unreasonable one, especially looking to the fact that this bond of annuity is just part of the transaction which was entered into between himself and the Earl of Glasgow under the deeds in question. I am therefore of opinion that, in addition to the point disposed of by the interlocutor, this claim must be repelled.

No. 67.

Jan. 15, 1875. Lord Advocate v. Earl of Glasgow.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I concur entirely in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary and in the note he has appended to his interlocutor, and I only summarise my views in a few sentences because of the general nature of the points involved and their importance. In regard to the first of these points, the question is whether in this case the burden in question was created or incurred by the present Earl. In the ordinary legal phraseology with which we are conversant it is impossible to say that a substitute heir of entail, not being the heir in possession, can either incur or create a burden on the entailed estate. He has no power to do so. He may indeed grant rights to take effect after his succession and he may grant such rights, perhaps, during the period when the former heir is in possession, but he cannot grant a right which shall burden an estate; he cannot incur or create an incumbrance on this estate to take effect during the possession of a predecessor. No such act is alleged here. The alleged incumbrance was granted and made effectual by his predecessor, and was one which neither with nor without consent, the substitute heir, the present Lord Glasgow, had himself power to impose. A substitute heir of entail is not a proprietor in any sense; he is an heir-expectant under a protected destination, and the creditor for the preservation of that protection. He has a right to make his jus crediti good by action, and can thus prevent its being defeated; while the heir in possession is sole fiar, although limited in his enjoyment of his estate by the jus crediti of the substitute heirs. Thus the consents provided for in the recent entail statutes infer a renouncing by certain substitute heirs of their right of action in the event of a specific contravention; and if the requisite number abandon their right, the rest of the substitute heirs are excluded. But those provisions cannot and do not confer on a substitute heir, not in possession, any active right whatever as regards the estate. Now, as I read the English authorities, they tend strongly in the same direction. The apparent analogy in favour of the Crown arises solely from the difference in their mode of conveyance. In England the tenant for life is in possession; the tenant in tail has the radical right remaining in him, burdened by the right of the tenant for life, and on the expiration of that right, then the radical right of the tenant in tail emerges. Now, in the English cases it has been held under this clause that the joint act of a tenant for life and of a tenant in tail in creating a burden over the estate is to be held the incurring or the creation of an incumbrance by the tenant in tail, notwithstanding that he could not create an incumbrance without the consent of the tenant for life. That illustrates very strongly the view that I have now been taking; for the radical right remaining and being vested in the tenant in tail, he was in the position of the heir in possession. He had the fee, the other was only an incumbrancer. Here the fiar is the heir in possession. The right of the substitute heir is a jus crediti, not a real right in the estate; and I think, consequently—apart altogether from the views which Lord Gifford has stated, clearly and strongly—he cannot be said to incur or create an incumbrance of this kind.

No. 67.

Jan. 15, 1875. Lord Advocate v. Earl of Glasgow.

As regards the allowance claimed for the annuity which fell on the late Lord Glasgow's death, I can see no ground for that. The present Earl was not deprived of anything by the late Earl's death in regard to the annuity, for he received all for which he stipulated; the annuity only ceased at its stipulated term. His succession to the estate was co-incident with the cessation of the annuity; but they were not cause and effect. The annuity would have ceased although the present Earl had never succeeded,—as, for instance, if the late Earl had had children. In like manner, the annuity might have continued though he had succeeded, as in the case of the late Earl having committed irritancy and forfeited the estate during his life. The decision in Harrison's case is unquestionably a very weighty one, and whatever I might have thought of its merits I should have had great hesitation in going against a decision of the House of Lords in regard to the construction of an imperial statute if the interests in question had been similar; but looking to the ground on which that case was determined, and especially to Lord Selborne's judgment, I cannot help seeing that the tenant in tail had the radical right and interest in him at a time when this annuity transaction was entered into, for Lord Selborne rather seems to think that it was a payment out of his own estate which was stipulated for by mere anticipation,—I say, looking at that, I cannot apply the grounds of judgment in Harrison's case to the relations in which the parties here stand. Your Lordships adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

No. 67.

Jan. 15, 1875. Lord Advocate v. Earl of Glasgow.

THE COURT adhered. The defender was found entitled to additional expenses, modified to two-thirds, on account of his 4th plea having been insisted in.

SOLICITOR OF INLAND REVENUE—HOPE, MACKAY, & MANN, W.S.—Agents.

No. 68.

Jan. 15, 1875. Beattie v. Arbuckle.

PETER BEATTIE, Pursuer and Appellant.—Fraser—R. V. Campbell.
JOHN ARBUCKLE, Defender and Respondent.—Asher—M'Kechnie.

Poor-Law Act, 1845, sec. 70—Admission—Fraud.—When a parish has admitted liability for the support of a pauper, and acted on the admission for a length of time, it cannot open up the question of liability on the ground that the admission was made in error as to the facts, partly induced by bona fide misstatements by the inspector of the parish to whom the admission had been made.

Poor—Admission—Rehabilitation.—Where a parish had admitted liability for the relief of a pauper, and continued to relieve her for five years and seven months, after which she resided with a sister for five months without drawing parochial relief, but then was removed to an asylum, the medical officer certifying that she had been insane for six weeks before her removal,—held that there had been no interruption of the pauperism so as to raise of new the question of settlement.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Lanarkshire. I.

ON 18th June 1862 Peter Beattie, the inspector of poor of Barony Parish, Glasgow, wrote to John Hall, inspector of poor of Cambuslang Parish, stating that a pauper, the wife of a man Moyes, had become chargeable in Barony Parish, and giving notice that Barony Parish claimed relief from Cambuslang, as the parish of the husband's birth-settlement.

Some correspondence followed between the inspectors, in the course of which Beattie supplied Hall with a statement of the husband's residences, from which it appeared he had no residential settlement in any parish, but no admission was given by Hall.

The pauper's husband died in July 1862, and she still continued chargeable.

On 25th February 1863 Beattie again wrote Hall as follows:—"Case of David Moyes' wife.—Dear Sir,—I have had this case carefully re-investigated, and there does not appear to be the slightest shade of an acquired settlement existing. . . . . I will thank you for an early admission of liability, with instructions."

Hall replied on 6th March 1863:—"Dear Sir,—I duly received yours of the 25th ult. in reply to my letter of the 16th July last; and from the facts therein contained, in connection with personal inquiries, I am now satisfied that said David Moyes had no resident settlement at the time of his death, and therefore admit liability." Hall accordingly reimbursed Beattie for his previous expenditure, and continued to relieve the pauper till 13th April 1868, when she became insane in Barony, and was removed by Beattie to Gartnavel Asylum, but her name was not removed from the books of Cambuslang. She was discharged from the asylum in June 1868, and continued to be relieved by Cambuslang until September of that year.

For the space of five months after this she resided with her sister, and did not draw any parochial relief, although it did not appear that her name was ever struck off the books of Cambuslang. On 13th March 1869 she again became insane and chargeable in Barony, having been, according to the medical officer's certificate, in a state of insanity for six weeks before. She was again removed to Gartnavel by Beattie, and kept there till 25th October 1872, when she was removed to the Argyle Asylum at Lochgilphead, where she was still detained at the date of this action. Statutory notice of this chargeability was duly sent to Cambuslang on 17th March 1869.

No. 68.

Jan. 15, 1875.
Beattie v. Arbuckle.

Beattie, founding upon Hall's admission of liability on 6th March 1863, claimed relief of the charges incurred since 13th March 1869 from Cambuslang, but Arbuckle, who had succeeded Hall as inspector of that parish, refused to admit liability. Beattie accordingly, on 31st March 1873, raised this action in the Sheriff-court of Lanarkshire, concluding for £130 odds, as outlays on behalf of the pauper. He stated in his condescendence—(Cond. 5) "On or about 6th March 1863 the parish of Cambuslang admitted liability for the pauper, and reimbursed the pursuer his advances to her and her children, and continued to afford them relief down to the month of April 1868." To this Arbuckle answered:—Ans. 5) "Explained that the admission of liability of Cambuslang was done under a mistake, and claim is reserved for the sums paid by Cambuslang Parish."

Arbuckle stated in his defences that the pauper's husband had, in point of fact, prior to 1862, acquired a residential settlement in Barony Parish, and that parish was therefore bound to relieve her.

The Sheriff-substitute (Clark), after a proof as to the husband's residence, pronounced, on 16th March 1874, this interlocutor:—"Finds that the pauper has been all along chargeable to the parish of Barony of Glasgow (of which the pursuer is inspector), in virtue of the residential settlement of her late husband acquired there prior to 8th August 1855: Therefore assoilzies the defender, inspector of the parish of Cambuslang, from the conclusions of the action: But, in the circumstances of the case, finds no expenses due by or to either party, and decerns." *

Beattie appealed, and on 5th August 1874 the Sheriff (Gillespie Dickson) adhered to his Substitute's interlocutor.†

---

* NOTE.—(After a narrative of the facts)—"In this state of matters it was strongly contended by the pursuer's parish that the letter of admission, No. 7/1 of process, amounted to a quasi-contract, and formed a sort of binding obligation by which the defender's parish was barred in all time coming from reopening the question. This was denied on the part of the defender's parish, and it was argued that the letter, 7/1, was not binding, because it had proceeded upon an error in fact, and that the matter in question, being one affecting the interests of the ratepayers, could not be settled against them by the mere acts or admissions of an inspector. It appears to the Sheriff-substitute that it would be ultra vires of an inspector, or even perhaps of the parochial board itself, to enter into a contract as to the support of a pauper, which should have the effect of saddling the ratepayers in all time coming with the maintenance of the pauper, in the face of clear evidence afterwards emerging of non-liability. He cannot therefore sustain the pursuer's plea to the effect of creating estoppel. But, on the other hand, he is of opinion that it is a matter to be kept clearly in view in dealing with the evidence, more especially if it appears that, in consequence of the admission of chargeability, important evidence has been lost, which, if now available, would have seriously affected the issue.

"Rejecting, therefore, the plea of mora and acquiescence as a bar to prosecuting the inquiry, the important question presents itself, At what period, if any, did the pauper's husband acquire a settlement by residence in the pursuer's parish?" . . .

† "NOTE.—. . . . It must also be observed that the Barony Parish has itself to blame that liability was recognised by Cambuslang in 1863; for that was done in a great measure in consequence of erroneous information from the Barony inspector, which (unintentionally, no doubt), misled the Cambuslang officers and board (see per Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis in Innes v. Ironside, 1868, 1 Poor-Law Mag., new series, 531).

"It was contended for the pursuer that the arrangement in 1863 formed a

No. 68.

Jan. 15, 1875. Beattie v. Arbuckle.

Beattie appealed to the Court of Session.

Argued for Beattie (Barony);—An admission of liability under the 70th section of the Poor-Law Amendment Act was not for the sake of casual relief, but for the purpose of fixing the pauper's settlement until a new settlement was acquired, and was in a different position from statutory notice.[1] An admission such as this, which had been deliberately made and acted on for five years, could not be gone back upon, on the ground that the inspector who gave it had not inquired sufficiently before giving it. The decision of inspectors upon such questions were subject to the review of the parochial board, but after that they could not be recalled.[2] At all events, fraud would need to be averred and proved before such a contract could be reduced, and there was no mention of that in this record, the mistake being merely alleged to be that of the inspector of Cambuslang.[3] The mere fact of an interval of five months or so having elapsed, during which the pauper did not draw relief, but when it was not proved that her name was struck off the books did not so restore her to the class of self-supporting persons as to open up the question of settlement after it had once been fixed by an admission.[4]

Argued for Arbuckle;—The question was, whether an admission made in error was binding in all time coming. It was clear on the proof that the pauper's husband had a residential settlement in Barony. The inspector of Cambuslang was misled in his investigation in consequence of the positive statements made by the Barony inspector in his letters.[5] Whenever there was substantial error in point of fact, in respect of which something had been done which should not have been done, it was competent, and the duty of a Court of law, to put matters right. Error was always mutual unless there was fraud. There was no conclusive rule of law that because a party had the means of knowledge and did not use them he was to be barred from ever correcting a mistake complete bar against the defender disputing liability now, and that the defender is not entitled to challenge that arrangement on the ground merely of erroneous judgment on matter of law.

---

"To this it must be answered that the defender is not claiming repayment of the sums expended under a former arrangement, but is resisting a demand as to relief, which commenced after that arrangement had terminated by the pauper having returned to the general population. In such a case the parish against which relief is claimed is free to deal with the matter as a new one, without being encumbered by the old and erroneous agreement.

"This seems to follow from the decision in Beattie v. Wood, 1866, 4 Macph. 427.

"Besides, even if the pursuer's argument were right in principle, it is wrong in fact, for the former arrangement was made in essential error on matters of fact as to the date when the pauper's husband first came to Barrowfield.

"Accordingly, without indicating any opinion on the question whether Cambuslang has a good claim by way of condictio indebiti against Barony for the payments made under the arrangement referred to, the Sheriff cannot hold that arrangement to be a bar to the present defence."

[1] 8 and 9 Vict. cap. 83 (Poor-Law Amendment Scotland Act, 1845), sec. 70; Beattie v. Wood, Feb. 9, 1866, 4 Macph. 427, 38 Scot. Jur. 198.

[2] Taylor v. Strachan, Nov. 8, 1864, 3 Macph. 35, Lord Ardmillan, p. 38, 37 Scot. Jur. 16; Elgin Lunacy Board v. Bremner, July 10, 1874, ante, vol. i. 1155.

[3] Arthur v. Stewart, Feb. 8, 1871, 4 Poor-Law Mag. (N. S.) 278.

[4] Johnston v. Black, July 13, 1859, 21 D. 1293, 31 Scot. Jur. 675.

[5] Innes v. Ironside, June 5, 1868, 1 Poor-Law Mag. (N. S.) 531.

No. 68.

Jan. 15, 1875.
Beattie v. Arbuckle.

made in consequence.[1] Even if the first admission were effectual, its effect could not extend over the period when the pauper was rehabilitated, and the whole question of settlement was opened up whenever a new statutory notice became necessary.[2]

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case raises a question of settlement under the Poor-Law Amendment Act which is of some importance.

The point arises under the following circumstances:—

In the year 1862 the wife of David Moyes became a pauper, and was chargeable in the Barony Parish, Glasgow. The inspector of Barony wrote to the inspector of Cambuslang, stating that as the woman's husband had been born in Cambuslang she was accordingly chargeable to that parish. The inspector of Cambuslang, after some correspondence, on 6th March 1863, wrote,—"I duly received yours of the 25th ult. in reply to my letter of 16th July last, and from the facts therein contained, in connection with personal inquiries, I am now satisfied that said David Moyes had no resident settlement at the time of his death, and therefore admit liability."

According to the statement made in this record this woman remained chargeable to the parish of Cambuslang down to 1868. It is then said that in April 1868 she ceased to be chargeable to Cambuslang. She seems afterwards to have become insane, and to have been removed from Barony Parish to Gartnavel Asylum.

This statement is not altogether accurate. The real state of affairs was, that the pauper received relief from Cambuslang until September 1868, and that, in the meantime, from April 1868, she became insane, and was placed in Gartnavel Asylum by the inspector of Barony, but her name was not removed from the books of Cambuslang,—on the contrary, when she was discharged from the asylum in June 1868 she got relief from Cambuslang. It rather appears that for some period about that time she got relief from both parishes.

From September 1868 the pauper seems to have been for three months and a half self-supporting, that is, at least getting no relief from either Barony or Cambuslang. Whether her name ever was struck off the books of Cambuslang does not appear. It is, at all events, clear she was on the books till September 1868. In March 1869 she again became insane and chargeable in Barony, and, as appears from the doctor's certificate, she must have been in a state of insanity for about six weeks before that date. The only period during which she can be said, therefore, to have been self-supporting was from September 1868 to January 1869.

The inspector of Barony now brings an action against Cambuslang, and founds upon the previous admission by that parish in 1863. The defence to this action is twofold,—(1) It is said that Cambuslang is not bound, because, first, the admission was not consistent with the true state of the facts, the settlement of the pauper's husband having been truly in Barony, and that the admission cannot be binding, because it was made upon the statement of the facts furnished by the inspector of Barony, to whom the admission was given; (2) The other defence is, that as the pauper became self-supporting after the admission, Cambuslang is no longer affected by the admission.

[1] Chitty on Contracts (9th ed.) 589; Townsend v. Crowdey, June 11, 1860, 29 L. J. (C. P.) 301; Dails v. Lloyd, May 2, 1848, 17 L. J. (Q. B.) 247.

[2] Johnston v. Black, and Beattie v. Wood, supra, and M'Donald v. Taylor, Nov. 26, Poor-Law Mag. 348.

No. 68.

Jan. 15, 1875.
Beattie v. Arbuckle.

§ 70

With regard to the first defence, I am of opinion that the mere allegation that the inspector of Cambuslang was in error in making the admission in 1863 is not a relevant ground for opening up an admission which has been given. By the terms of the 70th section of the Poor-Law Amendment Act, the admission of the parish of its liability is one of the statutory modes of determining chargeability, and the parish which is applied to as ultimately liable by the parish actually giving relief may delay giving an admission of liability for such period as may seem necessary for prosecuting inquiries as to the facts. That is just what was done here,—the inspector of Cambuslang did not give his admission until he had made inquiry.

It would be exceedingly inconvenient if it were not in the power of parochial boards to terminate all questions of this sort on reasonable and apparently satisfactory information.

We had a learned argument on the question that a contract proceeding on error in point of fact was not binding. That does not, however, apply to a case where the subject-matter of the admission or contract was the fact ultimately admitted, and when the admission was made only after inquiry, as was the case here.

The question here is not whether error in point of fact vitiates a contract, but whether there is a relevant averment of error sufficient to vitiate the contract. The admission precludes Cambuslang from alleging that the parish of the pauper's settlement was in Barony, because Cambuslang by the statutory admission has fixed it in Cambuslang. It is urged that the error was induced by the inspector of Barony, and if that were proved to be correct it might be possible, on the authority of the case of Innes v. Ironside, June 5, 1868, 1 Poor-Law Mag. N. S. 531, for us to get behind the admission. There is nothing, however, in the letter of the inspector of Barony to lead, in my opinion, to any such conclusion. I do not think the letter referred to bears the construction attempted to be put upon it. It says, "that prior to his marriage he had been up and down in lodgings in Barony two or three years," shewing that the exact time was not known. It amounted to the statement that the settlement was more or less doubtful, and served to put the inspector of Cambuslang on his inquiry. I see no indication of an intention to state what was known to be untrue, or what was not believed to be true.

In addition to that, the admission was not given on that letter alone. As it appears from his own letter the inspector of Cambuslang did inquire into the matter before giving the admission. I think that the inspector of Cambuslang has precluded himself from opening up this question by giving the admission after inquiry. If it were otherwise, the salutary provisions of the Poor-Law Amendment Act would be much weakened and neutralised.

On the two branches of the first defence, then, I am of opinion that the inspector of Cambuslang is bound by his admission in 1863.

The second question is, whether the fact of the pauper having been self-supporting,—that is, off the books,—for a short time creates a new chargeability, and raises of new the whole question of settlement when she again applies for relief. It is not necessary to decide this point in this case, because I am clearly of opinion that although when residing with her sister the pauper did not draw parochial relief from either parish, still her chargeability as a pauper never ceased. I think it would be a very strong thing to say that, because for a month or two a pauper did not call for her relief, the whole question of settlement had to be reconsidered and resettled.

No. 68.

Jan. 15, 1875.
Beattie v. Arbuckle.

I am therefore of opinion that the contract originally made, and the admission given by Cambuslang, must still rule the question of the settlement of this pauper, and that accordingly the Barony Parish must prevail.

LORD NEAVES.—I see the importance of the questions raised in this case, and think that the principles laid down by your Lordship in the chair are well founded and essential to the proper working of the "Poor-Law Amendment Act."

The principle sought to be imported into the case of essential error does not, in my opinion, apply.

A pauper must be relieved by the parish in which he or she becomes chargeable; then that parish must look out for the parish which is to be ultimately liable. It is very much to the credit of the inspectors of poor throughout Scotland that these questions are so often settled in an inexpensive manner.

When evidence is supplied by one parish to another it is capable of being tested, and if it is not so tested it is just to save expense. To say that a bona fide error such as we have to consider here is to affect a contract to the effect intended for by the respondent is unreasonable. Neither party can know the exact state of the facts. What is known must in general be the result of inquiry.

In this case the information supplied by the one inspector was followed up, and appeared to be supported by inquiries made by the other.

To say that an error in such circumstances is to entitle one of the parties to open up the whole matter at a much later date is a contention that cannot be listened to. The result come to was mutual,—the two inspectors trusted to each other's honesty, and mala fides is not here supposable.

I am therefore of opinion that the arrangement so made is not to be disturbed by one party stating that the facts assumed were not the true facts of the case. To effect such a result mala fides would need to be clearly averred and proved.

On the other question, as to the break in the chargeability, I am of opinion that there was here no convalescence of the pauper from the original pauperism. There was, no doubt, a short period during which she was maintained by her sister instead of by the parish, but she never was self-supporting. The admission of liability ought not, on that account, to be disturbed. It was arrived at by a mutual arrangement, and it is mutually binding.

In these circumstances it is not necessary to decide whether, where there has been a cessation of chargeability, it is competent to go back upon a former admission.

The case of M'Donald v. Taylor[1] was one where there was a third parish in question, and the arrangement founded on had not been made between the parishes actually in opposition.

I am therefore of opinion that this admission must stand effectual till new circumstances occur which can set it aside, of which there is no relevant or sufficient averment here.

LORD ORMIDALE.—It appears to me that the question arising here is a very important one in the administration of the "Poor-Law Amendment Act" of 1845, more especially in the view which ought to be taken and held by the Court of the true meaning and effect of the 70th section of that Act.

[1] Supra, p. 333.

No. 68.

Jan. 15, 1875.
Beattie v. Arbuckle.

